

This is a digital copy of a book that was preserved for generations on library shelves before it was carefully scanned by Google as part of a project to make the world's books discoverable online.

It has survived long enough for the copyright to expire and the book to enter the public domain. A public domain book is one that was never subject to copyright or whose legal copyright term has expired. Whether a book is in the public domain may vary country to country. Public domain books are our gateways to the past, representing a wealth of history, culture and knowledge that's often difficult to discover.

Marks, notations and other marginalia present in the original volume will appear in this file - a reminder of this book's long journey from the publisher to a library and finally to you.

Usage guidelines

Google is proud to partner with libraries to digitize public domain materials and make them widely accessible. Public domain books belong to the public and we are merely their custodians. Nevertheless, this work is expensive, so in order to keep providing this resource, we have taken steps to prevent abuse by commercial parties, including placing technical restrictions on automated querying.

We also ask that you:

- + Make non-commercial use of the files We designed Google Book Search for use by individuals, and we request that you use these files for personal, non-commercial purposes.
- + Refrain from automated querying Do not send automated queries of any sort to Google's system: If you are conducting research on machine translation, optical character recognition or other areas where access to a large amount of text is helpful, please contact us. We encourage the use of public domain materials for these purposes and may be able to help.
- + Maintain attribution The Google "watermark" you see on each file is essential for informing people about this project and helping them find additional materials through Google Book Search. Please do not remove it.
- + Keep it legal Whatever your use, remember that you are responsible for ensuring that what you are doing is legal. Do not assume that just because we believe a book is in the public domain for users in the United States, that the work is also in the public domain for users in other countries. Whether a book is still in copyright varies from country to country, and we can't offer guidance on whether any specific use of any specific book is allowed. Please do not assume that a book's appearance in Google Book Search means it can be used in any manner anywhere in the world. Copyright infringement liability can be quite severe.

About Google Book Search

Google's mission is to organize the world's information and to make it universally accessible and useful. Google Book Search helps readers discover the world's books while helping authors and publishers reach new audiences. AFFAIRS OF ITALY.—QUESTION.

LORD LYNTHURST: My Lords, a short time ago I asked my noble Friend the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he would lay upon the table of the House the correspondence relating to the affairs of Italy. Since that, the noble Lord has, on two several occasions, stated to your Lordships that a correspondence was going on, as I understood it, between Her Majesty's Government and the Government of Naples and other European Powers with regard to the affairs of Italy. I now wish to repeat my question; for, as relates to Naples, it is to be presumed, I think, that that correspondence is at an end; and, I fear, it is an end without any satisfactory result. I form that opinion from what is now passing in Naples. I allude to the trials now going on there—the political trials—which have, as your Lordships are well aware, disclosed proceedings of a most scandalous description. Ministers of religion have been stripped of their religious dress, threatened with imprisonment—threatened even with infliction of the lash—unless they would consent to give evidence against the parties accused. The whole course of those proceedings appears to me to be a mere duplicate of those proceedings which took place on the trial of Poerio, of which my right hon. Friend the Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. Gladstone), has given so graphic a description. It appears to me, so far as I can collect, that the whole Government of Naples is in the hands of police agents, spies, and informers, and that the position of affairs in that part of Italy is truly deplorable. I beg to ask my noble Friend whether he is prepared to lay upon the table of the House copies of the communications which have passed between this Government and the Neapolitan Government, or any other European Powers, in respect to the affairs of Italy?

THE EARL OF CLARENDON: My Lords, I cannot at present inform my noble and learned Friend whether it will be in the power of Her Majesty's Government to lay upon the table of the House the correspondence to which he alludes. That correspondence, as respects Naples, has not, as my noble and learned Friend supposes, been brought to a close; we have not yet received an answer to the despatch communicated by Her Majesty's Government, in concert with that of the Emperor of the French, to the Neapolitan Government. The King of Naples was absent from that capital when this despatch arrived there; but he returned in a few days after, and we have reason to believe that he gave directions that an answer should be made out and forwarded to the Neapolitan Ministers in London and Paris, to be by them communicated to the French and English Governments. Well, as I said before, we have not yet received it; and until we shall have received it, and Her Majesty's Government shall have determined what further steps are to be taken in respect of the affairs of Italy, my noble and learned Friend will understand that it would be premature to lay this correspondence upon the table. With respect to the correspondence that has taken place between this Government and other Governments in regard of the affairs of Italy, it is perfectly true that we have offered our opinions and advice to those Governments whose armies occupy a portion of the Italian States; but I do not think the object my noble and learned Friend has in view would be served by the production of this correspondence at present. I believe that the only result of its production would be to check the friendly and confidential communication which is now going on, and from which some good may be expected. Your Lordships must be aware that to correct the state of things now existing in that country, and to render the withdrawal of those foreign armies safe, must be a work of some time. I can, therefore, only hope that my noble and learned Friend will accept the assurance that nothing which it is possible for Her Majesty's Government to do has been or will be neglected to promote the cessation of this foreign occupation. I believe that the French and Austrian Governments are both desirous to withdraw their troops from the Roman territory, and that this withdrawal will take place as soon as a military organisation which the Pope is preparing shall have been completed.

LORD LYNTHURST: Will my noble Friend lay on the table the correspondence with the Neapolitan Government as soon as the answer arrives?

THE EARL OF CLARENDON: Until I see the answer I cannot tell; but my noble and learned Friend will have an opportunity of repeating his question.

OATH OF ABJURATION AMENDMENT BILL.

THE EARL OF DERBY: My Lords, before the Orders of the Day are taken I wish to say a few words on the subject of a Bill which I introduced a short time ago, and which stands for the third reading on Thursday next. That Bill was for the amendment of the oath of abjuration; or, as my noble and learned Friend (Lord Lyndhurst) would like better, a Bill to amend the oath "commonly called" the abjuration oath. That Bill was introduced to effect an object which all your Lordships desire — namely, the abrogation of certain portions of that oath which, having become obsolete, are useless, and, being useless, are indefensible. My Lords, I was in hopes that the Bill, having that object, would have been discussed without any allusion to another subject with which it had been on former occasions connected, and I framed the Bill so as to avoid any reference to that other subject; and I hoped that in this and the other House of Parliament the proposed measure would have been received in a spirit of conciliation; but the character of the comments which have been made on the Bill in its progress through this House, and of which, I think, I have some cause to complain, and the misconstruction of its objects by so high and so respected an authority as my noble and learned Friend (Lord Lyndhurst), deprives me of the hope that it would be received in the other House in the spirit in which it was intended. For peace and conciliation I introduced a measure, as it appeared to me, of the most unobjectionable kind; but I have been met in a spirit of defiance and hostility. I have been charged with having promoted that which would bring about discussions on a subject likely to produce considerable irritation; whereas my sole object in introducing the Bill was to avoid — sedulously to avoid — that. But in the present state of the public mind — since there is no hope that the Bill will be passed into law in the spirit in which it is intended — I will not, so far as I am concerned, be answerable for reintroducing an irritating topic, upon which the two Houses are at variance. Looking, then, at the probability of the Bill leading to inconvenient discussion, and having regard to the period of the Session at which we are arrived, I will ask your Lordships' permission for the discharge of the Order for the third reading; but, in doing so, I must at the same time be permitted to say that it remains my firm conviction that a Bill such as that which I have introduced is the only mode of effecting the abrogation of those unnecessary oaths. If, for the future, those oaths which are unnecessary, and therefore objectionable, and of which every one is desirous of getting rid, be retained, I trust that I shall not be held responsible for their retention. I did my best to get rid of them; and the responsibility of their retention must rest with those who will not agree to their abolition, unless attached to that abolition are other provisions referring to another entirely distinct subject which this House has repeatedly expressed its determination conscientiously to refuse.

LORD LYNTHURST: I will not now enter upon a discussion of the question; but the noble Earl complains of the course which I pursued on a former occasion with respect to this Bill. Now, I have much more reason to complain of the noble Earl's conduct, because, on that occasion, in terms not of the usual courtesy, he charged me with, not misapprehending the Bill, but misrepresenting the objects of the Bill. However, the comments which I then addressed to your Lordships were perfectly legitimate, and quite consistent with the character of the proceedings in your Lordships' House.

LORD CAMPBELL: I should be glad to have this oath abolished, as it is my painful duty often to listen to the profanation which the taking it involves; but the noble Earl opposite has done well to withdraw his Bill, as no good can possibly arise either to the cause which I have at heart—the abolition of the oath—or to that which is the noble and learned Lord's object—the removal of disabilities in the way of the Jews. In all probability, the Bill would have been returned to this House in such a state as to make it identical with the Bill your Lordships have rejected. I do not wish to see any such conflict between the two Houses, because I hope to see the time when, with the assent of both, justice may be done. Nor do I wish that the House of Commons should take upon themselves by Resolution to alter the law of the land; but that the Jews may be admitted to Parliament by the only way in which they can be admitted—by the consent of both Houses.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY: I very much regretted the other night that this Bill was not discussed in a plain and straightforward manner—on the plain meaning of its words; but an example was set by my noble and learned Friend (Lord Lyndhurst)—an example likely to be followed—to depart from the plain sense of the Bill, and to attribute motives to my noble Friend beside me (the Earl of Derby) for bringing in that Bill—motives by which my noble Friend denies having been actuated. If, my Lords, I regretted that circumstance the other night, I regret it still more now—

LORD LYNTHURST: I beg to correct my noble Friend. He is quite under a mistake. I stated that I conceived the noble Earl to be under a mistake as to what would be the real effect of the Bill; but I did not impute motives to the noble Earl.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY: Well, I think the House must have understood my noble and learned Friend to argue as much against this Bill as one which he believed would operate against the admission of Jews into Parliament, as he did against the plain sense of the words of the Bill itself. I certainly understood him to argue against it more on the former ground; and I regret very much that my noble and learned Friend should have departed from the plain sense of the words of the proposed measure. I am sorry, that instead of arguing on the merits of the Bill before the House, he did not refrain from entering on the discussion of a subject which the House had considered and decided upon a few evenings before. My Lords, I regret still more that the noble and learned Lord should have repeated that censure and that argument immediately after my noble Friend had withdrawn his Bill, and thereby shown the respect he had for your Lordships, and also shown what his motive was in opposing the Bill. Again, I repeat my regret that such an example of departure from the plain dealing which characterises and should ever characterise your Lordships' House should have been set by such a distinguished Member as my noble and learned Friend. But I shall only repeat the maxim in Horace. Decipit exemplar vitiis imitabile."

LORD LYNDHURST: What I complained of was, that although the words of abjuration were omitted, the whole sting remained, because "the true faith of a Christian," would still have formed part of the oath. The sending such a Bill down to the other House, after they had sent a Bill here in which those words were carefully excluded, would not have been very acceptable to them.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE: I am sure the common sense of Parliament and of the country will not permit the maintenance of this absurd and irreverent oath. It ought not to be remodelled; it ought to be abolished. If you will have an oath at all, have an oath of allegiance and fidelity in plain simple terms, which every good subject can take, whatever may be his religion: and if you choose to exclude Jews and infidels, make the oath in such terms as every denomination of Christians can take it. You ought not to continue this absurd oath, because incidentally it has the effect of excluding the Jews.

Order for the Third Reading on Thursday next discharged; and the Bill (by Leave of the House) withdrawn.

THE EAST INDIA COMPANY—VOLUNTARY PAYMENTS—QUESTION.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE wished to ask whether the sum of £500 lately subscribed by the Chairman of Directors of the East India Company in aid of the sufferers by inundations in France had been supplied by proprietors of East India Stock or had been taken from the public revenues of Her Majesty's possessions in India? and, in the latter case, whether subscriptions, grants, or gratuities, not exceeding £600, taken from Indian revenues, are subject to the control of Parliament or of Her Majesty's Government, or are limited by any fixed regulation? If that money was (as he suspected) to be paid from the public revenues of India, he must say that he regarded such a course as alike improper and unconstitutional. He was not to be understood as not sympathising with the sufferers in France, nor as condemning the raising of money by subscriptions in this country for their relief. He thought, on the contrary, that those subscriptions did honour to the country; but he objected to the East India Company voting away money that belonged to England. He denied the authority of the Directors of that Company, composed of eighteen individuals, twelve of whom were elected by the Company themselves, to do what the Government of England had not the power to do. He understood that the Board of Directors claimed a right to expend sums not exceeding £600 without receiving the sanction of any authority, and based that claim upon the terms of the 88th section of the Act of 1813. It must, however, be remembered that in 1813 the revenues of India were the property of the East India Company, but since 1833 those revenues had passed from the hands of the Company and were now administered by the Indian Government. In the present case the purpose for which the money was voted could not be objected to, but, if the power claimed by the Board of Directors was yielded to them, they would have the power of voting sums to every charity in London, and at the same time of exercising their generosity, not at the expense of the East India Company, whose receipts would not be at all affected by them, but at the cost of the Indian Government, out of whose revenues those payments were to be made.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL trusted that his noble Friend would excuse him if he confined himself entirely to answering the questions put to him. The vote come to by the Court of Directors in aid of the sufferers by the recent inundations in France was, as his noble Friend suggested, to come out of the general revenues of India. The vote had received the sanction of the President of the Board of Control, who had it in his power to negative it, if he thought it expedient to do so. In regard to the other question of his noble Friend, he had to inform him that there were no abstract rules laid down upon the subject; but he believed it had been the custom of the East India Company from time to time to subscribe sums of money for various charitable objects. They did so under the powers of the Act to which his noble Friend referred, and he had never heard the legality of the practice doubted. His noble Friend had expressed an opinion that the East India Company ought not to have this power. He (the Duke of Argyll) differed entirely from him. He believed that Parliament had wisely left this power in the hands of the East India Company. There was no doubt whatever of the existence of this power. He did not think that his noble Friend would question the legitimacy of the object for which the subscription was given, nor the wisdom of the President of the Board of Control in not negating the vote come to by the East India Company, considering the circumstances of the case and our relations with France.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH said, that, as he understood the Act of Parliament, the concurrence of the President of the Board of Control in this grant of the Directors of the East India Company could not possibly have the effect of making it legal. It was not the relic of ancient power, it was a relic of ancient practice. Previous to the Act of 1833 the East India Company possessed the revenue of India as their own property, and they might then have justly and legally expended their money in such subscriptions as the one in question. But the Act of 1833 entirely changed the nature of their connection with India. All their property was taken from them; they had sold it for an annuity, and that annuity was to a certain degree guaranteed by Parliament. They, therefore, had no interest in India, except that given to them by the Act of 1833, and that Act made them trustees for the Crown, for the purpose of discharging the duties of the Government of India. They were trustees for that office only; and no expenditure made by them could be legal which was not clearly and evidently for the service of the Government of India. But could it be pretended that this subscription for the relief of the sufferers from the inundations in France was in any respect for the service of India? This expenditure was, therefore, illegal, and many of the expenses incurred by the Court of Directors were illegal, according to the strict interpretation of the Act of 1833. It was not, however, under any clause in the Act of 1833 that the Court of Directors would attempt to justify this application of their funds. By the Act of 1833 the Court of Directors were directed to submit to the Board of Control an estimate of the gross sum annually required for the payment of the salaries of the Court and of the officers and servants thereof, and of all other proper expenses either fixed or contingent. This sum might be varied from time to time. The Board of Control might refuse to acquiesce in the sum demanded, giving their reasons for it; but the sum having been once granted, the Board could not interfere as to the manner in which it was to be expended. Now, many of these gross abuses and illegalities had been continued in consequence of the Court of Directors not having sent in new estimates of the annual expenses; and also in consequence of the Board of Control not having struck out, when such estimates were before them, expenses which might have been proper before the Act of 1833 was passed, but which were illegal subsequently to that Act. He thought it, therefore, possible that this sum of £500 might have been taken from a balance of the sum annually granted by the Board of Control for the expenses of the Court of Directors. But it was not merely to a subscription to assist the sufferers from the inundations of France, or to subscriptions to many excellent charities in this country, that he objected; but it was to the large expenses frequently incurred by the Court of Directors, which they ought no longer to be permitted to incur, that he entertained the strongest objections. What would their Lordships think of a Secretary of State of this country who, on the examination of the cadets at Sandhurst or at Woolwich, should invite forty or fifty officers to go down, undertaking to pay all their expenses, and giving them a magnificent dinner on their arrival? What would be thought of the noble Lord if he asked Parliament for a Vote to defray all this expenditure? Would the House of Commons tolerate an estimate of an expense incurred for such a purpose? Their Lordships knew they would not. Her Majesty's Ministers thought it necessary, on certain great occasions, to indulge in grand dinners by way of great demonstrations. The Members of the Government, at the commencement of the late war, thought it expedient to inaugurate that war by a grand dinner at the Reform Club, at which the most sanguine anticipations were expressed of an easy and brilliant victory—in which the naval department was most especially exalted; but he apprehended that the expense of that dinner never appeared in the naval estimates to be paid for by the country. Neither would the army estimates, he ventured to say, include the expense of the dinner to be given by the Secretary of War to Sir William Codrington, on his return from the Crimea. It was not for the benefit of the Government of India that these expenses should be incurred. The service of that Government was not the object of such expenditure, and, therefore, it could not be considered legal. But the Court of Directors seemed to be of the same opinion as Louis XIV., and appeared to conceive that "they were the State." It was not the first time that he called the attention of her Majesty's Government to this subject, and he did earnestly entreat the Government to consider whether a Bill ought not to be brought in forthwith for the purpose of establishing an independent audit of the accounts of the East India Company. It was really too bad that £23,000,000 should be expended, year after year, without any independent audit whatever—with no audit but that which was under the control and influence of the very persons by whom the money was expended. Parliament would not be acting honestly towards the people of India if it allowed this system to continue any longer. He, therefore, did trust that the Government would not allow this Session to pass without introducing a Bill for the purpose of putting an end to that most injurious system.

ANNUITIES REDEMPTION BILL.

On the Order for the Third Reading of this Bill,

EARL POWIS complained that this Bill had reached its present stage without any explanation of its provisions. The measure was one of great importance, and demanded their Lordships' best attention. It provided for the capitalisation of the annuity of a noble Duke (the Duke of Grafton), but said not one word as to what was to be done with the money—it did not state whether the money was to be vested in trustees, or placed absolutely at the disposal of the party in question. The annuity had originally been granted to sustain the title, and he thought that means should be taken to continue it to that use, as the title was not at all likely to become extinct. He also found by purchasing the annuities this year, when we were obliged to resort to loans to equalise receipt and expenditure, a dead loss to the country of about £40,000 would be incurred, seeing that for every £100 we received we issued £111 2s. 6d. stock. Had we waited for a surplus year the transaction might have been effected without loss.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY said, that the disposal of the redemption

money. would be arranged by the law officers of the Crown, with the view of preserving the original purpose of the annuity intact.

LORD MONTEAGLE said, that the question for consideration was whether or not the Bill met the justice of the case. It should be remembered that the Bill did not actually effect a commutation, but gave necessary powers for effecting a commutation. He thought, however, that the facts were as yet not before the House with sufficient distinctness; he would therefore suggest that the third reading of the Bill should stand over for a short time.

LORD REDESDALE concurred with the noble Lord in thinking that the House was not sufficiently informed as to the parties entitled in remainder to this pension.

LORD STANLEY OF ALDERLEY explained that the terms of the Bill empowered the Lords of the Treasury to pay the monies to the parties entitled. He would, however, postpone the Bill, for the purpose of obtaining further information, until Thursday next.

Third reading put off to Thursday next.
House adjourned till To-morrow.

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1° Militia Ballots Suspension; Turnpike Acts Continuance.
2° Distillation from Rice; Oxford College Estates.

THE CORNWALL MILITIA—QUESTION.

MR. ROBARTES said, he would beg to ask the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for War why the 2nd Cornwall Rifles were not included in the list of militia regiments which volunteered for foreign service during the late war, as the officers and men of that regiment unanimously expressed their readiness to serve Her Majesty wherever they could be of use?

MR. FREDERICK PEEL said, it was not competent for the Government to accept the offer to serve abroad on the part of a militia regiment, until after the passing of the Bill of December, 1854. The offer of the 2nd Cornwall Militia was made in April, 1854, when there were no regiments of militia even embodied, and the Government were not in a position to accept the offer, however much it might have been required.

NATIONAL GALLERY SITE BILL.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. SPOONER said, the National Gallery Site Bill stood on the paper for that evening; he wished to know whether it was the intention of the Government, after the Vote of last Friday, to proceed with it further that Session?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON replied that, after the expression of opinion by the House on Friday night, it was not his intention to proceed further with the Bill; at all events during the present Session. He proposed, therefore, to discharge the order.

Order for Second Reading discharged.

EVACUATION OF ISMAIL BY THE RUSSIANS—QUESTION.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he wished to know if any information had been received by the Government with regard to the destruction of the fortresses and works at Ismail and Beni previous to the evacuation of those places by the Russians?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, no official information has been received to that effect. I believe, however, that the Russians conceive themselves at liberty, in consequence of what passed at the Paris Conferences, to destroy these works. Of course, if they have done so, the only result will be to impose upon the Turkish Government certain expenses in re-establishing the works when they come into possession of the ceded territory.

BETIREMENT OF THE BISHOPS OF LONDON AND DURHAM—QUESTION.

MR. GREGSON said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether it was in the contemplation of the Government to propose any plan for the retirement of bishops on pensions similar to the arrangement for Colonial Bishops, Lord Chancellors, Judges, and Ministers of State?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: It is not my intention to propose any general measure upon the subject. But the Bishop of London and the Bishop of Durham having both signified their wish to retire in consequence of infirmities which, in their opinion, render it impossible for them with satisfaction to themselves to continue in the active discharge of their functions, I shall have to propose a Bill limited to those two cases.

DISEMBODIMENT OF THE IRISH MILITIA—QUESTION.

MR. DAVISON said, he wished to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether any particular time had been fixed for the disembodiment of the Irish militia?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, that his noble Friend (Lord Panmure) had requested the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland to use his discretion in fixing the time for the disembodiment of particular Irish regiments of militia; and whilst on the one hand he did not keep them embodied longer than was necessary with a view to economy, on the other hand, to allot the periods of disembodiment in the different parts of the country so as to make the process coincide with the commencement of harvest operations.

OUR RELATIONS WITH THE UNITED STATES.

On the question that Mr. SPEAKER do leave the chair, in order that the House go into Committee of Supply, being put,

MR. G. H. MOORE rose to move the Resolution with regard to the American question of which he had given notice.

MR. W. BROWN rose at the same time, and said he would appeal to his hon. Friend the Member for Mayo not to proceed with his Motion. From all he had heard there was a strong feeling both in that House and in the country that the matter should be left in the hands of the Government and the American Minister now in England, in order that the differences which had unfortunately arisen between the two countries might be adjusted. He had no doubt that, unless some cause of irritation should arise, those disputes would be amicably arranged compatible to justice and honour, and to the satisfaction of both parties. He thought it would be exceedingly unwise to discuss any supposed fault or irregularity in the arrangement of public affairs so long as negotiations were pending and the mouths of Ministers were shut, so that they could not give answers which they would otherwise be able to make. Under those circumstances, he must decidedly but respectfully appeal to his hon. Friend not to proceed with his Motion at the present time.

MR. CHEETHAM said, he cordially joined in the appeal which had been made by his hon. colleague. He believed that the negotiations between the two countries were at the present moment in a favourable condition, and, as he was sure that the hon. Gentleman would not wish to arrest the progress of those negotiations, he (Mr. Cheetham) hoped that he would not press his Motion.

MR. J. C. EWART said, that there was among his constituency a strong feeling that nothing ought to be said or done in that House which would in the slightest degree interfere with those negotiations for a pacific solution of the difficulties between this country and the United States, which were, he believed, now going on. He therefore heartily concurred in the appeal which his hon. Friends near him had addressed to the hon. Member for Mayo.

MR. SPOONER said, that the feeling against a discussion upon the American question was not confined to Liverpool. It was very general. [A laugh.] Hon. Gentlemen near him might laugh, and it was always with the greatest diffidence that he differed from his hon. Friends around him, but he did deprecate discussion on this subject. No possible good could arise from it; but it might be followed by difficulties and evils of the greatest magnitude. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Mayo (Mr. Moore) said, by his Motion, that the Government had not deserved the approbation of the House. Had they asked for it? All they said was, "Wait, and see what we do." He gave no opinion upon their conduct; he was not prepared to give an opinion. An hon. Gentleman near him said that he ought to do so; he had formed an opinion, but he was not prepared to express it. He was prepared to support his party as far as any man, but he would not surrender his own opinion when he was convinced that by so doing he should run the risk of inflicting a great injury upon his country. What good could arise from a discussion of this question at the present moment? The American Government had acquitted that of Her Majesty, and had said that they had no fault to find with it, but, unfortunately, they had some dislike to our Minister at Washington. Were hon. Members prepared to bring on at the present moment a discussion which would endanger the amicable relations between the two countries? ["Oh, oh!"] Let not hon. Gentlemen deceive themselves. If this discussion went on, expressions might be used, false estimates of the opinion of that

House and of the country might be formed, which might, they knew not how much, embarrass and delay the Government in carrying on negotiations for the settlement of our differences with America. In his opinion Ministers had better preserve a complete and perfect silence. [A laugh.] Hon. Gentlemen might laugh, but the country would be exceedingly indignant if anything should escape from Ministers which should produce a contest with America. A heavy responsibility rested on Ministers, in which he recommended the House not to share. If the discussion should be carried on, and there should arise difficulties which would prevent the completion of a treaty, the Government would say that it was all the fault of the House—they were going on smoothly, when the House stepped in and took the matter out of their hands. He therefore urged the hon. Member to withdraw his Motion, and implored his hon. Friends to pause before they sanctioned the progress of this discussion. For his own part, he was not prepared to support any proposal which could have the effect of weakening the hands of Government at so critical a juncture, or of incapacitating them from bringing to a satisfactory conclusion the disputes unhappily pending between this country and America. [Laughter.] He was not to be laughed down, nor would ridicule deter him from giving fearless expression to his honest convictions. He by no means desired to identify himself with the policy of the Government, or to express any opinion on it one way or the other, but it was essential to the welfare of the country that they should not be embarrassed at such a moment. Should we unfortunately be plunged into war, we should be ready to protect our rights and to defend our honour and dignity; but circumstanced as we were at the present moment, the better course would be to abstain from discussion. On every consideration of public honour and of patriotism, and by his sense of what he owed alike to his country, to that House, and to himself, he conjured the hon. Member for Mayo not to persevere in his Motion.

MR. G. H. MOORE said, that the opinion of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Spooner) must necessarily have great weight with him on any subject, but more particularly on the subject of exciting ill-will and disunion among various classes, sects, and communities. He regretted, however, that he could not be guided by his counsels on the present occasion. With regard to the hon. Members who had appealed to him from the opposite side of the House, he was bound to listen with great respect to any admonition that might come from them; but, in this instance, he must refer them for a reply to the observations which he had made upon the same subject on Friday evening, and which the hon. Gentleman would, doubtless, have the candour to admit they had not refuted. The hon. Member for North Warwickshire had spoken of this as of a party question. [Mr. SPOONER: Hear, hear!] The form of the notice might, no doubt, be correctly described as that of a party Motion, but the question involved was one which ought to be decided by that House without the slightest reference to party considerations, and in a purely judicial spirit. It was a question of right and wrong which had arisen between the Governments of two great countries, and which, in his view of the matter, had been settled on a basis of present dissatisfaction and of future danger, as regarded the feelings and opinions of the people of both nations, inasmuch as it had been left to be arranged by the wrongdoers themselves, and on the principle of saving their own character, or, at all events, their own position, at the expense of the national honour, which it was their duty to have guarded. In so far as such a proposition must, if entertained by the House, affect the position of Her Majesty's Government, it might so far be termed, if hon. Gentlemen liked the term, "a party question," but most assuredly it was one which ought to be judged by the House without regard to party consequences, and upon considerations the highest, widest, and most extensive which could govern the opinions of men. In his opinion, there were no circumstances which ought to be watched by Parliament with more vigilant and anxious attention than those which affected our relations with a people who, sprung from our own soil, spoke the same language, were governed by the same institutions, swayed by the same motives, and inspired by the same great instincts as ourselves. There was nothing which England ought to cherish with more hope and pride than to be loved and honoured by that great community of nations of her own blood and race who, gradually multiplying, were covering the earth with their colonies, the sea with their fleets, and who carried with them, wherever they went, the energy and the enterprise, the all-conquering will and the indomitable self-reliance of the great people from whom they had sprung. Although we had lost the political Government of the United States, as we might hereafter be doomed to lose that of other colonies, which might grow too powerful to admit of their being ruled by other hands than their own, we ought never to surrender—never to let lapse, by any fault of ours, our right to their reverence and allegiance, and our title to be regarded as the head of their race, the centre of their civilisation, the fountain of their inspirations, and the standard of what every nation ought to be in principle, policy, and conduct. Whatever might be the faults and follies of the American people, he believed them to be a people of wise and sagacious as well as ardent inspirations; and that there was no stronger impulse in the heart of an American than an instinctive admiration of the old country, and an intuitive desire for brotherly association with her children. But it was not to be wondered at if America should grow gradually tired of an attachment which was repelled, if not repudiated, and if she should become dissatisfied with an alliance which was occasionally ungracious, exacting, and inconsiderate. There was nothing which required to be watched with greater attention than the growth of such a feeling in the public mind of America, for in our transactions with that country our only policy was to compel their respect. As regarded our political and diplomatic relations, they rested on the foundations of truth and honour, of fair dealing and open speaking, and to abandon those principles would be to loosen the bonds of union between both countries and to expose each to a common calamity. He firmly believed that a well-founded distrust on the part of America in our character for integrity and veracity would be the most disastrous circumstance, the direst misfortune that could possibly befall this country, and it was because the English Government had, in his opinion, justly forfeited the respect and esteem of the people and Government of America that he deemed it to be the duty of that House to declare, at once, that, for the folly and weakness which had led to that result, and which, if persevered in, might lead to consequences still more lamentable, the people of England were in no degree responsible; and that they had had no act or part in bringing about a state of things which it was impossible to regard with other feelings than those of sorrow and solicitude. The issues raised by this question were neither to be mistaken nor evaded. They had been fairly and thus accurately stated by Lord Clarendon himself in one of his despatches—

“The real questions at issue between Her Majesty’s Government and that of the United States are, whether the British Government ordered or contemplated any violation of the neutrality laws of the United States; whether, if the British Government did not order or contemplate such violation, those laws were nevertheless violated by persons acting with the authority or approbation of the British Government?”

Now, on those two points he was prepared to join issue with Her Majesty’s Government, and he would undertake to make it clear that the neutrality laws of the United States had been grossly and deliberately violated and outraged by persons acting with the consent and approbation of Her Majesty’s Government, and that Her Majesty’s Government did contemplate and sanction the violation of those laws. He was aware that the American Government had, in their last despatch, offered with contemptuous courtesy to separate the two propositions—that was to say, to separate the responsibility of Lord Clarendon and of the Government from that of Mr. Crampton: but, however well that diplomatic fiction might suit the purpose of the American Government, it could not be accepted by the British otherwise than at the expense of their own truth and honesty. That distinction of the American Government was based first on the disputed avowal of Mr. Crampton, and, secondly, on the distinct avowal of Lord Clarendon, that Mr. Crampton was enjoined to act above-board and to have no concealment from the Government of the United States. For his own part he cared not to consider whether Her Majesty’s Government had or had not thought proper in their last despatch to ride off on that assumption. If they had it would avail them nothing, for it could be distinctly shown that Mr. Crampton had performed the duty indicated to him by Lord Clarendon, that he had acted on that interpretation of the law which had received the sanction of Lord Clarendon, and that from first to last he had pursued a course which had been authorised, accredited, and finally defended by Lord Clarendon. As for Lord Clarendon having deprecated a violation of the American law, so too had Mr. Crampton; but both insisted with equal pertinacity on placing upon that law a perverse construction which had led to its being violated, and in that respect they were both equally blameable. But although Her Majesty’s Government might be in a position to assert that the disavowal of Mr. Crampton’s Acts (which the American Government assumed) did not rest upon an explicit declaration of their own, it was not so in regard to the assurance given by Lord Clarendon to which he had already referred, and which the American Government accepted in explanation. Lord Clarendon, writing to Mr. Buchanan at the beginning of the controversy, expressly declared that Mr. Crampton was enjoined above all to practise no concealment with the American Government. That declaration had been accepted by the United States’ Government; they had made the most effective use of it from one end of the correspondence to the other, and it had been quoted with triumph by Mr. Marcy in his last despatch. Mr. Marcy said—

“If Mr. Crampton believed that what he was doing, or intended to do, in the way of recruiting was right, he could have had no reluctance to communicate it to me, for his instructions required him to make that disclosure. Acting in due frankness, and with a proper regard for the dictates of international comity, Mr. Crampton should, it would seem, have disclosed to me all the measures intended to be pursued within the United States by the agents of his Government, including himself, in execution of the Act of Parliament for raising the Foreign Legion. Nay, he was expressly commanded by his Government to practise no concealment with the American Government on the subject. If he had obeyed these orders all misunderstandings between the two Governments would have been prevented.”

Now that was the assurance on which Her Majesty’s Government consented that they should be held exculpated and Mr. Crampton impeached, and was it true? He called on Her Majesty’s Government to show that it had the slightest foundation in fact. On that point the whole question turned. If our Government enjoined Mr. Crampton to use no concealment, then there was an end to the charge against them; but if, on the contrary, Mr. Crampton received no such injunction, Her Majesty’s Ministers could not escape from their responsibility. In making that assertion, however, Lord Clarendon, while betraying an imaginative memory as to what he had enjoined, evince a distinct consciousness of what he ought to have enjoined and of what Mr. Crampton ought to have done. He (Mr. Moore) would prove that, so far from there having been no concealment on the part the English authorities in America, their conduct was all concealment—all a disavowing and denying of everything and everybody that was found out—all an aiding, abetting, and approving of everybody who remained concealed and of everything that worked well underground. He undertook, also, to show that Mr. Crampton was not "enjoined above all," nor even enjoined at all, to avoid concealment; but that he was abetted, sustained, approved, and defended in a course of conduct of which concealment was the very key-stone and afforded the only possible hope of success. It should be remembered that the question of the neutrality of the United States and the strict enforcement of the laws relating to it were first mooted and insisted upon by Her Majesty's Government. Early in April, 1854, in the beginning of the war with Russia, Mr. Crampton wrote to Mr. Marcy to the following effect—

"The allied Governments confidently trust that the Governments of countries which may remain neutral during this war will exert their authority and enforce on their subjects the necessity of observing the strictest neutrality, and also that the citizens of the United States shall rigorously abstain from taking part in armaments of this nature, or in any other manner opposite to the duties of a strict neutrality."

To this reasonable demand the American Government returned this pithy answer—

"The law of this country imposes severe restrictions not only upon its own citizens, but upon all persons who may be resident in the United States, against equipping privateers, receiving commissions, or enlisting men therein for the purpose of taking part in any foreign war. It is not apprehended that there will be any attempt to violate the law, but should the just expectations of the President be disregarded he will not fail in his duty to use all the power with which he is invested to prevent any such participation in the contest in which the principal powers of Europe are now engaged."

Well, that demand of our Government was cheerfully acceded to by the Government of the United States, and thus a clear understanding was formed between the two Powers as to their relative duties in regard to the neutrality of the latter. The interpretation now, however, sought to be put upon the arrangement—namely, that the Americans were unequivocally bound down to prevent any armaments from being fitted out in their country against the interests of England, but that under a quirk or quibble of law we were at liberty practically and in fact to carry out our wishes as regard to the enlistment of men in the United States to fight against Russia—was really so monstrous, unreasonable, and unjust that no man of honest feeling or common sense would listen to it for a moment. Unfortunately, we soon began to take new views on the question of neutrality, and, construing right and wrong after a peculiar fashion of our own, insisted also on others construing them in the same way. The Foreign Enlistment Bill passed both Houses of Parliament; not, however, because it was deemed an unexceptional measure, but because the Legislature, having intrusted the Government with the conduct of the war, could not, without relieving them from their responsibility, refuse them the means which they asserted to be essential for its successful prosecution. The Bill, however, did not pass through either House without many explanations, or without assurances—not, indeed, contained in its provisions, but as solemnly binding as any understanding come to between the Legislature and the Government possibly could be. The Duke of Newcastle having been asked in the other House into what countries it was proposed to introduce the system of enlistment, replied that he could give no answer until the Governments of different nations had been consulted. That, in his opinion, must be taken as an indication that the Duke of Newcastle had no idea of enlisting in other countries without the consent of their Governments; and he believed that noble Duke incapable of giving such an intimation with a covert intention to violate its purport and spirit. It was for the noble duke's colleagues to say whether or not he (Mr. Moore) had rightly interpreted his meaning and views on the matter. The measure having, however, become law, the next question was, how was it to be put into operation consistently with the neutrality laws of other nations, and in conformity with the engagement into which our Government had entered with Parliament? A letter was sent from the Foreign Office to Sir Gaspard le Marchant, the Governor of Nova Scotia, suggesting that he should make certain inquiries as to the bringing of men presenting themselves to our consuls in the United States as willing to serve Her Majesty from their places of residence in the States to that British colony. That communication was enclosed by Lord Clarendon in a despatch to Mr. Crampton, with the following significant addendum :—

"The subject is one which engages the earnest attention of Her Majesty's Government, and you will use your best endeavours to give effect to their wishes."

The first step taken in the matter by Mr. Crampton was wise and discreet; and he was strongly induced to believe that if he had had a wise and discreet chief over him our Ambassador at Washington would never have got into the trouble in which he subsequently became involved. Writing to Lord Clarendon, in answer to the despatch just mentioned, Mr. Crampton said:—

"In order that no misconception or mistake should arise in regard to this matter, which is justly regarded by Her Majesty's Government as one of primary importance, and which is, indeed, an indispensable condition to success in the objects they desire to effect, I have caused the legal opinion in regard to the bearing of the neutrality laws of the United States in this matter, of which I have the honour to enclose a copy, to be drawn up by an eminent American lawyer, in the soundness of whose views—both professional and political—I place the firmest reliance."

Mr. Crampton thus placed a very just reliance in the soundness of the views of the eminent lawyer who drew up that document; and every one who had perused it attentively must admit that more sagacious or more pregnant advice than it contained was never received. Not a single danger or disaster had since occurred of which the document did not give distinct forewarning. In his Report this eminent lawyer said, speaking of the Neutrality Act—

"By the second-section of this Act, a person enlisting himself within the United States, for foreign service, is punishable; and the person who enlists him is also punishable. This is the case of a complete enlistment within the United States; both parties to which contract are offenders. But it was apparent that if the statute stopped here, nothing would be easier than to evade its provisions. Good faith required that it should, if possible, be made to reach and prevent the mischief against which it was directed. Accordingly it is made equally an offence 'to hire or retain' any person to go beyond the limits or jurisdiction of the United States, 'with intent to be enlisted.' The offender in this case is the party hiring or retaining another to go, &c., with intent, &c.; and is complete by the fact of such hiring or retaining, whether the party so hired or retained actually go abroad and be enlisted or not. The proof thereof would ordinarily be found at hand, if found at all, and might be drawn from the other party to the contract, who could interpose no objection on the score of criminating himself, since, as to him, there is no offence except by enlistment within the United States, which the supposed case excludes. The danger of volunteer witnesses among such people would also be very great.

The opinion of this American lawyer concluded with the following comprehensive and sagacious summary of the whole matter:—

"When we consider the necessity of something like an inspection, the unavoidable coincidence of numbers of emigrants, the malice of rejected applicants, the inducements to treachery, the natural vigilance of a certain portion of the community in such a matter; and, through them, the action of the press and the police, I think the least to be apprehended is a prosecution, whatever its results; and, in that event, the connection of any official person, however indirect or faintly traced, would more than counterbalance the advantages proposed."

Was it not, then, most arrogant and monstrous to seek to inculcate the authorities of the United States, and to blame them for taking that course which Her Majesty's Government were warned by their own lawyer, it would be the duty of the United States Government to take under such circumstances? Could anything be more extraordinary than the raising of an elaborate wrangle with the United States, in support of an interpretation of the law which was not only in direct opposition to the decisions of the American Courts of Judicature, but to the opinion of the legal adviser consulted on behalf of the British Government? It appeared to him that that opinion, if it was not at once decisive as to the matter in question, ought at least to have suggested further inquiry from the shrewd and sagacious man upon whose opinion Her Majesty's Government placed so much reliance. What, however, was the effect produced by this advice upon the mind of Mr. Crampton, and what was the opinion he communicated to the authorities in Canada, and to the Foreign Secretary at home? It was this:—

"Washington, March 11, 1855.

"A copy of the instructions addressed to your Excellency by the Secretary of State for the Colonial Department has already been forwarded to me by the Earl of Clarendon, accompanied by an instruction from his Lordship to myself to use my best endeavours to give effect to the wishes of Her Majesty's Government, and with that view to communicate with your Excellency for the purpose of obtaining your co-operation in regard to such measures as may be adopted with safety and with a scrupulous respect to the provisions of the law of the United States. Thus, though not empowered by Her Majesty's Government to raise or embody in the United States troops for Her Majesty's service—for this would be obviously impracticable in view of the existing laws of the country—I feel fully authorised to use such mea-as may be within my power, and are legal, to meet the views of Her Majesty's Government."

Mr. Crampton further instructed the authorities in Canada—

"To inform such persons generally of the disposition of Her Majesty's Government to accept such properly qualified candidates as may offer themselves, to make them acquainted with the terms upon which the enlistments will be made, and with the places within the British dominions to which they may repair for the purpose of being enrolled, carefully abstaining, however, from entering into any agreement with such persons, or from doing anything which might be construed into 'retaining or hiring' any individual to emigrate for the purpose of enlisting in the British service. Any advance of money by Her Majesty's agents or others in the United States would constitute an infraction of the neutrality law."

There appears to have been a dogged determination on the part of Mr. Crampton, to pursue a particular course, despite the opinion which had been given to him by the American lawyer; and yet Lord Clarendon, with that legal opinion before him, and with a full knowledge of the resolution of Mr. Crampton to proceed upon his own interpretation of the law, said, in a despatch of the 12th of April, 1855, addressed to Mr. Crampton:—

"I entirely approve your proceedings as reported in your despatch of the 13th ult., with respect to the proposed enlistment in the Queen's service of foreigners and British subjects in the United States."

Now, accepting the interpretation which was placed upon that particular passage by Lord Clarendon himself—or by somebody else if report spoke truly—as correct, it clearly covered the whole of the proceedings subsequently taken by Mr. Crampton, and it amounted to an approval of Mr. Crampton's resolution to proceed with the enlistment, notwithstanding the advice he had received. It was, in fact, an approval of Mr. Crampton's instructions to the Government authorities in Canada to communicate to all whom it might concern in the United States the terms upon which Her Majesty's Government would receive recruits, and an approval of his interpretation of the law that an advance of money by Her Majesty's agents or others in the United States would be necessary to constitute an infraction of the neutrality law. But let the House mark what followed. At the very moment when Lord Clarendon, in answer to Mr. Crampton's despatch and enclosure, expressed this complete and comprehensive approval of that gentleman's proceedings, he was in receipt of another despatch and enclosure which he did not choose to notice in his despatch of the 12th of April. It appeared that on the 8th of April—four days before he wrote the despatch of April 12—the Earl of Clarendon received a despatch from Mr. Crampton, communicating intelligence that one Mr. Angus M'Donald had been found out in doing the very thing that Mr. Crampton had just instructed his agents to do, and which Lord Clarendon had approved. The despatch was in these terms:—

"I have the honour to enclose an extract from a letter which I have received from Mr. Consul Barclay at New York, informing me that the person whose name is at the foot of the printed handbill therein enclosed had stated to him, that that handbill had been issued by authority—that is, I presume, by the authority of Her Majesty's Government."

He (Mr. Moore) would now ask the attention of the House to the placard referred to:—

"Highly important to the unemployed!—The British Government having concluded to form a foreign legion in Nova Scotia, and to raise several regiments for duty in the provinces, offer a bounty of £6, or 30 dollars, together with the pay of 8 dollars a month, rations, good clothing, and warm quarters, to every effective man fit for military duty, from nineteen to forty years of age; to join which are invited English, Irish, Scotch, and Germans. The subscriber (with the view of assisting those who have not the means of paying their passage) hereby gives notice that he has opened a passage-office, No. 36, Pearl-street (near Broad), where he proposes to engage passages by good vessels to Halifax, leaving twice or three times a week, for the sum of 5 dollars; or, procure through-tickets by railroad leaving every morning (Sundays excepted), and arriving at St. John's, near Montreal, that evening, which passage money must be paid him or his agent by the parties, together with the small sum of 50 cents additional for commissions, on arriving at their destination in the province. It is hoped that those effective men who are now suffering and in distress will avail themselves of this rare opportunity of bettering their condition before it is too late.—ANGUS M'DONALD."

Now that placard was very strictly worded, and was confined to a statement of the terms upon which volunteers would be received in the British province of Nova Scotia, expressly stipulating that the passage-money should be paid by the parties themselves. Yet all our consuls with one accord concurred in denouncing this discreet notification. Mr. Barclay, our consul at New York, at once wrote off to Mr. Crampton the following very curt despatch:—

"The person whose name is at the foot of the enclosed printed paper informs me that it has been done by authority. I fear it will produce a ferment."

Mr. Crampton despatched to Mr. Consul Barclay the following very disingenuous avowal:—

"I have received your letter of the 21st inst., enclosing a printed handbill signed Angus M'Donald, and informing me that the said M'Donald states to you that he has issued it by the authority of Her Majesty's Government. I have to state to you that Angus M'Donald has no authority from Her Majesty's Government for the issue of the handbill in question, or for hiring or retaining any person in the United States to go beyond the limits of the same with intent to be enlisted in Her Majesty's service."

Now, they knew perfectly well that these proceedings had taken place by the authority of Sir Gaspard le Marchant, or of Mr. Crampton himself, but that gentleman stated that they had not taken place under the authority of Her Majesty's Government, which, in a certain diplomatic sense, might be perfectly true, and that Angus M'Donald had no authority "for hiring or retaining any person in the United States" to be enlisted in Her Majesty's service. The object of Mr. Crampton in communicating these facts for the information of Mr. Barclay was not at first sight very obvious, but the communication was really intended not for the information of Mr. Barclay, but for the misinformation of the American Government. Accordingly, Mr. Crampton, with a copy of this despatch wet in his hand, rushed off to the office of the Secretary of State for the United States, and threw it triumphantly before him as an explicit declaration of the views of Her Majesty's Government with regard to the notification of M'Donald, which he admitted must certainly be regarded as an infraction of the neutrality laws. It was clear that that despatch, which was laid before the American Government, and the explanations given amounted to a distinct declaration on the part of Her Majesty's Government that the notification did constitute a "hiring and retaining" under the American law, and so Mr. Marcy understood it when he declared his perfect satisfaction with the explanation of Mr. Crampton, and his resolution at once to prosecute. Now what was the proceeding which had thus been denounced by the representative of Her Majesty's Government? It was simply that of issuing a notification for the hiring and retaining of troops in the United States; but what he asked was, what was the difference between the line of conduct pursued at that state of the proceedings and that which was afterwards adopted?

Mr. G. H. Moore

It was made perfectly clear that what M'Donald found he was unable to do in the light of day, and by regularly accredited officers, he did not hesitate to attempt to do in the dark and through the agency of German mercenaries. Well, that assertion did not rest upon conjecture. It was here proved that at the very time Mr. Crampton went to the Secretary of State's office to denounce the conduct of M'Donald, our Government was issuing another handbill of a similar character, which he would be able to show had been issued under the authority of Her Majesty's Government. Mr. Buchanan, in a despatch to Lord Clarendon, dated July 6, said:—

"Attempts have been made, since the commencement of the existing war between Great Britain and Russia, to enlist soldiers for the British army within the limits of the United States, and rendezvous for this purpose have been actually opened in some of their principal cities. When intimations were thrown out that British consuls in the United States were encouraging and aiding such enlistments, Mr. Crampton, Her Britannic Majesty's Minister at Washington, exhibited to the Secretary of State a copy of a letter which he had addressed to one of these consuls, disapproving of the proceeding, and discountenancing it as a violation of the neutrality laws of the United States. After this very proper conduct on the part of Mr. Crampton it was confidently believed that these attempts to raise military forces within the territory of a neutral nation, from whatever source they may have originated, would at once have been abandoned."

He then proceeded to show that the same efforts were still used to raise recruits in the United States, though in a different form, and that the Lieutenant-Governor of Nova Scotia had had a direct agency in those attempts to violate the laws of the United States—

"This," he said, "will appear from the copy of a notification issued by that functionary, dated Halifax, on the 15th of March last, and believed to be genuine; a copy of which the undersigned has now the honour to communicate to the Earl of Clarendon."

The proclamation was dated the 15th of March, and ran as follows:—

"The Lieutenant-Governor of Nova Scotia having been empowered to embody a foreign legion, and to raise British regiments for service in the provinces or abroad, notice is hereby given that able-bodied men, between the ages of nineteen and forty on applying at the depot at Halifax will receive a bounty £6 sterling (equal to 3 dollars), and on being enrolled will receive dollars per month, with the clothing, quarters and other advantages to which British soldiers are entitled. Pensions or gratuities for distinguished services in the field will be given. No Scotian and other shipmasters who may bring into this province poor men willing to serve H Majesty will be entitled to receive the cost of a passage for each man shipped from Philadelphia, New York, or Boston."

Thus, while our authorities disavowed the placard which had been issued by M'Donald there was at the very time being issued, under the sanction of the Government, another proclamation containing all that was in the M'Donald notification, and to an equal degree infringing the law of the United States. Now what did Lord Clarendon say to that? It was to him something stupendous. The House would hardly believe that Lord Clarendon, with those two documents before him, declared that M'Donald's notification was very properly disavowed by the British authorities, but that the other proclamation was perfectly legal. He did, therefore, hope that the Government would do him the honour of taking the two proclamations and proving that which Lord Clarendon had asserted—viz., that M'Donald's was an illegal proclamation, and the one issued by Sir Gaspard Le Marchant from Nova Scotia perfectly in accordance with law. He thought it was right the House should know the precise stage of this question in the United States at the time the conversation, to which he had a little ago referred, took place. Mr. Marcy stated that—

"The scheme of enlistment did not significantly develop itself in our principal cities until the month of March. Immediately thereupon the United States' Government manifested the most decided, unequivocal, and public demonstration of averseness and resistance to it. Their attorney at New York was instructed to suppress enlistment in that city, and prosecute those engaged in it. On the 23rd of March he called upon the United States' Marshal for his assistance and co-operation, and addressed to that officer a letter containing a copy of the United States' law against foreign recruiting within their jurisdiction, stating that 'the Government is determined to execute the laws to their fullest extent.' In that letter he employed the following language:—'I wish you to use such means as may be at your command to prevent any violation of the laws of the United States, which are passed to preserve our neutrality. On the succeeding day this letter was published in the journals of the city of New York, of the widest circulation, and shortly thereafter in the Washington Union and throughout the country. Numerous arrests of persons charged with enlisting men for the British service were made in March; their examinations before the magistrates were published in the newspapers. The Halifax Journal (a paper said to be in the interest of the British Government) published the following:—'Brother Jonathan is making a great fuss about this foreign legion, and is using all kinds of proclamations to prevent the shipping of recruits, &c., threatening to arrest parties engaged. He is a very smart fellow, but Bluenose is sometimes too much for him. They would like to lay hands on Mr. Howe, but he is so slippery they cannot catch him.'"

Now he would confidently appeal to the House, whether Mr. Marcy was not justified in believing that the declaration of Mr. Crampton amounted to a distinct avowal that the British Government had no participation whatever in proceedings that were scandalizing the Union; and yet Lord Clarendon, perfectly aware of all the circumstances, expressed his complete approval of all that had been done by the Lieutenant Governor of Nova Scotia. Mr. Crampton having, as he thought, set the question right with the United States' Government, posted off in hot haste to Canada, and set on foot an extensive system of enlistment within the Union, in order to effect the same process and by the same means which he had just denounced. Hireling emissaries of all kinds were employed, and the Government issued memoranda for their guidance, to enable them to make known to persons in the United States the terms and conditions upon which recruits would be received—nay, they even furnished a cipher by which such men as Stroebel, a German of doubtful reputation, might carry on a correspondence with the representative of the Queen. Let it not be said the case rested on the authority of Stroebel. The fact did not depend on his testimony. He was willing to admit that Stroebel was a man of as bad a character as even Birch of The World, and he presumed Lord Clarendon thought him bad enough. But the matter rested on the evidence of Mr. Crampton himself, and on his own confession, tacit or expressed. Mr. Crampton admitted having furnished Stroebel with a cipher, and with having furnished him with the following memorandum for his guidance—

"It is essential to success that no assemblages of persons should take place at beerhouses, or other similar places of entertainment, for the purpose of devising measures for enlisting, and the parties should scrupulously avoid resorting to this or similar means of disseminating the desired information, inasmuch as the attention of the American authorities would not fail to be called to such proceedings."

Now, this was what Lord Clarendon called "no concealment." Why, one would suppose that these were excerpts from the intercepted correspondence of an Irish Whiteboy instead of instructions issued by the representative of Her Majesty. In the same way Mr. Crampton did not deny having furnished Stroebe! with the following :—

" You were to telegraph him by this cipher instead of the usual way?—Yes, Sir.

" What was the object in giving you this cipher?—Such ciphers were given to several officers—to Mr. Smolenski, Mr. Cartensen, and men actually engaged in the recruiting business received those ciphers.

" Was it for the purpose of avoiding detection?—It was for the purpose of avoiding detection and avoiding any difficulties with the authorities here. It was to enable me to telegraph to Mr. Crampton from every place I might visit, without the people in the telegraph offices understanding it.

" Were all the officers sent on this recruiting to telegraph to Mr. Crampton as to their proceedings, and was that cipher to be used?—Yes, Sir."

There, at any rate, was the cipher, and the House must judge whether or not it was used for the purpose of avoiding detection. They would observe that the preparation of these instructions and ciphers was contemporaneous with certain explanations in another place to which he would shortly call their attention. It was scarcely a figure of speech to say that at the very moment when Mr. Crampton was drawing up the memoranda for the use of these gentlemen with hard names and bad characters, Mr. Lumley, a chargé d'affaires, was explaining the transactions to the American Government in a way that formed one of the most discreditable chapters of this discreditable history. Mr. Marcy called upon Mr. Lumley to express the anxiety felt by the American Government at the reported cause of Mr. Crampton's absence in Canada, and Mr. Lumley wrote the following account to Lord Clarendon of the interview which then took place :—

" At an interview which I had with Mr. Marcy I told him that he had judged rightly in supposing that Mr. Crampton's visit to Canada had reference to the enlistment question; I stated that, from the first moment this question was mooted, Mr. Crampton had shown the greatest anxiety that it should in no way lead to violations of the laws of the United States; that he believed everything that could be done might be effected legally, and that he was determined, as far as lay in his power, to prevent anything like infraction or evasion of the neutrality laws of this country. Unfortunately the very stringent nature of the provisions of these laws was not generally understood, and several persons had, on their own responsibility, acted at variance with them, and it was for the purpose of fully explaining the bearings of the law and of preventing such infractions that Mr. Crampton had undertaken his journey to the British provinces."

Be it remembered at the same time that Mr. Crampton had just impressed upon the mind of Mr. Marcy that a precisely similar interpretation was put upon the American law by the two Governments, so that Mr. Marcy was led to believe by Mr. Lumley that Mr. Crampton was gone to Canada to explain the bearing of the law according to the American view, Mr. Crampton having really gone to explain it in a diametrically opposite sense, and to set on foot a conspiracy for the purpose of violating it. But Mr. Lumley went further. He said :—

" I then told Mr. Marcy that, as I thought it would interest him to see your Lordship's last instructions on the subject, I had brought them with me, and I said that I was certain a perusal of this paper would convince him of two things—first, that the view which had been taken and the opinions which had been expressed by Mr. Crampton on this subject were precisely such as Mr. Marcy might have expected from his knowledge of Mr. Crampton; and, secondly, that those opinions had been responded to by Her Majesty's Government in the same frank and honourable manner."

The despatch shown to Mr. Marcy was the one in which Lord Clarendon said—

" I entirely approve of your proceedings as reported in your despatch of the 12th ult., with respect to the proposed enlistment in the Queen's service of foreigners and British subjects in the United States."

Thus, while Mr. Marcy was led to suppose that Lord Clarendon had written to express his approval of Mr. Crampton's putting a stop to the enlistment proceedings, Lord Clarendon's real meaning was that he approved Mr. Crampton's determination to continue those proceedings. [THE ATTORNEY GENERAL: Read on.] Certainly. Lord Clarendon continued—

" The instructions which I addressed to you upon this subject, and those which were sent to the Governor of Nova Scotia, were founded upon the reports from various quarters that reached Her Majesty's Government of the desire felt by many British subjects as well as Germans in the United States to enter the Queen's service for the purpose of taking part in the war in the East; but the law of the United States with respect to enlistment, however conducted, is not only very just, but very stringent, according to the report which is enclosed in your despatch, and Her Majesty's Government would on no account run any risk of infringing this law of the United States."

Mr. Marcy expressly declared that he understood the despatch to mean that Lord Clarendon approved Mr. Crampton's resolution to stop the proceedings. Mr. Lumley, knowing what Mr. Crampton was doing at that moment, went on to say to Mr. Marcy, after showing him Lord Clarendon's despatch—

" Mr. Crampton was anxious that the United States' Government should not for a moment su pose that a project for enlisting troops for Her Majesty's service within the United States had ever been contemplated."

Now, he did not want a lawyer to draw fine distinctions upon a question of this kind; the British people, whatever might be their faults, prided themselves upon excelling all other nations in one virtue—a love of truth, and a detestation, above every other form of mendacity, of that quibbling equivocation which "lied like truth." The hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Spooner) had frequently, amid the applause of the House, rummaged among the works of Popish casuistical doctors in order to discover some strained approval of mental reservation, of the suppressio veri and the suggestio falsi; he now called upon that hon. Member to apply the same rules by which he had tested the writings of Popish casuists to the language of the Protestant representatives of the greatest people on earth, not hidden in monkish libraries, but published in the councils of the world, and expressed in that honest English which was not made for duplicity and equivocation. Was the hon. Member prepared to countenance by his vote these mental reservations, this suppressio veri, this suggestio falsi—all those forms of equivocation, to defend which would tax the casuistry and even the conscience of an Escobar? Well, there were other proofs than those he had cited of the responsibility of Lord Clarendon. It was said that the proceedings of the British officers were judicially shown to be illegal in May, yet that during May, June and July, Mr. Crampton allowed them to continue; and for that part of the transaction, at all events, he alone must be held responsible. But that was not the case. Lord Clarendon was as well aware of the proceedings of May as Mr. Crampton, but he insisted, with perverse ingenuity, upon citing a charge delivered by Judge Kane as an authority in his favour. A man might be an accomplice after the fact as well as before it. Now, what had been the conduct of Lord Clarendon in that respect? In September the trial of Hertz took place, and the statements of Stroebel and the corroborating evidence were made public. At that stage, at all events, the complicity of Mr. Crampton was known; Lord Clarendon was aware of his having gone to Canada to organise an extensive system of enlistment, of his having employed German emissaries, of his having concocted memoranda, and carried on a correspondence in cipher for the purpose of evading detection. Did Lord Clarendon even then express the slightest disapprobation of any one of those proceedings? On the contrary, the defence he set up against the accusations of the American Government covered every act attributed to Mr. Crampton. His Lordship did not confine himself to defence; he thought he was in a position to indulge in invective. Here was a specimen of the temper with which he replied to the charges of Mr. Marcy—

"Her Majesty's Government have no reason to believe that such has been the conduct of any persons in the employment of Her Majesty, and it is needless to say that any person so employed would have departed no less from the intentions of Her Majesty's Government by violating international law, or by offering an affront to the sovereignty of the United States, than by infringing the municipal laws of the Union to which Mr. Buchanan more particularly called the attention of the undersigned. Her Majesty's Government feel confident that even the extraordinary measures which have been adopted in various parts of the Union to obtain evidence against Her Majesty's servants or their agents by practices sometimes resorted to under despotic institutions, but which are disdained by all free and enlightened Governments, will fail to establish any well-founded charge against Her Majesty's servants. The British Government is fully aware of the obligations of international duties, and is no less mindful of those obligations than is the Government of the United States. The observance of those obligations ought, undoubtedly, to be reciprocal, and Her Majesty's Government do not impute to the Government of the United States that, while claiming an observance of those obligations by Great Britain, they are lax in enforcing a respect for those obligations within the Union. But as this subject has been mooted by Mr. Marcy, Her Majesty's Government cannot refrain from some few remarks respecting it. The United States profess neutrality in the present war between the Western Powers and Russia; but have no acts been done within the United States by citizens thereof which accord little with the spirit of neutrality? Have not arms and ammunition and warlike stores of various kinds been sent in large quantities from the United States for the service of Russia? Have not plots been openly avowed and conspiracies entered into without disguise or hindrance in various parts of the Union to take advantage of the war in which Great Britain is engaged, and to seize the opportunity for promoting insurrection in Her Majesty's dominions and the invasion thereof by an armed force proceeding from the United States?"

It appeared extraordinary logic to say that because the American Government sympathised with Russia they could not object to the enlistment proceedings of the English Government. The answer of the American Government to those insolent observations was as complete in substance as it was unexceptionable in tone and temper. He would not follow Lord Clarendon minutely through all the political disquisitions and legal distinctions to which he was obliged to resort for the purpose of relieving the conduct of British officers from the culpability which attached to it. They consisted, in short, of this:—The judgment of the American Government, and the judicial decisions of the American Courts of Judicature were all wrong in the interpretation of American law; and that the American Government would see by Lord Clarendon's own construction of the Statutes, with which he was good enough to furnish them, that no possible act could be committed by hiring, retaining, or enlisting, which under any circumstances constituted an infraction of the American law. Lord Clarendon's argument was this:—nothing short of a valid contract could constitute hiring or retaining; but retaining to enlist according to the British law required attestation, and that could not take place outside the British territory, and, therefore, there could be no retaining to enlist in the shape of a valid contract within the territory of the United States. That was the nature of Lord Clarendon's very peculiar argument; but his indiscretion did not stop there, for, without the slightest possible object, he proceeded to advance, on the part of the Crown, claims of the most dangerous character, which, if practically put in force, would be resisted by the Americans to the last drop of their blood, probably leading to a war, of which it would be difficult to see the termination. Lord Clarendon, à-propos des bottes, chose to tell Mr. Marcy that Her Majesty had the unquestionable right to call to her own standard such of her own subjects as, residing in a foreign country, were capable of bearing arms, and that Her Majesty would not thereby incur any risk of violating the territorial sovereignty of that country. ["Hear, hear!"] Yes, hon. Members might cry "Hear!" if they pleased, and, no doubt, according to the English law, Her Majesty had the right to the allegiance of any British-born subject; but if a war took place between this country and America, would they dare to hang a person found on board an American ship of war under the plea that he was a British subject; or if they did, were they not aware to what a result such an act would lead? He had said that he would refrain from quoting the evidence of any man whose word was suspected, but he could not allow to pass without protest the conduct of Her Majesty's Government in impugning the testimony and befouling the character of their own officers and agents, and publishing to the world that men in the British service, to whom rank was given, who were confidentially corresponded with by the servants of the Government, were men of abandoned and flagitious character. Here was Max Stroebel, a captain in the Queen's service, whom Mr. Crampton corresponded with and invited to his house when it suited his purpose, and called "Dear Mr. Stroebel," but who, as soon as he produced evidence against the British Government, was immediately discovered to be a man of abandoned character. Then a compatriot was cited to prove that Stroebel was a Russian spy. One Oscar Constant was brought forward to depose to that effect; but when he gave such a character to a British officer it was at least prudent to inquire into the character of the deponent. This Oscar Constant had been befouling Mr. Crampton as much as Stroebel; and Mr. Crampton afterwards came forward to say that he was a man of infamous character also. Now, he would ask hon. Members if such proceedings were not discreditable to British diplomacy in the United States? He thought Lord Clarendon might have known by experience the danger of such proceedings. The House could scarcely have forgotten that not long ago there was in Dublin a journal called The World, of very infamous character, with an editor of more infamous character still. That journal was employed by Lord Clarendon as the organ of his Government for months, he might say, for years. The noble Lord was in confidential communication with the editor, and paid him a large sum out of the public funds, which, however, was afterwards replaced. Lord Clarendon had protested that, being acquainted with the world in general, and the Dublin world in particular, he was unaware all the time that this editor was a man of doubtful character. But as soon as the man took a step which was exceedingly disagreeable to the Government, he was then found out to be a person of the most flagitious character. He would tell the House what was said at the trial, which took place, by an able and eloquent advocate (Mr. Keogh), since made a Judge:—

"These are the observations which appear to me to be necessary to address to you upon this most extraordinary and unprecedented case. If be unprecedented, I hope that it will also be un" followed by a parallel, for otherwise we must see the Government of this country degenerating from a machinery of high power and authority into a club of petty tricksters, having recourse to every implement, no matter how degraded—trailing their feet in every channel, no matter how disgusting—using it for a time against the most exalted and distinguished characters, and, having obtained the vile purpose which it served their object to accomplish, rushing into a court of justice, and attempting to rest their defence upon the malignity and infamy of a character which they took to their breasts, and cherished as long as they could obtain an object by it.”

He thought he could trace a certain similarity to the proceedings in the United States, for which the British Government were responsible, in the course pursued by the late Palmer, who impugned the verdict against him because the Attorney General argued and the Chief Justice charged in favour of the probability of poisoning by strychnine: therefore, Palmer thought that if he accomplished his end by other means he was perfectly innocent. The answer of the authorities to this reasoning was illogical, but conclusive—they hanged Palmer: and in like manner the United States were treated with equally cogent arguments; but they dismissed Mr. Crampton. He thought that there was no valid answer to the claim of the United States for the withdrawal of Mr. Crampton, yet their demand was responded to by evasion, trickery, and equivocation, and by a special pleading, insulting not only to the authority, but to the understanding of the American Courts of Judicature. He was of opinion that the English people could take no just exception to the course pursued by the American Government, or to the tone and temper in which they had vindicated their honour. But how had the British Government vindicated their honour? Even in their deepest disgrace Her Majesty's Government seemed to find relief in writing a letter to say they enjoyed it. The following was Lord Clarendon's language:—

“Her Majesty's Government are gratified at learning that the assurances contained in my note to you of the 30th of April, that no intention existed on the part of Her Majesty's Government to violate the laws, compromise the neutrality, or disregard the sovereignty of the United States, have been unreservedly accepted by the President, and that all cause of difference with respect to the question of enlistment has ceased to exist between the Governments of Great Britain and of the United States.”

The House would observe, however, that the explanations of Her Majesty's Government had not been unreservedly accepted by the President. Quite the contrary. The course of the American Government had been pretty much that of a man who should say to another who had struck him—“I am perfectly satisfied with your statement that you did not strike me, but as I have reason to know that your hand did, I shall take the liberty of chopping it off.” Lord Clarendon's answer went on to say:—

“If the Government of a foreign country were capriciously, and without any apparent belief that it had good ground for doing so, to break off its diplomatic relations with the Minister accredited to it by Her Majesty, Her Majesty's confidential servants, answerable for maintaining the honour and dignity of the Crown, could not hesitate as to advising Her Majesty equally to break off all diplomatic intercourse with the Minister of such Government accredited to her Court. But in the present case Her Majesty's Government are bound to accept the formal and repeated declarations of the President of his belief that these officers of Her Majesty have violated the laws of the Union, and are, on that account, unacceptable organs of communication with the Government and authorities of the United States; and Her Majesty's Government cannot deny to the Government of the United States a right similar to that which, in a parallel case, they would claim for themselves—the right, namely, of forming their own judgment as to the bearing of the laws of the Union upon transactions which have taken place within the Union.”

That was as much as though he said,—“Your imputations being accompanied by a grave offence against us we pass them over, but if you had omitted the offence and confined yourselves to the imputations, the British lion would have been roused by them.” There was another passage, however, which struck him as being still more extraordinary. It was as follows:—

“I have, therefore, the honour to inform you that, however deeply Her Majesty's Government regret a proceeding on the part of the President of the United States which cannot but be considered as of an unfriendly character, they have not deemed it their duty on that account to advise Her Majesty to command me to suspend my diplomatic intercourse with you; and I have to assure you that the high personal esteem which is felt for you by all the members of Her Majesty's Government will render it most agreeable to myself to have the honour of entering into communication with you upon all matters connected with the mutual relations of our two countries. You will be certain of meeting, on the part of Her Majesty's Government, the most friendly feeling towards the United States, and the most anxious desire so to arrange all questions of difference as to reconcile the just rights and real interests of the two countries with the maintenance of those amicable relations the preservation of which is of such great importance to both.”

of Lord Clarendon. Upon one occasion a gentleman, in the course of a confidential correspondence with Lord Clarendon, spoke of Sir William Somerville, the Irish Secretary, as a "deliberate liar," and upon that he received a communication from Lord Clarendon's private secretary to the following effect:—

"Sir,—Having, by desire of the Lord Lieutenant, communicated to Sir William Somerville your letter in which you made use of the phrase, 'deliberate liar,' I am directed to inform you that a retraction of these words is demanded. If, therefore, you write me a line to that effect, and will send a confidential person here at 3 o'clock to-morrow, he shall receive the sum of £100, for which I am credited."

Now, Her Majesty's Government certainly had not offered £100 to the American Government, but they sent them that which Falstaff declared to be "worth a million"—they sent them their love. The genius, it appeared, which had brought forth the revelations of Birch and the last United States Blue-books, was again at work, and not a word was to be uttered, not a syllable spoken, for fear of disturbing that divine parturition. He was told that it would be injurious to the public service to call attention to such proceedings as these at a time when the Minister was engaged in negotiations with a government which he had already offended; but, on the contrary, he (Mr. Moore) maintained it was a manifest injury to the public service that Lord Clarendon should be permitted to enter into a negotiation with a Government whose foot had already been on his neck. It was not long ago—during the present Parliament—that two Ministers of zeal and fidelity had been made the scapegoats for the faults of the entire Government, and was it now to be permitted that the Earl of Clarendon should make scapegoats of the Crown, of Parliament, and of the entire people? The question which the House had to decide was a very simple one. Lord Clarendon had been engaged in a very petty intrigue, as he was fond of doing, in America; he had been found out, of course, as he always was; he had persisted in his blunder, as was his custom; but, on the present occasion, unfortunately, he had discredited, not only his own character, but his country's also. The House had to decide, therefore, whether they would approve Lord Clarendon's proceedings in this matter, and whether they would accept as their own, in the name of the English people, Lord Clarendon's responsibility and his chastisement; and in pronouncing an opinion upon that question they must remember that they would be judging, not Lord Clarendon, but themselves.

CAPTAIN BELLEW seconded the Motion.

Amendment proposed,

"To leave out from the word 'That' to the end of the Question, in order to add the words:—the conduct of Her Majesty's Government, in the differences that have arisen between them and the Government of the United States, on the question of enlistment, has not entitled them to the approbation of this House," instead thereof.

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he could not help thinking that the hon. Member for Mayo (Mr. G. H. Moore) would have exercised a sounder discretion had he yielded to the appeals which had been made to him to postpone, for the present, the discussion of the question. The significant delay which had elapsed before the Motion had found a seconder must, he (the Attorney General) apprehended, in some degree have shaken the hon. Member's confidence in the expediency of the course which he had taken. It was but on Friday last that the First Minister of the Crown had intimated that, in his opinion, this question could not be discussed consistently with a due regard to the public interest, and it had always been usual, even in times when party feeling ran highest, to treat such a statement, made at a period of public emergency, with proper consideration. The hon. Member for Inverness-shire (Mr. H. Baillie), who might be said to have a vested interest in this question, since he had given notice at an early period of the Session of his intention to call the attention of the House to it, acting in concert with those among whom he sat, had thought it proper and necessary to postpone his motion; but the hon. Member for Mayo, uninfluenced by the appeals made to him by Members representing constituencies of all others most interested in the maintenance of a good understanding with the United States, had declined to follow that example; therefore the responsibility of having provoked this discussion must rest with the hon. Gentleman. The hon. Member for Mayo told the House that the question was one which ought to be treated judicially, but had the hon. Member himself treated it judicially? It was impossible not to see that the hon.

Member was animated by no other feeling than one of personal animosity towards Lord Clarendon. [M. G. H. MOORE:—No, no!] The hon. Gentleman denies that, but he (the Attorney General) had never heard a speech which led so strongly to such a conclusion. Was it judicial, was it just, was it even common fairness, to drag into this debate allusion to a scandalous newspaper, to refer to some obscure transactions, the import and history of which not a single Member of the House was acquainted with? Was it arguing the question judicially, was it even in good taste, to compare Lord Clarendon to the malefactor who but a few days ago had paid the penalty of his crimes on the scaffold? He never remembered to have seen a notice of Motion so frequently altered as this had been. The hon. Member for Inverness-shire had modified the terms of his Motion from time to time, to suit the varying circumstances as they arose, and the hon. Member for Mayo himself had twice altered his Motion. As it stood now it was certainly a most strangely worded Motion. It did not ask the House to express its disapprobation of the conduct of the Government, but merely to declare that Her Majesty's Ministers were not entitled to the approbation of the House. That, he believed, was a new form of moving a vote of censure; but as the hon. Member meant it for a vote of censure as such it must be taken. Let it not be forgotten, however, that the responsibility for this discussion, as he had previously stated, rested with the hon. Gentleman. He (the Attorney General) had risen thus early in the debate, because it appeared to him that the question involved legal principles and considerations which it was most essential should be fixed as early as possible, and to which the hon. Gentleman did not seem to have given the attention which they deserved. The British Government was charged with having, by itself or its agents, infringed, first, international law; and, secondly, the municipal law of the United States. He joined issue with those who made this charge upon both those points; but it was necessary to see, first, what was the international law upon the subject; and, secondly, what was the municipal law. Now, the international law on this subject had been left very vague and uncertain by most publicists who had written upon it. It was very true that Vattel laid it down that by the law and polity of nations no State could recruit its forces from the subjects of another without the consent of the latter. He would not for a single moment question that proposition, although he doubted whether the authority of Vattel would be sufficient to sustain a proposition of any great importance. Notwithstanding Vattel was generally received as an authority upon such subjects, yet where he could not ground himself upon the opinion of the jurists he was neither profound nor precise. Nevertheless, he would take the proposition which he had quoted as it was laid down by this author. He (the Attorney General) admitted that one State could not enlist the subjects of another to serve in its army and navy without the acquiescence of the State of which they were the subjects. But then he must go back to another proposition, which was, that that assent or acquiescence might not only be expressed by treaty, but might be implied; as for instance, by a State permitting its subjects to enlist into the forces of another country; because, if a State gave to its subjects permission to enter the service of foreign Governments, such permission necessarily carried with it, by implication, a permission to other foreign Governments to avail themselves of the services of the persons to whom that permission had been extended. Now, that being established, it was necessary to see what the municipal law of the United States prohibited and what it permitted the subjects of the Union to do. In that law you might find the measure and extent to which the Union enforced or relaxed its rights of sovereignty over its subjects. The municipal law of America upon this subject differed most essentially from our own. The law of Great Britain claimed and enforced the most complete, absolute, and unqualified authority over its subjects. It not only prohibited them from enlisting, or others from enlisting them upon its own territories, but it prohibited them from enlisting beyond the territories of the United Kingdom; it prohibited them from serving in the military or naval forces of any other Sovereign or people, without the express consent of the Sovereign. Therefore, if a British subject were to enlist beyond the territories of Great Britain, he would be liable to the penalties of the law; and Great Britain would have reason to complain of any State which should propose to its subjects to violate the municipal law which was binding upon them. But how stood the case with regard to America? Was the law of that country equally stringent? Certainly not. The American law said to its citizens, "You shall not enlist within the territories of the United States." It said to other persons, "You shall not enlist citizens of the United States within the territories of those States, neither shall you contract with them to go beyond the precincts of the States there to enlist;" but it did not prohibit American subjects, when once beyond the boundaries of the United States, from enlisting in the service of any foreign State or potentate, nor did it prohibit them from serving such foreign State or potentate. Now, that was a most material and important distinction, of which the hon. Gentleman had entirely lost sight. [Mr. G. H. MOORE: Not at all.] The hon. Gentleman intimated that he had not, but so far as he (the Attorney General) had heard, he appeared to have done so. If he had not lost sight of it, at all events, he had certainly forgotten it in his speech. The distinction undoubtedly existed; and he (the Attorney General) could not suppose that it was the result of accident. Perhaps the American law was so limited that, while the neutrality of the American territory and the responsibility of its Government should remain intact, that tendency which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli) had the other evening very happily characterised as a tendency to expansion, and which he represented as not only the natural but the legitimate policy of America, might remain unchecked. It might be that it was intended to leave the citizens of America, who were not quite so patient of control and restraint as the subjects of our own country, free to expand and to give vent to that energy of character which particularly distinguished them; but that the American law permitted the citizens of the Union, so long as they did not enlist within its territories, to serve foreign Powers was undoubted and unquestioned. The world has a grave instance and illustration of this in what was passing at the present moment. Not only did the law of America permit its citizens to engage in the service of a foreign State engaged in hostilities with another which was not at war with America, but it allowed them to enlist and take arms in support of a faction in the civil war in Kansas. The existing Government de facto of Nicaragua had been established with the aid of the arms of American citizens, who, without the sanction of their Government, except so far as it might be implied from the existing state of the law, and from what that Government had done since, had established a Government in that country, and at this moment maintained it. So far was the American Government from seeking to punish those citizens—so far was it from complaining that the State or the Government of Nicaragua, by engaging their arms, had violated the sovereign rights of America, that it actually recognised the Government which had been established and subsisted entirely by the assistance of American subjects. That being the state of the law, he would briefly state the facts to which it was to be applied. One fact which ought never to be lost sight of was, that it was never intended in this scheme of recruiting to enlist American subjects properly so called. At the time when the Foreign Enlistment Act was passed there were in the United States large bodies of persons who were anxious for military service. They were of two classes—British subjects who had emigrated to America, and who, being disappointed in their expectations, were anxious to return to their own country, and a vast number of political refugees whom the revolutionary movements of 1848, and, above all, the counter-revolutionary movements, had driven into exile, together with other foreigners who had served in the Schleswig-Holstein army, and who, on the disbandment of that army, had found refuge in America. With regard to the first class of persons, it was quite clear that, if they desired to enter the British service, so long as we did not violate the law of America, no man could say that we had not a perfect right to enlist them. The law of England was that no British subject could throw off the allegiance which he owed to the Government of England. His country or his allegiance he could not put off. A principal maxim of law was "Nemo potest exuere patriam." A man might expatriate himself, he might change his atmosphere, he might stand on another soil, and look at another heaven, but he could not put off his allegiance. Therefore, if you had, as was the case at this time, offers from British subjects who had not found in America the home which they had expected, who had not put off that attachment to their native land, which he believed a British-born man could no more put off than the law would allow him to put off his allegiance, and who, when they heard that the old country was at war and needed the services of her sons, naturally felt an inclination to enter into her army, you could, without violation of the municipal law of the United States, take them into your service, and there could be no consideration, moral, social, or political, which could interfere with your doing so. The other body of men, the refugees, were not American subjects, in the proper sense of the term. They had taken refuge in America, but did not desire to remain there. They had fallen upon a period when there was great distress in that country. At the conclusion of the year 1854 trade and commerce were in a state of universal stagnation, employment was scarce, wages were low, and provisions dear. Those men could not find employment; they had been used to the army, and preferred military service to any other occupation: they, therefore, proposed—and proposed in considerable numbers—to take service in the army of this country. The whole question was this:—Could we, consistently with the laws of the United States, take those persons into our service? If we violated the laws of the United States, we were responsible; but, considering that the laws of the Union allow persons who owe allegiance to it to take foreign service beyond its boundaries, he said that there was nothing in the law of nations which prohibited us from receiving those persons into our service. We assuredly were not bound to carry the obligations of American citizens one whit beyond that which their own laws imposed. We were entitled to take that as the measure of the extent to which the American Government desired to carry its sovereign rights. We had a right to look at the municipal law; and if it did not forbid the enlistment, we were justified in proceeding with it. But, then, it was said that we had violated the law by enlisting men for the service of Great Britain upon American soil. He thought he could show that this had never been done by those for whom the British Government were responsible. He would take that opportunity of calling the attention of the House to the original instructions sent out by Her Majesty's Government. Those instructions were sent out on the 16th of February, 1855, while Mr. Sidney Herbert was at the Colonial Office, and were to be found in the following despatch from Mr. Sidney Herbert

to Sir Gaspard le Marchant, Governor of Nova Scotia:—

“ I transmit to you a copy of the Foreign Enlistment Act, which has been passed in Parliament in the present Session; and, in connexion with it, am anxious to call your immediate attention to the following subject:—Her Majesty's Government have received communications from the British Minister at Washington, and also from some of the Consuls in American cities, which lead them to suppose that a considerable number of German and other European foreigners, now resident in the United States, are ready and disposed to enlist under the provisions of this Act. In particular, it has been stated that there are, scattered in different parts of the Union, men who have seen service with the Schleswig-Holstein army, and who have, therefore, the advantage of a certain amount of military training, and who would willingly take up arms again under the British standard. But supposing these statements to be well founded, the men in question could not be enlisted for British service on American soil with due respect to the laws of the United States as a neutral Power; and considering how uncertain it is whether parties who might thus offer themselves would turn out fit for enlistment, it is scarcely practicable to invite them over to this country with the chance of rejection. Under these circumstances, it has occurred to Her Majesty's Government that it might be possible for men who should represent themselves to the Consuls, or other British authorities, in the United States, as willing to serve, to proceed to Halifax, if a depôt, of which public notice would be given, in Nova Scotia, could be established in that city, under your inspection, for the reception of recruits for a foreign legion, where they might be examined, and, if found fit for service, enlisted, and either sent to this country or formed on the spot into a battalion. It is also stated that a large number of persons in the United States, who are British subjects, would be willing to take service in the British army if an opportunity were afforded them of enlisting. It would be necessary to keep the latter class of recruits (if such should offer themselves) quite distinct from foreigners, and they might, perhaps, be willing to enlist for existing regiments of the line.”

Those were the first instructions sent out to the official personages connected with this country in the United States, and without troubling the House with the various despatches from the Colonial Office and the Foreign Office, he would assert that in every one of those despatches the most distinct and emphatic instructions were to be found to take the utmost care and caution not to infringe the municipal law of that country. Now he would ask what was the view of the Americans upon their own law and their own rights? The hon. Gentleman had put the question as if the fact of a depôt having been formed at Halifax for the reception of recruits had never been brought to the knowledge of Mr. Marcy.

Now, he did think that the hon. Gentleman, acting in a judicial character, as he intimated to the House it was his intention to do, ought to have stated the whole case. There was the positive statement of Mr. Crampton in two despatches, that he had communicated distinctly and clearly to Mr. Marcy the fact that a depôt had been established in Nova Scotia for receiving recruits from the United States, nor had this fact ever been denied by Mr. Marcy or any one else. In his despatch, dated Feb. 22, to Lord Clarendon, Mr. Crampton said:—

“ I told him (Mr. Marcy) that I utterly opposed and discountenanced any violation of the neutrality law. I also told him that numerous applications were made to me by persons here wishing to join our army, and that my answer had been, that I could not enlist them here, and that if they wanted to become British soldiers they must go to British territory to be enlisted. He made no sort of objection to this, and entered into no discussion as to its being inconsistent with international law; on the contrary, he said that anybody might go who chose—that half the United States might go if they chose, were, I think, his very words; and he repeated the same thing to Mr. Lumley during my absence. I certainly, never dreaming then, as I do not believe now, that any violation of international law was involved, so long as the municipal law was observed, did not enter into any discussion of such a question with him. He did not show the least inclination to enter on the subject of the recruitment at all; and I thought that I understood his motive to be the natural one, that having, on the one hand, shown a determination to sustain the law, and, on the other, a disposition to leave every citizen or resident of the United States free to exercise their undoubted right, or not, as they chose, he did not wish to seem to take part, either one way or the other, in either recommending or discouraging them from doing so in favour of either of the belligerents.”

That statement was borne out by Mr. Lumley, who repeated the same thing to Mr. Marcy, while Mr. Crampton was absent in Canada. The hon. Member had spoken of Mr. Crampton and Mr. Lumley as two mean, dishonourable, and miserable culprits, to whose statements not one tittle of credence was to be attached. Now, he certainly did not think that that was a fair view of the conduct and character of those gentlemen; and when he found both those gentlemen asserting that they had distinctly brought to the attention of Mr. Marcy the fact that the British Government had established a depôt at Halifax for receiving men for enlistment, he gave implicit belief to that statement. [Mr. GLADSTONE: Where does Mr. Crampton state that?] That was in page 172; but Mr. Crampton stated the same thing in his despatch dated March 3, 1856, where he said—

“ I told Mr. Marcy, on the 22nd of March, that numerous applications had been made to me by persons in this country who wished to join the British army, and that my answer had been, that I could not enlist them here, or hire, or retain them here, without violating the law, and that, consequently, they must go into British territory, there to be enlisted. Mr. Marcy made no objection to this, but remarked that any person might go who chose, and then reiterated the expression he had just before used, of his intention strictly to enforce the Neutrality Law. To this I, on my part, had no objection to make; on the contrary, the view it disclosed entirely agreed with that I had myself submitted to Mr. Marcy on showing him a letter I had written to Mr. Barclay disapproving of the proceedings of a Mr. Angus M'Donald, because I thought that those proceedings would, or might, be taken to constitute a violation of the Act of 1818.”

Now, it was clear that, unless Mr. Crampton had so far forgotten his honour and truth as to fabricate that statement, Mr. Marcy, on the 22nd of March, 1855, was made fully aware of the mode in which the British Government were carrying out the Enlistment Act.

MR. MILNER GIBSON: Mr. Crampton says the reverse. He says, in the very same despatch—

“ It is perfectly true that I did not enter into any details of the means which were to be adopted by Her Majesty's Government to render available the services of those who tendered them to us in such numbers.”

MR. GLADSTONE: Where did you find any statement of Mr. Crampton to that effect?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he had already read two despatches to that effect; and the despatch of the 7th November contained the same statement in substance, if not in words. The substance of his communication to Mr. Marcy was, that he had had various offers from persons who were desirous of entering into the British service, that he had told them they could not be enlisted there, but that the British Government had opened an office or a place at Halifax, where those persons were to go from all places of the United States. Well, that being the state of things, upon what ground did the American Government make their complaint against the British Government for having infringed their laws? They did not deny anywhere that the state of the American law was as it had been represented—namely, that, although no one could be enlisted on the soil of the United States, there was nothing to prevent the American citizen from going beyond the boundary to another country to enlist there. No one denied that; but the American Government said the British Government had violated their "sovereign rights" by attempting to enlist their subjects at all. The answer of the British Government was, that they were not infringing or violating the sovereign rights of the United States if they availed themselves of the permission which the law of the United States gave. There was nothing in that law which prevented an American citizen from going to another country for the purpose of serving a foreign State. If that were permitted to the United States' subject, who was thus released from his obligation to give an unqualified and entire allegiance to his country, it could not be matter of complaint against the British Government that they were willing to accept the services which the subjects of the United States' Government were willing to render. The doctrine of sovereign rights could not certainly apply where the British Government had to do exclusively with British subjects, over whom they had rights which had the force of law; and it would hardly apply to persons who were the subjects of other States, and not of America, who were only temporarily in America, and did not intend to make it their permanent place of abode—who had not taken root in the soil, and only made it their temporary place of asylum, with the intention of returning to Europe. If the permission to go to the territory of another Power to enlist were allowed to American citizens, à fortiori, it must be allowed to the quasi subjects of other States and to British subjects; and, therefore, the British Government were entitled to take those persons and enlist them if they were willing. But it was said the British Government were not content with enlisting them beyond the boundaries of the United States, but that they violated the law by enlisting, or rather engaging them to enlist, in that territory. Now, upon what testimony did that assertion rest? It was denied in the most emphatic and indignant terms by Mr. Crampton and the British consuls. What was the evidence upon which the American Government persisted in saying that, although Mr. Crampton denied his complicity, he was involved in these transactions? It rested upon the evidence given on the trial of Hertz. Was that evidence worthy to be believed—was it evidence to which that

House would attach the slightest importance, confronted as it was by the positive statement of Mr. Crampton and the consuls, on their words of honour, that it was a tissue of falsehood and misrepresentation? The trial was a very remarkable one, and he approached it with a sense of the difficulty in which he found himself placed, because it was almost impossible to speak of it in those terms of moderation which the present state of affairs required. That that trial was set on foot and was conducted by men bitterly hostile in spirit to this country no one could doubt. He did not for a single moment wish to infer that those were the sentiments of the whole American authorities, and he entirely believed they were not the sentiments of the great body of the American people. That that trial was conducted in a spirit of most bitter animosity towards England, no one could doubt. Mr. Van Dyke, the United States' District Attorney, acting under the immediate direction of Mr. Cushing, the United States' Attorney General, opened the case rather as a case against Great Britain and the British authorities than against the individuals accused, spoke in terms of the greatest disparagement of Great Britain, adverted to the war in which we were then engaged, and showed his sympathies were not with the Allies, by alluding with evident satisfaction to our losses, and in terms of sneering sarcasm and contempt to our presumed deficiency in military skill. Witnesses were produced, and who were they? They were the Mr. or Captain Stroebel, whom the hon. Member (Mr. G. H. Moore) did not doubt to be a man of the most infamous character, others of very much the same stamp were examined to fill up the minuter details of the alleged transactions, and Mr. Hertz, who, being convicted, made a confession and implicated Mr. Crampton. The statements of a man who was an approver, and of another man who had just been convicted, both of whom the American Government would have found, if they had taken the slightest trouble to inquire, to be men of infamous character, were taken as true, notwithstanding the strong and emphatic denial of Mr. Crampton and the other gentlemen affected by those statements. Nay, more, the American Government sent here, not an authentic report of the trial, but the report which was prepared for a newspaper—The Pennsylvanian—remarkable for its bitter animosity against this country, the editor of which was examined on the trial, and was attempted to be foisted as a juryman upon the panel. There was not the slightest chance of the jury finding any other than a verdict against Hertz. It was an indictment against, and, by implication, a conviction of, the British Government; and this gentleman, who was witness upon the trial, whose report was sent by the American Government as a report of the trial, did not scruple to speak of Great Britain in the following terms. They are somewhat amusing:—

“England for centuries has been bullying and bribing the world; her insolence is astounding. In the Pacific, in the Atlantic, on the Isthmus, everywhere, that haggard voluptuary, Great Britain, who has been so long drunk with the blood of other nations that she now reels and totters with her own inanity, glares upon us with her red eyeballs, and puts us at defiance.”

Those were the terms with which the editor of The Pennsylvanian introduced to the world a report of the trial on which he himself had been a witness, and which was adopted by the American Government. [“Hear, hear!”] He heard a right hon. Gentleman say “Hear” on the other side, but he thanked God the British press was not yet lowered to such wretched ribaldry as that, and he hoped it never would be. The hon. Member for Mayo seemed inclined to give implicit credit to the witnesses. [Mr. G. H. MOORE: What? I? I deny it.] Then, to cast imputations upon the honour, veracity, and character of the gentlemen whom the hon. Gentleman impugned, without evidence, was totally unwarrantable and totally unjustifiable. The case made by the American Government was based upon the statements of these persons. It turned out that Mr. Stroebel was a person of bad character; he had served in the Danish army; he had held some rank in that army; he volunteered to perform service in the English army; he proposed to raise men; he said many of his countrymen were ready at once to follow him. Then came Hertz, who said the same. Both expressed the greatest interest in the cause of the Allies, and the utmost zeal for the service of England, and expressed the utmost anxiety to return to Europe. There was abundant evidence now that Stroebel was a spy in the employ of Russia, and that Hertz was a swindler and a man of no character. But those facts were not in the possession of the British authorities in America when those persons offered their services. It might be true,

so far as their statements were concerned, that they violated the municipal law of the United States. In their anxiety to get men and establish a claim to be rewarded for their zeal and assiduity, they might possibly have transgressed the law of the United States. Whether they did so with the honest purpose of serving the British Government, or whether they were preparing schemes of treachery and fraud in the interest of Russia, or of those who were hostile to Great Britain, was a grave question, which he would not stay to discuss; but when, in answer to the statements of such men as those, he had the positive assertion of Mr. Crampton and the British Consuls that those statements were wholly and entirely destitute of the slightest shadow of foundation upon truth, he asked the House whether they thought that, under those circumstances, the British Government would have been justified in making scapegoats of Mr. Crampton and the consuls by recalling them, and marking them with the stigma of Government disapprobation? He thought no one would go along with the hon. Member for Mayo in believing that, in spite of their instructions, those gentlemen did violate the municipal law by causing enlistments, or engagements to enlist, on the territory of the United States; and he submitted that the British Government, in accordance with the instructions which were framed, were justified in accepting the services of their own subjects, and of Germans, Poles, Hungarians, or Italians, if they accepted those services by enlisting them beyond the precincts of the United States. There was no evidence that any acts were done in contravention of the local laws of the United States, except the evidence of those men, who could not be believed; and against it they had the positive denial of gentlemen, men of honour, and Englishmen. It was all very well for the hon. Gentleman, who wanted to make out a case, if he could, against those parties, to take up the despatches, and, instead of reading them in a manly, straightforward manner, read them with a sneering, sarcastic tone, meant to imply that he did not believe a word of them, but in that view he was sure the House would not follow the hon. Gentleman. He submitted that the question was, whether Her Majesty's Government would have been justified in acting merely upon the view taken by the American Government on the evidence of Hertz and Stroebel, in spite of the emphatic denial of Mr. Cramp-

tion and the consuls. Eliminated from the mass of verbosity with which, from one side or the other, it had been entangled, that was really the case which was brought before the attention of the House. He had cautiously abstained from saying one word upon the conduct of the American Government except as regarded that trial. At the same time he might say, without any intention of giving offence, that the spirit and the tone in which the American authorities had considered the correspondence which had taken place, and considered and answered the despatches of Lord Clarendon upon the subject (especially when the attempts of Lord Clarendon were always of a most conciliatory character), were not such as might have been expected from a State which desired, with sincerity, to maintain friendly relations with England. Whether their conduct was to be attributed to that cause to which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli) adverted the other evening—a conviction on the part of the United States that Great Britain would not view with favour or submit unhesitatingly to that expansive tendency which was said to characterise the territorial policy of the American Government, was more than he could undertake to say; but of this he was persuaded, that any permanent rupture of the friendly relations between the two countries would be fatal to the best interests of both, and deeply injurious to the cause of progressive improvement throughout the whole civilised world. It became us as the older, as not the least powerful, and looking to what was going on in various parts of America, he thought he might also add, as not the least united of the two nations, to evince a spirit of manly moderation and dignified forbearance. We were never better prepared for war, and therefore ought to be the more inclined to peace. Our power had now been proved. Our renown was not of yesterday; our glory was not of recent date; our prowess had been established by sea and by land in every quarter of the universe. We could afford to be conciliatory ourselves, and to exhort others to conciliation. Nor was it possible to misinterpret the motive with which we might address the American people in these persuasive accents:—

Tuque prior, tu parce, genus qui duois Olympo;
Projice tela manu, sanguis meus."*

It was in that spirit of harmony that the Government now entered on the present discussion. There was no denying that its tendency was to take at a disadvantage both the Ministry and those absent men whose honour and veracity had been impugned, but who did not enjoy the opportunity of defending themselves. Remembering that, though this attack was directed against Her Majesty's Government, the interests of those persons were deeply implicated—nor theirs alone, but what was of far greater moment, those also of two mighty nations, it was to be hoped that the House would view this question without reference to party considerations, and in a calm dispassionate spirit, suitable to its dignity, its gravity, and its importance.

SIR FREDERIC THESIGER said, that although the House was naturally impatient of any debate likely to degenerate into a legal discussion, yet he felt it his duty to offer some remarks on the legal considerations which his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General had stated to be involved in this interesting and most important question. With respect to the Motion itself, he did not think that the hon. Member for Mayo was to be censured for not having withdrawn it; for no particular facilities were offered by the occupants of the Treasury bench for bringing forward a vote of censure on the Government; and if the House were to wait until certain negotiations, never explained, but only darkly shadowed forth, had come to a conclusion, it would be in the power of the Government to prevent discussion altogether by protracting negotiations till the time was gone when discussion would have any life or interest. He fully concurred with his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General on the necessity of approaching this important question in a spirit of moderation; deprecating, therefore, the infusion of party spirit into such a debate, he admitted that their deliberations should be characterised by a calm and judicial tone, and he sincerely hoped that nothing that he might say would create irritation or embitter the relations between this country and the United States. It was essential to consider first, the position in which we stood; and, secondly, the circumstances that had compelled us to occupy that position. In the dismissal of our accredited Minister, and in the withdrawal of their authority from twelve of our consuls, we had received from the Government of the United States one of the strongest proofs of dissatisfaction that one nation could offer to another. Was that decided step on the part of the American Government to be justified or not? Was there any blame imputable to the agents of the American Government for the course they had pursued in acting in so abrupt and summary a manner? If so, our path was clear and open; for, as Lord Clarendon had remarked, no discredit could attach to the acknowledgment of unquestionable wrong. On the other hand, it was important to consider whether the conduct of the agents of the British Government had been such as not to render them obnoxious to censure. If their conduct was not fairly liable to censure, a gross and gratuitous insult had been offered to the British nation. When the Foreign Enlistment Bill was under discussion in that House, several wise and prudent persons anticipated that it would be very likely to lead us into a collision with foreign Powers, and warned the Government to that effect. During the whole of that debate, although questions were put as to the countries from whence recruits were likely to be obtained, no suggestion as to the probability of our recruiting our foreign legion from the United States was ever made. If such a suggestion had been offered, the Government would have been warned to be particularly careful in their transactions with America. That country had previously intimated that it would observe a strict neutrality during the war, and unfortunately there had arisen with the American Government circumstances of misunderstanding which would probably have rendered it wise on the part of the British Government either to abstain altogether from drawing supplies of men from that quarter, or, at all events, to proceed with the utmost caution and circumspection. In attempting to procure recruits from the United States, two circumstances should have been carefully considered—first, the municipal law of the United States; secondly, the rights which the Americans possessed under the international law. The first was a positive enactment, the latter had no written code except where treaties intervened, but was founded on justice, good faith, and mutual forbearance between nations. Under the municipal law of the United States, an Act of Congress, passed in 1818, made it a misdemeanor, punishable by fine and imprisonment, for any one to hire or retain

another to go out of the territory or jurisdiction of the United States for the purpose of being enlisted into the service of a foreign Power. Unfortunately, the Government kept its view too closely and specifically directed to the provisions of that municipal law. He (Sir F. Thesiger) thought they had regarded its provisions, not so much to see how they could obey them, as to ascertain how they could accomplish an object which was prohibited by the law without bringing themselves strictly within the letter of its provisions. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General had taken what appeared to be an extraordinary view of international law as applicable to this particular question—the one adopted by the Government, and which had been fatal to their proceedings in this matter, and one which he (Sir F. Thesiger) ventured to say was unfounded. There was no doubt, as it appeared to him, that although an individual might evade the provisions of an Act of the Legislature of the United States, and keep himself clear of the penalty attaching to an infraction of the letter of the law, yet that if a Government were systematically to endeavour to attain an object which was prohibited by law, and at the same time to keep its agents clear from falling within the provisions of that law, such conduct was contrary to that good faith and forbearance which should characterise the intercourse between nations. Unfortunately, however, the view which had been submitted to the House by the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General was that upon which Mr. Crampton had acted, and which had been endorsed by Lord Clarendon. At page 176 of the Blue-book Mr. Crampton would be found writing:—

“It did not appear to me to be a thing to be supposed, that any free nation intended to enforce, as a restraint upon the liberty of its inhabitants, any more of the general law of nations than it had embodied in its municipal law. That municipal law appeared to me to have been enacted for the very purpose of defining and deciding how much of the general right of restraining the egress of its citizens from its territory the lawgiver intended to enforce.”

“Now, in reply to this, the undersigned begs to observe, that the policy of a nation in regard to its internal arrangements must be sought for in the laws of that nation; that what those laws forbid, it must be understood to be the policy of the State to prohibit; and that what those laws do not forbid, it must be understood to be the policy of the State to allow. In every State, whatever may be its form of Government, there is a sovereign power; that sovereign power may impose upon the subjects or citizens of such State what duties, obligations, and restrictions it may think fit; and it is a necessary conclusion that when the sovereign power puts a limit to its enactments, whether of obligation or of prohibition, it means to leave its subjects or citizens free in regard to all matters not within the enactments of the law."

Now, with very great deference to such high authorities, he (Sir F. Thesiger) must say there was great confusion of ideas in such reasoning broached in the manner it had been. The municipal law was intended for the internal regulation of a country, and applied merely to the subjects of the country. It could not attach to any foreign State, nor to any person not a subject of that particular country, and, therefore, although it might bind or give freedom to the citizens of that State, it could have no effect or influence over international law or the intercourse between nations. For instance, there was no doubt that Americans had an undoubted right freely and voluntarily to quit their country; that opinion had been laid down by Judge Ingersoll, but that fact did not touch the question of international law. If a Government were to lend itself to plans for seducing or enticing persons to leave the United States, then the municipal law might not be violated in terms, but there would be a breach of international law, and there could be no doubt that it would be a violation of that frank intercourse which ought to subsist between nations. Supposing for instance the Americans had established a manufacture in their country which was of great public advantage, no doubt all the manufacturers in a body could, if they pleased, quit the United States and transplant their skill to another soil; but could it be said, because they had a right voluntarily to quit their country, that therefore another Government, if it should think it advantageous to do so, should attract such persons to its country—would it not commit a breach of international law if it held out inducements in the way of higher prices for labour? [Mr. CHRETHAM: It is done every day.] It might be done every day, but nevertheless he considered it a gross violation of international law, and contrary to the spirit of justice and good faith which should prevail in the intercourse of nations. He therefore could not agree with the hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General in the opinion that, because the municipal law of the United States permitted persons to leave that country, even to enlist in the service of other countries, therefore it would be no infraction of the sovereign rights of the American nation for another Government to entice and persuade persons to leave the country for the purpose of enlisting in a foreign legion. It was that mistaken view of international law which had led to those proceedings which were, as he considered, justly blamable, and which had brought this country into a position of humiliation—a consequence attributable entirely to the course pursued by Her Majesty's Government. Taking the principles he had enunciated as a guide, he would just notice what the Government of this country had done with respect to the question of enlistments in America. There was, undoubtedly, great difficulty in tracing precisely in the Blue-book what acts were done by those who were the recognised and authorised agents of the British Government. There was abundant information as to the acts of the unauthorised and unaccredited agents, but there were also occasional glimpses of light, showing what was done by those who were clothed with authority, and sufficient to show that they were pursuing a system that was highly reprehensible. There were some facts which could not be disputed. There was no doubt that there was a recognised system organised within the territory of the United States for the purpose of obtaining men to leave those States and to proceed to Canada prior to coming to this country. There were agents employed, money was forthcoming, and a depôt was established at Halifax with the sanction of the Lieutenant Governor. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General had expressed himself strongly, perhaps justifiably so, in regard to the course adopted at the trial of the parties who were accused of violating the neutrality laws. It was not his (Sir F. Thesiger's) intention to vindicate the character of Mr. Hertz or of Captain Stroebel, neither did he assume that the evidence given by those persons at the trial was perfectly correct; but there was other evidence. There was the admission under Mr. Crampton's own hand, that he employed those two persons as his agents to assist him in procuring enlistments; there were the instructions given to them among other agents, and there was the cipher prepared, with which they,

in common with other agents, were made acquainted. Such being the persons employed, and such the machinery set in action to obtain the object which Her Majesty's Government had in view, he would next see if he could trace in those proceedings any indication of a conviction on the part of the Government that what was being done was perfectly lawful, and that the machinery employed was not such as to afford the American Government any just ground of complaint. It appeared that at a very early period of the business, before the system had come into operation, Mr. Crampton prudently took the advice of a very able lawyer in order to ascertain how far the neutrality laws would affect the proceedings which it was proposed to institute for the purpose of procuring recruits from that country. Anything more strongly worded for the purpose of inducing caution on the part of our Minister than this legal opinion could hardly be imagined; and the House should bear in mind that this document, together with his letter to Sir Gaspard le Marchant, was sent by Mr. Crampton in his despatch of the 12th of March to Lord Clarendon; and that our Foreign Secretary was in possession of both when he wrote his letter of approval on the 12th of April. In his letter to Sir Gaspard le Marchant Mr. Crampton said—

"I have furnished your agent with a copy of this opinion for his information and guidance, and I have directed him to confine his operations in the first instance to making inquiries as to the desire which may exist among the inhabitants of the eastern cities of the United States to enter Her Majesty's service, to inform such persons generally of the disposition of Her Majesty's Government to accept such properly qualified candidates as may offer themselves, to make them acquainted with the terms upon which the enlistments will be made, and with the places within the British dominions to which they may repair for the purpose of being enrolled, carefully abstaining, however, from entering into any agreement with such persons, or from doing anything which might be construed into 'retaining or hiring' any individual to emigrate for the purpose of enlisting in the British service."

Lord Clarendon, having been informed of the course intended to be adopted, wrote to Mr. Crampton on the 12th of April:—

"I entirely approve your proceedings, as reported in your dispatch of the 12th ult. with respect to the proposed enlistment in the Queen's service of foreign and British subjects in the United States."

Considering that Lord Clarendon was cognisant of the opinion of the eminent American lawyer, clearly indicating that the

neutrality law of the United States "would be held to reach every case of payment, expenditure, or other valuable consideration, however ingeniously devised," he would have acted a far wiser part had he wholly abstained from the attempt to procure men in the United States, and warned his Minister that, the course he proposed to pursue not being open, candid, or straightforward, but secret and underhand, Her Majesty's Government did not feel themselves justified in sanctioning such a proceeding. The Earl of Clarendon, indeed, alleged that he enjoined on Mr. Crampton above all things to avoid concealment from the American Government; but he (Sir F. Thesiger), having looked carefully through the correspondence without discovering any trace of such an injunction, would feel obliged to any hon. Member following him in debate who should point out the despatch in which it was contained. If, however, any such instruction was given, it was certainly not observed by Mr. Crampton. Lord Clarendon was, at all events, informed at a later period of the secret steps taken to procure recruits, and the fatal mistake made by our Government throughout the transactions was, that the directions which they issued to their agents were confined to the avoidance of any infringement of the municipal law, and entirely overlooked the broader question on which the Americans were likely to feel extremely sensitive, namely, the bearing of our attempts at enlistment upon their rights of sovereignty. At an early period, and before the system was in full operation, Mr. Angus M'Donald published advertisements, and established an office for the purpose of providing passages to Halifax to persons willing to go thither and enlist themselves. It was said that the American Government were from the earliest date aware of the formation of a dépôt at Halifax, and of the measures taken to secure recruits; but there was evidently some misapprehension on that point. No communication had been made to the American Government that could lead them to believe that such proceedings as those described in Mr. Crampton's letter were either contemplated or in progress. On the 22nd of March Mr. Crampton wrote to Consul Barclay to disavow the conduct of Mr. M'Donald—conduct which Consul Barclay had previously characterised as likely "to produce a ferment," and such as would cause the Government of the United States to interfere and put a stop to the proceedings. It was very remarkable that, in the course of the conversation in which Mr. Crampton told Mr. Marcy that persons had applied to him relative to enlistment for the foreign legion, but that he had told them the thing could not be done without infringing the law, unless they first left the States and afterwards enrolled themselves, Mr. Crampton showed Mr. Marcy his letter to Consul Barclay in reference to Mr. M'Donald's proceedings; and that Mr. Marcy, on his part, declared in his subsequent despatches that he understood Mr. Crampton, when he communicated the contents of this letter to him, to have intended to disavow the participation of the British Government in any improper acts of recruiting. Mr. Marcy, ignorant of the underhand scheme in progress at the time, might very well have answered, as he was represented to have done, that persons were at liberty to quit the States for the purpose of being enlisted. The House ought carefully to consider the steps that were taken at an early period, because they showed that the course adopted by our Minister and sanctioned by his Government was perfectly unjustifiable, and had brought on us all the indignity and humiliation to which we had been since exposed. Mr. Grant, writing to Mr. Crampton, in February, 1855, said—

"My influence in this State enables me to raise within ten days (and in secret) a regiment of rifles, comprising the ordinary number (486), the majority of whom are born subjects of Great Britain, and who are only waiting the moment when they may be allowed to show that they, although living in a foreign country, are not insensible of the claim that their native country has on them. The men are ready, but what is wanted is proper sanction being (secretly) given to their proceedings. Throughout the whole of this enterprise we have borne strictly in mind the necessity there exists of not infringing the neutrality laws of the United States, and the men would depart in squads at their own expense, ostensibly travelling as citizens of the United States on their own account to Canada."

Another letter from Major Rakow stated—

"To avoid any interference by the United States' authorities, the soldiers are to be shipped as passengers to some port, and there to be put on rank and file."

The answer sent by Mr. Crampton to these offers of enlistment was somewhat singular. It was this :—

"Sir,—I have received your letter of the —, and I regret to say that I am not in possession of the information with which you desire to be furnished. I have received no instructions from Her Majesty's Government which would authorise me to take steps for the enlistment of men or the engagement of officers for the British army."

There were other letters from a Mr. Jones and a Mr. Reynolds, the replies to which were important. On the 23rd of March, 1855, Mr. Crampton wrote to Mr. Jones as follows :—

"I have received your letter of the 22nd, and I have to inform you in reply that, although I have no reason to doubt that Her Majesty's Government would accept of the service of such foreigners as may be desirous of joining it, no rendezvous for enlistment has been opened by the authority of Her Majesty's Government at any place in the United States, nor has any person been authorised to hire or retain any individual to go beyond the limits of the United States for the purpose of being so enlisted. This would constitute an infraction of the neutrality laws of the United States (vide Act of Congress, 1818, s. 2), and Her Majesty's Government, however desirous to obtain recruits for the British army, are still more anxious that the laws of the States, with which Her Majesty is at peace, should be respected.

"Should you desire information as to the terms, &c. upon which foreigners may be enrolled under the provisions of a late Act of Parliament, I shall have pleasure in furnishing you with such information as is in my possession at any time you should call at Her Majesty's Legation in this city."

A similar answer was sent to Captain Zankish, and would be found in page 189. The letter of Lord Clarendon, of the 12th of April, approving the proceedings with regard to enlistment, arrived in the United States about a fortnight afterwards, and a very important correspondence then took place between Mr. Crampton, Mr. Lumley, and a Mr. Martin, to which he wished to call the attention of the House. Mr. Martin, in a letter dated the 26th of April, 1855, said, that circumstances which he thought purely providential at that important juncture would, he believed, enable a proper person, invested with proper authority, "to raise a force of 5,000 men and upwards of as brave and determined troops as ever marched to a battle-field under the British or any other flag on the face of the earth." Mr. Martin further said—

"I think that, for the sum of £6 to £10 per man, the number above alluded to—namely, 5,000 and upwards—can be raised or delivered in any of the West Indies or North American colonies, or even in Malta, without any additional expense to the Government."

Mr. Lumley answered—

"I am desired by Mr. Crampton to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 26th of April, and to inform you that he has no doubt that the services of all those persons whom you describe as being anxious to join the forces of Her Majesty will be gladly received, and that the feelings which actuate you will be gratefully acknowledged. At the same time, Mr. Crampton wishes me to impress upon you the very stringent and comprehensive nature of the neutrality laws of the United States, according to which it is not only illegal to enlist or recruit the subjects of any State within the United States for the service of a foreign Power, but equally an indictable offence to hire or retain any individual to emigrate for the purpose of enlisting in foreign military service against a Power with whom the United States' Government is at peace. It is essential, therefore, that nothing should be done which would be inconsistent with the supposition that the persons you refer to leave the United States as voluntary emigrants, for as such alone could they legally leave this country for a foreign State."

Mr. Martin then wrote a most remarkable letter to Mr. Crampton, in these terms:—

"I presume that you will have noted through the public papers that a person, called Captain Walsh, has been trying here for some time past to engage a number of Germans for the Foreign Legion, under the head of labourers for the St. Andrew's and Quebec Railroad, but who has not yet succeeded in getting a single man off. . . . If it should appear to you desirable to carry out this object in a safe and proper manner, it will be necessary to place matters upon such a footing as will at once enable the parties engaged in it to negotiate their drafts to meet at least a part of their unavoidable expenses, which must be very considerable, as from all the information I can obtain upon the subject from captains of British ships and others acquainted with the emigration and passenger business, it will cost at least £6 15s. to £7 10s. per man, under the best and most economical arrangement that can be devised to convey them from here to Halifax, and many of them will require assistance to get here from the interior. It would, therefore, be necessary to make at least £6 available to the party undertaking the business, leaving say £2 10s. as a contingent surplus to meet any deficit that might arise from accident or inefficiency of any portion of those sent forward, which, however, I do not apprehend, leaving £8 as the maximum amount chargeable to Government."

Mr. Martin then proposed the following form of notice, and asked whether it could be legally published:—

"The A 1 passenger ship — will sail for Halifax, on Tuesday, June 5, and will be followed by a ship of the same class on each succeeding Tuesday throughout the summer, or so long as freight and passengers will offer to justify their continuance."

Mr. Lumley's answer was—

"I have delayed replying to your letter of the 12th instant, until I could obtain the opinion of an eminent American lawyer on the subject to which it relates, and I now beg to inform you that there cannot be the slightest objection to your inserting the notice (copy of which was transmitted in your letter) in any newspaper you may think fit. I am also able to inform you that the collector at New Orleans has no legal authority to prevent ships clearing out with emigrants for Halifax, or any other part of the British dominions, even should those persons have declared their intention of enlisting on reaching British territory. Any person may, of his own free will, emigrate for the purpose of enlisting; but it is illegal to engage a person within the United States to enlist in the British army. . . . I must therefore warn you that the act of giving assistance to persons in the interior to enable them to emigrate might possibly be considered in the light of an infraction of the law. There is, however, no doubt that the captains of ships affording a free passage to such emigrants will be reimbursed for the expenses of any number of able-bodied men who may enlist on reaching Halifax."

[An hon. MEMBER: Read, read!] He (Sir F. Thesiger) was quite ready to read the next sentence. It was—

"From the enclosed extract, containing an account of a late trial at Philadelphia, you will perceive that Judge Kane has even expressed the opinion 'that the payment of the passage from this country of a man who desires to enlist in a foreign port does not come within the Act.'"

He must remind his hon. and learned Friend who had cheered that, when an application was made to Judge Kane to release Hertz, Stroebel, and others, the Judge appeared, according to the representation of Mr. Lumley, to have expressed his opinion that the payment of passage-money would not be illegal; but when Judge Kane tried Hertz and other parties he changed his opinion, and the view taken by Judge Kane at one time was therefore neutralised by his opinion at another period. With very great submission to Judge Kane or any other Judge, he (Sir F. Thesiger) would venture to say that if any person paid the passage-money of another to a foreign State, for the purpose of enlistment, that would as nearly approach "hiring and retaining" as anything he could possibly imagine, and would come not only within the spirit, but, in his belief, within the very letter of the law. He desired to call attention to these circumstances to show the secret proceedings of the parties with respect to enlistment, and he would now read to the House the instructions issued by Mr. Crampton to all the agents whom he employed:—

"It is essential to success that no assemblages of persons should take place at beer-houses or other similar places of entertainment for the purpose of devising measures for enlisting, and the parties should scrupulously avoid resorting to this or similar means of disseminating the desired information, inasmuch as the attention of the American authorities would not fail to be called to such proceedings, which would undoubtedly be regarded by them as an attempt to carry on re-recruiting for a foreign Power within the limits of the United States; and it certainly must be borne in mind that the institution of legal proceedings against any of the parties in question, even if they were to elude the penalty, would be fatal to the success of the enlistment itself."

His hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General had argued that the steps taken in the United States for the purpose of procuring recruits were perfectly legal, and that there had been no infringement of the law; but from the proceedings of the parties, and their endeavours at concealment, it was perfectly clear, they evidently thought that they were doing what they could not justify. That was, in his opinion, the strongest proof that the parties engaged in those proceedings did not adopt the view of the case which had been ingeniously pressed on their behalf—in the first instance by Mr. Crampton and Lord Clarendon, and afterwards by his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General. It had been said that Mr. Marcy was aware of all that had been going on, and that he acquiesced in the proceedings, at least by his silence. Now how did that appear? The hon. Member for Mayo had compared the proclamation of Sir Gaspard le Marchant with the proclamation of Mr. Angus M'Donald, and no answer had been given by the hon. and learned Attorney General to that part of the case. When the hon. Member for Mayo referred to those proclamations the Attorney General cheered, no doubt because he intended to insist that the proclamation of Sir Gaspard le Marchant having been issued at Halifax, and within Her Majesty's territories, was perfectly legal. He would, however, call the attention of the Attorney General to the fact that the Halifax proclamation must have found its way to the United States, for the proclamation of Mr. Angus M'Donald, which was dated five days later than the proclamation of the Lieutenant Governor of Nova Scotia, offered terms precisely similar to those proposed by Sir Gaspard le Marchant. In Mr. M'Donald's proclamation, he stated that the British Government offered "a bounty of £6, or 30 dollars, together with the pay of 8 dollars a month, rations, good clothing, and warm quarters, to every effective man fit for military duty, from nineteen to forty years of age, to join which are invited English, Irish, Scotch, and Germans." The proclamation of Sir Gaspard le Marchant stated that—legion, and to raise British regiments for service in the provinces or abroad, notice is hereby given that able-bodied men, between the ages of nineteen and forty, on applying at the depot at Halifax, will receive a bounty of £6 sterling, equal to 30 dollars, and on being enrolled will receive 8 dollars per month, with the clothing, quarters, and other advantages, to which British soldiers are entitled."

There could be no doubt, he apprehended, that the proclamation of Sir Gaspard le Marchant had found its way to the United States, and had been copied by Mr. Angus M'Donald. Now, did Mr. Marcy receive any intimation from Mr. Crampton as to the proceedings for the enlistment of troops? An attempt had been made to induce the House to suppose that Mr. Marcy was informed of these clandestine and secret modes of enticing and alluring men to leave the United States for the purpose of enlistment; but in his letter to Lord Clarendon of the 7th of May, Mr. Lumley stated that he read to Mr. Marcy a copy of Lord Clarendon's despatch of the 12th of April, and he added—

"Mr. Marcy appeared much pleased with this communication, and said that, as the question was one which had engaged the attention of the United States' Government, he should be very glad to be able to show this despatch to the Cabinet. . . . Mr. Crampton was anxious that the United States' Government should not for a moment suppose that a project for enlisting troops for Her Majesty's service within the United States had ever been contemplated."

Now he would confidently ask any candid and dispassionate person whether it was possible, after such a communication was made by Mr. Lumley, that Mr. Marcy could entertain any other idea than that the project of enlistment was entirely abandoned, and that Her Majesty's Government had no intention of procuring men from the United States? That was the state of things when, at last, the attention of the American Government was called to the proceedings upon the subject of the enlistments, and on the 6th of July, 1855, Mr. Buchanan addressed Lord Clarendon on the subject. He (Sir F. Thesiger) most earnestly invited the attention of the House to the course of that correspondence. He would not weary them with many extracts; he had with much trouble taken different passages from the letters, which would be sufficient; and if there were any portions of those letters which would qualify the passages to which he was about to refer, he should feel indebted to any hon.

Member who would point them out. On the 6th of July, 1855, Mr. Buchanan called the attention of Lord Clarendon to these proceedings. He said :—

“ The disclosures made within the very last month, upon a judicial investigation at Boston (a report of which is now before the undersigned), afford good reason to believe that an extensive plan has been organised by British functionaries and agents, and is now in successful operation in different parts of the Union, to furnish recruits for the British army. The plain and imperative duties of neutrality, under the law of nations, require that a neutral nation shall not suffer its territory to become the theatre on which one of the belligerents might raise armies to wage war against the other. If such a permission were granted, the partiality which this would manifest in favour of one belligerent to the prejudice of the other could not fail to produce just complaints on the part of the injured belligerent, and might eventually involve the neutral as a party in the war.”

And, then, in conclusion, he said—

“ In view of all these considerations, the President has instructed the undersigned to ascertain from the Earl of Clarendon how far persons in official station under the British Government have acted, whether with or without its approbation, either in enlisting persons within the United States, or engaging them to proceed thence to the British provinces, for the purpose of being there enlisted; and what measures, if any, have been taken to restrain their unjustifiable conduct ?”

That was the distinct and specific demand on the part of Mr. Buchanan. How, he would ask, was it met by Lord Clarendon, in his letter of the 16th of July, 1855?—

“ The undersigned, &c., has the honour to acknowledge the receipt of the note which Mr. Buchanan, &c., addressed to him on the 6th inst., respecting attempts stated to have been recently made to enlist within the limits of the United States soldiers for the British army. The undersigned must, in the first instance, express the regret of Her Majesty's Government if the law of the United States has been in any way infringed by persons acting with or without any authority from them; and it is hardly necessary for the undersigned to assure Mr. Buchanan that any such infringement of the law of the United States is entirely contrary to the wishes and to the positive instructions of Her Majesty's Government.”

The House would, probably, allow him to point out this fact—that although it had been unqualifiedly asserted by Lord Clarendon that he had made the most frank expression of regret on the part of the British Government for any violation of the American law, yet he (Sir F. Thesiger) believed he was right in saying that the only passage to which Lord Clarendon could refer in the whole of his correspondence in support of that assertion was the passage to which he (Sir F. Thesiger) had just referred, and that was not an expression of regret. It was an expression of regret “ if the law of the United States had been in any way infringed by persons acting with or without any authority from the British Government;” and he went on to assert that the British Government had an incontestable right to recruit Her Majesty's army in the British North American possessions, whether from subjects of the Queen or foreigners, who were willing to enter Her Majesty's service. Therefore, so far from expressing regret at the course which had been pursued, hon. Members would perceive that Lord Clarendon justified himself; and from first to last never abandoned the position—that he had a right to do what he had done, and that the American Government had no just cause of complaint. He went on to say—

“ Her Majesty's Government do not deny that the acts and advertisements of these self-constituted and unauthorised agents were in many instances undoubted violations of the law of the United States; but such persons had no authority whatever for their proceedings from any British agents, by all of whom they were promptly and unequivocally disavowed.”

Lord Clarendon had previously said that—

“ Her Majesty's Government, desirous of availing themselves of the offers of these volunteers, adopted the measures necessary for making generally known that Her Majesty's Government were ready to do so, and for receiving such persons as should present themselves at the appointed place in one of the British possessions.”

Lord Clarendon admitted that the acts of those unauthorised and advertising agents were clearly illegal, but he did not condescend to tell what were the particular acts of the accredited and authorised agents of the Government which rendered them different from the acts of the advertising and unauthorised agents. Again, Lord Clarendon, in his letter of the 16th of July, gave no answer to the question put to him by Mr. Buchanan, namely—

“ How far persons in official station under the British Government had acted, whether with or without its approbation, either in enlisting persons within the United States or engaging them to proceed thence to the British provinces for the purpose of being there enlisted, and what measures, if any, had been taken to restrain their unjustifiable conduct ?”

That letter of Lord Clarendon, being a course very unsatisfactory, Mr. Marcy, on the 5th of September, 1855, wrote again and distinctly stated what it was of which the American Government complained :—

"The President perceives with much regret that the disclosures implicate you (Mr. Crampton) in these proceedings; he has therefore preferred to communicate the views contained in this note to Her Majesty's Government through you, Her representative here, rather than through our Minister at London. The information in his possession does not allow him to doubt that yourself, as well as the Lieutenant General of Nova Scotia, and several civil and military officers of the British Government of rank in the provinces, were instrumental in setting on foot this scheme of enlistment, have offered inducements to agents to embark in it, and approved the arrangements for carrying it out, which embraced various recruiting establishments in different cities of the United States, and made liberal provision for funds to be used as inducements for persons residing therein to leave the country for the purpose of enlisting in the British military service."

And he then returned to the demand which he had previously made, and said—

"The object of this note is to ascertain how far the acts of the known and acknowledged agents of the British Government, done within the United States, in carrying out this scheme of recruiting for the British army, have been authorised or sanctioned by Her Majesty's Government."

Now, there was a clear categorical demand, which deserved a distinct and unequivocal answer, and he must express his opinion that he for one exceedingly regretted that Lord Clarendon so far forgot the courtesy which was due to the American Government, in the correspondence that was taking place between them, as to write the letter of the 27th of September, 1855, in which he made the most offensive remarks on the American Government, and, instead of answering the question which had been put to him, retaliated upon the Americans, and told them that they themselves had been guilty of a breach of the neutrality laws. He said—

"Her Majesty's Government have no reason to believe that such has been the conduct of any person in the employment of Her Majesty, and it is needless to say that any person so employed would have departed no less from the intentions of Her Majesty's Government by violating international law, or by offering an affront to the sovereignty of the United States, than by infringing the municipal laws of the Union, to which Mr. Buchanan more particularly called the attention of the undersigned. Her Majesty's Government feel confident that even the extraordinary measures which have been adopted in various parts of the Union to obtain evidence against Her Majesty's servants or their agents by practices sometimes resorted to under despotic institutions, but which are disdained by all free and enlightened Governments, will fail to establish any well-founded charge against Her Majesty's servants."

He then went on to say—

"The British Government is fully aware of the obligations of international duties, and is no less mindful of those obligations than is the Government of the United States. The observance of those obligations ought, undoubtedly, to be reciprocal, and Her Majesty's Government do not impute to the Government of the United States that, while claiming an observance of those obligations by Great Britain, they are lax in enforcing a respect for those obligations within the Union."

Now, that passage was not the less offensive because it was indirect—because it was a mere insinuation, and not a direct charge; and he certainly did exceedingly regret that Lord Clarendon should have so far forgotten himself as to have written a letter of that description in answer to what must be considered as a just demand, on the part of the American Government, because he felt that this had led to all the differences, and to all the bitterness and ill-feeling which existed between the two countries, and which were so deeply to be deplored. On the 13th of October, 1855, Mr. Marcy wrote a letter to Mr. Buchanan, in which he, first of all, replied to the remarks which had been made with respect to a breach of neutrality by the United States, and denied the imputation cast upon him in Lord Clarendon's letter, and then proceeded to say—

"Supported as this Government is in the charge made against British officers and agents of having infringed our laws and violated our sovereign territorial rights, and being able to sustain that charge by competent proof, the President would fail in due respect for the national character of the United States, and in his duty to maintain it, if he did not decline to accept as a satisfaction for the wrongs complained of Lord Clarendon's assurance that these officials were enjoined a strict observance of our laws, and that he does not believe that any of them have disregarded the injunction. This Government believes, and has abundant proof to warrant its belief, that Her Britannic Majesty's officers and agents have transgressed our laws and disregarded our rights, and that its solemn duty requires that it should vindicate both by insisting upon a proper satisfaction. The President indulges the hope that this demand for redress will be deemed reasonable, and be acceded to by Her Britannic Majesty's Government. This Government has indicated the satisfaction which it believes it has a right to claim from the British Government in my despatch to you of the 15th of July last."

That despatch, of the 15th of July, was not delivered to Lord Clarendon until the 2nd of November. His Lordship has stated that Mr. Buchanan withheld it because he considered the British Foreign Secretary's despatch of July 16 entirely satisfactory, and would settle all the disputes which had arisen. He (Sir F.

Thesiger) thought that Lord Clarendon went too far in attributing entire satisfaction to Mr. Buchanan; but whether Mr. Buchanan was satisfied or not was wholly immaterial, the question being whether the American Government was satisfied. Now the House would observe that the American Government asked originally for much less satisfaction than they afterwards demanded. In page 121 they required Her Majesty's Government to "take prompt and effective measures to arrest their proceedings and to discharge from service those persons now in it who were enlisted within the United States, or who left the United States under contracts made here to enter and serve as soldiers in the British army." He ought, just in passing, to say that Lord Clarendon declared before that letter was received he had sent out orders to stop the recruiting. What, however, did Lord Clarendon reply to the above moderate demand? Why, the noble Lord wrote that letter of the 16th of November, 1855, in which he justified his whole proceedings, and contended that he had a right to do everything he had done:—

"It appears to Her Majesty's Government that, provided only that no actual 'recruiting' (that is, enlisting or hiring) takes place within the United States, British officers who, within the United States' territories, might point out the routes which intending recruits should follow, or explain to them the terms upon which they would be accepted, or publish and proclaim such terms, or even defray their travelling expenses, or do similar acts, could not be justly charged with violating such sovereign territorial rights. It has been legally decided in the United States that the payment of the passage from that country of a man who is desirous to enlist in a foreign port does not come within the Neutrality Laws of the United States; and that a person may go abroad, provided the enlistment be in a foreign place, not having accepted and exercised a commission. It would indeed be a violation of territorial right to enlist, and organise, and train men as British soldiers within the United States, and whether or not this has been done by British authority is the question involved in the first of Mr. Marcy's charges; but it is no violation of such right to persuade or to assist men merely to leave the United States' territory, and to go into British territory, in order, when they arrive there, either to be voluntarily enlisted in the British service or not, at their own discretion."

"It only remains for me to state that no enlistment in the British service is valid without attestation, and that according to British law, a recruit cannot be attested in a foreign country, nor even in the British colonies, without a specially delegated authority for that purpose. No binding contract could, therefore, be made with any man within the United States; promises might be so made, but any money given to men to enable them to repair to places beyond the United States' territory for the purpose of being enlisted would be advanced at a risk. Nevertheless, if it can be shown that there are persons now in the foreign legion who have been enlisted or hired in violation of the United States' law, as well as of the British law, Her Majesty's Government will be prepared to offer them their discharge, and to give them a free passage back to the United States if they choose to return thither."

Now, that was Lord Clarendon's view of what this nation had a right to do with regard to the territory of the United States. That was his assertion of British right, and he (Sir F. Thesiger) thought Mr. Marcy might very well say, "Although you have discontinued your system of recruiting, yet you keep these principles in reserve for some future occasion, and, therefore, we are bound in self-defence to meet them and to deny that you are correct in the view you have presented to us." Could anything be more extraordinary than the principle which Lord Clarendon laid down. In effect it was this—"No recruiting in the English service is valid without attestation; no attestation can take place in a foreign country; but if it can be shown that any persons have been enlisted in violation of the United States' law as well as of the British law, I am willing to discharge them." It was perfectly illusory for Lord Clarendon to offer such an explanation as a satisfaction to the American Government. It was true that an explanation had been given by Lord Clarendon in his letter to Mr. Dallas, and that explanation he would here quote—

"The undersigned must also further observe that Mr. Marcy, in the same despatch, has misconceived the meaning of an expression used by the undersigned in making an offer, above referred to, that any man who might have been enlisted within the United States should be immediately discharged and sent back. The reference there made to British law was merely intended to indicate that if persons had been enlisted under the circumstances supposed, such enlistment would have been at variance with British as well as with American law; but the undersigned did not mean that respect would not be paid, in the discharge of men, to the principles of the law of the United States alone, should that law appear to have been violated in a single case."

Now, if that was the meaning of Lord Clarendon, he was very unhappy in expressing it previously. Certainly the introduction of the allusion to the necessity of attestation was calculated to mislead, and he (Sir F. Thesiger) could not comprehend why it should have been introduced except for the purpose of showing that there were no persons to whom the obligation of giving a discharge could apply, and, therefore, that Lord Clarendon could not comply with the demand made upon him. Now, he would ask was that interpretation a right one? Why, Lord Clarendon, in this letter to Mr. Dallas, stated this in so many terms—

“The satisfaction,” he observed, “which the Government of the United States after mature deliberation had demanded had either been spontaneously and by anticipation granted, or had been shown to be impracticable, because there was no man in the British service whose enlistment, or contract to enlist, had, to the knowledge of Her Majesty’s Government taken place in the manner specified by Mr. Marcy in his despatch of the 15th of July; and whose discharge, therefore, could form part of the satisfaction indicated by Mr. Marcy.”

Could anything be considered more illusory than the course adopted by Lord Clarendon for the purpose of meeting the demands for satisfaction made by the American Government? And was anything more natural than that, his Lordship having refused to give the extremely moderate satisfaction thus required, the American Government should then rise in their demands? For one moment he would call the attention of the House to the observations made by Mr. Marcy upon Lord Clarendon’s arguments with reference to the enlistment question. In his letter of the 28th of December, 1855, Mr. Marcy said—

“This Government does not contest Lord Clarendon’s two propositions in respect to the sovereign rights of the United States; first, that in the absence of municipal law, Great Britain may enlist, hire, or engage, as soldiers, within the British territory, persons who have left the United States for that purpose. This proposition is, however, to be understood as not applying to persons who have been enticed away from this country by tempting offers of reward, such as commissions in the British army, high wages, liberal bounties, pensions, and portions of the Royal domain, urged on them while within the United States, by the officers and agents of Her Majesty’s Government In this view of the question as to the rights of territory, irrespective of municipal law, Lord Clarendon is understood to maintain that Her Majesty’s Government may authorise agents to do anything within the United States short of enlisting, and organising, and training men as soldiers for the British army, with perfect respect to the sovereign rights of this country. This proposition is exactly the reverse of that maintained by this Government, which holds that no foreign Power whatever has the right to do either of the specified acts without its consent. . . . Lord Clarendon, it is true, uses language in other parts of that despatch which seems to admit that enlisting into foreign military service within the United States, or hiring or retaining persons to leave the United States to enlist into such service, would be a violation of the United States’ neutrality law; but this admission amounts to nothing when taken in connection with his definition of the terms enlisting, hiring, or retaining. In his view, as I understand it, each act must be the result of a valid contract. If the persons are not bound when they have left the United States to perfect their enlistment, then there has been no violation of the United States’ law.”

Then, pursued Mr. Marcy, according to Lord Clarendon’s argument, the English recruiting agents were at liberty to—

“Penetrate every part of the country, open rendezvous in any city, publish handbills, ornamented with the emblem of England’s royalty, presenting every inducement for enlistment which a United States’ officer engaged in recruiting troops for his own Government could offer; and yet, in doing all these things, they would comply with the stringent instructions so often repeated to them, and now so much relied on for their justification—not to violate the United States’ Law of Neutrality.”

Well, then, unhappily the American Administration, owing to the course taken by Her Majesty’s Government, found themselves compelled to demand the removal of Mr. Crampton. Now, he would ask the House whether Lord Clarendon, first of all, in that offensive letter which he wrote in answer to the question, whether the acts of the authorised agents of the Government were approved by them; and, next, in refusing the moderate satisfaction which the United States demanded, had not driven the American Government into a position which rendered it absolutely necessary that they should take steps to vindicate their sovereign rights? It appeared to him that Lord Clarendon might have prevented the indignity which had thus been cast upon us. He might have admitted that the course pursued by our agents was wrong, and on that ground he might have withdrawn the Minister and removed the Consuls. At the same time, if he thought they had been faithful servants, he could have provided for them in some other way. Unfortunately, Lord Clarendon adopted a different course. On the 30th of April, 1856, he wrote to Mr. Dallas a letter, in which he adverted to the application that had been made to disavow the acts of the agents of Her Majesty’s Government. He said—proceedings were, so far as they knew, committed by its officers or authorised agents, and, therefore, they have none to disavow, and no officers or agents to deal with as offenders."

Then, again—

"With respect to Mr. Crampton, the undersigned has to state that Mr. Crampton positively and distinctly denies the charge brought against him; he declares that he never hired, or retained, or engaged a single person within the United States for the service of Her Majesty, and that he never countenanced or encouraged any violation of the law of the United States."

With regard to the consuls, Lord Clarendon stated that they actually denied the charge against them that they had violated the laws of the United States, and he went on to express the earnest hope that these explanations and assurances would prove satisfactory, and effectually remove any misapprehension which might have existed. The House would, however, observe that Lord Clarendon distinctly recognised and sanctioned the acts of Mr. Crampton and the consular agents, saying he had nothing to disavow, and denying that any acts had been committed but those particular acts of which he had been informed. The House would doubtless bear in mind that when that letter was written, on the 30th of April last, to Mr. Dallas, Lord Clarendon was in possession of the whole of the correspondence that took place in February and March of 1855, in which it was proposed that there should be secret proceedings for the purpose of procuring recruits safely, without alarming the United States; and that, therefore, Lord Clarendon was perfectly aware of what had been done from beginning to end. They knew, also, what were Lord Clarendon's views so late as the month of May, for on the 27th of that month he was reported to have said—

"There would have been no shortcoming on the part of Her Majesty's Government if we had seen reason to adopt a contrary course, or no hesitation to deal severely with any agent who should so far have forgotten his duty and been unmindful of his instructions as to violate the laws of the United States; but being convinced that that had not been done, and having in our possession the means of proving to the United States that it was not done, I think nobody will require of us to sacrifice our agents and to purchase a conciliation with the United States by doing that which would be both shabby and dishonourable."

On the 27th of May the American Government wrote in these terms:—

Sir Frederic Thesiger

"The unequivocal disclaimer by Her Majesty's Government of any intention either to infringe the law or to disregard the policy, or not to respect the sovereign rights of the United States, and their expression of regret, 'if, contrary, to their intentions and to their reiterated directions, there has been any infringement of the laws of the United States,' are satisfactory to the President. The ground of complaint, so far as respects Her Majesty's Government is thus removed. But the President extremely regrets that he cannot concur in Lord Clarendon's favourable opinion of the conduct of some of Her Majesty's officers, who were, as this Government believed, and after due consideration of all which has been offered in their defence, still believes, implicated in proceedings which were so clearly an infringement of the laws and sovereign rights of this country."

Lord Clarendon was told that America was dissatisfied with the British Government's agents by reason of their having acted contrary to the reiterated instructions of their "own Government." Why, he knew perfectly well that they had acted with the perfect sanction of the British Government from beginning to end of the whole transaction. Lord Clarendon said that it would be both shabby and dishonourable to sacrifice those agents who had only been faithful in performing their duty. And yet he accepted the above statement from the American Government without remonstrance against its interpretation of the conduct of the Minister and the consuls. The manly, straightforward course would have been to say, "Do not mistake—do not suppose you are dismissing agents who have disregarded their duty to us; they have not disobeyed the reiterated instructions they have received, but, on the contrary, they have faithfully performed everything we required of them, and therefore we ought also to fall under the same censure, and suffer with them." Now, that undoubtedly would have been a straightforward course, but one was almost pained to read the answer returned by Lord Clarendon. He said—

"Her Majesty's Government retain the high opinion which they have ever held of the zeal, ability, and integrity of Mr. Crampton, and of the earnest desire by which he has ever been animated to avoid all great cause of offence to the Government to which he was accredited."

Again,—

"If Her Majesty's Government had been convinced, like the Government of the United States, that Her Majesty's officers had, in defiance of their instructions, violated the laws of the United States, Her Majesty's Government would have removed those officers from the posts which they held."

Then he proceeded to say,—

"But, in the present case, Her Majesty's Government are bound to accept the formal and repeated declarations of the President of his belief that these officers of Her Majesty have violated the laws of the Union, and are on that account unacceptable organs of communication with the Government and authorities of the United States." Now, was not that sacrificing those men and making an atonement for conduct which Lord Clarendon himself had characterised in terms which he (Sir F. Thesiger) would be loth to use? He had now brought the matter to this point, and he felt bound to say that he was in no way apprehensive that the discussion would produce irritation or keep alive any bad feeling in the mind of any American. For his own part, he believed that if the Government and the people of the United States perceived that the doctrines and principles put forward in the matter by Lord Clarendon were not sympathised with and agreed to by the House of Commons, it would go far to tranquillise and allay any bitter feeling in the United States which might have been created by the improper conduct of Her Majesty's Government. The question to be asked was—Were the United States right in the course which they have adopted, or were they wrong? Now, the answer to that question depended upon another question, which was—Were Her Majesty's Government justified in carrying out the clandestine and secret schemes which they set on foot, for the purpose and with the idea of invading the neutrality laws of the United States? If Her Majesty's Government were not justified in adopting that course, then the dismissal of the British Ambassador was perfectly right on the part of the Government of the United States, and this country must submit to the indignity which it had received in consequence of the policy of the Government. Now, he wished hon. Members to observe that he used the word indignity advisedly, because no one could doubt that to be obliged to submit to the dismissal of the British Minister placed this country in a position of humiliation and degradation, because it was a tacit confession that we had been in the wrong, and the Government of the United States in the right. He himself could imagine nothing so calculated to degrade England in the eyes of foreign States, and he had been much struck with a passage which he had seen quoted from a foreign newspaper, and which showed the opinion entertained abroad of the conduct of Her Majesty's Government—an opinion unhappily derogatory to the British name and character. That passage was—

"It is far from our intention to blame the prudence, the circumspection, and even the humility of the Government and statesmen of England, which are commanded in the name of such great interests. But, nevertheless, we will permit ourselves to remark that the spectacle offered by the British Administration by no means corresponds with the ideas we had formed of a great Government. This moderation, this patience, pushed to the limits of abnegation in the presence of a cool and premeditated insult; this desertion of an agent who was declared up to the last moment worthy of responsibility; this facility of turning and of viewing matters in their best light, astonishes us above all. But, after all, the honour at stake is not our own, and it is not for us to take it under our protection."

Did not that passage forcibly remind one of the celebrated expression of Lord Chatham—"Yesterday England might have stood alone against the world; now there is none so poor as to do her homage." Who had brought the country into such a position? The answer was a plain one—Her Majesty's Government. He could not, then, hesitate to vote for a Motion, the purport of which was, that the conduct of Her Majesty's Government did not entitle them to the approbation of that House.

MR. J. G. PHILLIMORE said, in his opinion the discussion of the subject was not at all calculated to strengthen the hands of the Government in the negotiations in which they were now engaged, and was strongly to be deprecated, as contrary to the interests which every Englishman was anxious to promote. Before proceeding to analyse the case, he wished to refer to some observations made by the hon. and learned Gentleman, who had just resumed his seat, towards the close of his speech. The hon. and learned Gentleman had asked if the House were ready to submit to the insult of the dismissal of a British Ambassador. Now, it was an established principle of international law that any State had the right of demanding the recall of an Ambassador accredited to it, and that right had frequently been exercised. ["Hear, hear!"] He repeated that any State had a right, according to the law of nations, to demand the recall of an Ambassador. There was no point of international law more clear to any one at all acquainted with it. When Charles II. came to the throne—although he was on most friendly terms with the French Court—he demanded the recall of the French Ambassador. It was absurd, therefore, to suppose that the dismissal of an Ambassador made war inevitable, or imposed the alternative either of declaring war or of sending another Ambassador. The hon. and learned Gentleman (Sir F. Thesiger) had declared that the proclamation of M'Donald, disavowed by our Government, was the same as that which had been issued at Halifax. But the distinction was, that the latter had been issued in Halifax, while the former was published in New York, which was within the territory of the United States. The law of America did not upon this subject resemble the English law. The policy of the law of England was to forbid a British subject from enlisting in a foreign service without the consent of the Sovereign, whereas the policy of the United States permitted any subject of those States out of their territory to enter the service of foreign Powers. Then the Government of the United States, giving this encouragement to the propensities their own subjects were perpetually displaying of engaging in war with other countries, were taking advantage, in order to fix a quarrel upon us, of the acts of our agent for a similar purpose. There were many persons in the United States who might properly have joined with us in the late war. Some who had suffered from the tyranny of Russia—some who were English subjects. Was there any harm or wrong in inviting them to go to Halifax to be enlisted in our army? Judge Kane had laid it down that the important words in the law were "hire or retain," which included mutuality of engagement, and meant the having paid, or engaged to pay, or perform a contract. Judge Kane further said, "I do not think that the payment of the passage from the country of any men who desired to enlist in a foreign port, would be an act within the law." It was no answer to say that the Judge had afterwards altered his opinion. For if a Judge might mistake the law, a British agent might very well be excused for mistaking it. The fact was that the American law was that the subjects of the United States might go and buccaner as they pleased abroad, and engage in any contest, however violently—or disturb the tranquillity of any nation, however peaceful, provided they made no engagement on the soil of the United States. The English law did not allow this without the consent of the Sovereign. It was all very well to talk of the contrary statements of Lord Clarendon; but let the House listen to the inconsistent statements of the President of the United States. On the 6th December, 1855, the President said it was a mistake to suppose that the men who had left California, for the purpose of entering the military service of Nicaragua, had left to the knowledge of the Californian authorities with that hostile object. "On the contrary, whenever there is reason to think that such purposes are entertained, every attempt is made to prevent their departure." And on the 25th April, 1856, the President said:—

"The right of expatriation is not withheld from the citizens of any free State, and no Government can have authority to examine into the motives which lead subjects to exercise the right."

Surely the hon. and learned Gentleman (Sir F. Thesiger), who was so eager at detecting the inconsistency of the English Minister, might have observed the contradictory statements of the American President. Throughout the whole of the transactions Lord Clarendon had shown the utmost anxiety to avoid any infringement upon the law of the United States. What reason was there, therefore, to doubt his sincerity? What was the conduct of the Government when they found that, in spite of their precautions, their directions had been violated—in consequence of the law of the United States, anomalous as it was, encouraging the conduct which it did not choose to authorise, and allowing the predatory habits of its people, while at the same time desirous of getting credit for its morality? When the Government of Her Majesty found that to be the case they sent out instructions to put an end to all the proceedings complained of. On the 16th of July, Lord Clarendon wrote to Mr. Buchanan that Her Majesty's Government, having reason to think that no precautionary measures, with whatever honesty they might be carried out, would effectually guard against a real or apparent infringement of the law of the United States, had determined that all proceedings for enlistment should be put an end to, and that instructions to that effect were sent out before Mr. Buchanan's letter was received. Even if the municipal law of the United States had been transgressed, a high-spirited and generous nation ought to have accepted such a statement as that as a complete satisfaction. He believed it was so accepted by Mr. Buchanan; for Mr. Buchanan, in consequence of the receipt of that letter, did not present the despatch which he had received for Lord Clarendon. Would it not have been more consistent with the honour and dignity of a great nation to accept that declaration as frankly as it was made, than to rely upon the testimony of such worthless scoundrels as Hertz and Stroebel? In speaking of the tone of Lord Clarendon's despatches, his hon. and learned Friend appeared to forget that Lord Clarendon was the Minister of a great country, and to overlook the provocation which he had received. In the very same breath in which the United States Minister admitted the testimony against the British agents to be that of scoundrels, he insisted upon and repeated that testimony. What, moreover, was the language of the United States Attorney General in his opening speech at a great State prosecution? He said,—

“The various schemes which have been adopted for the support of the balance of power by the potentates of Europe have never advanced, and never will advance, those republican institutions which it is our duty to foster. On the contrary, these combinations have been at all times made the means of obstructing in Europe the progress of the democratic spirit, and of prostrating the masses more thoroughly beneath the yoke of an overgrown and decaying aristocracy.”

Such was the manner in which the representative of the United States Government chose to speak of the institutions of this country. If any wrong had been done it was done without the sanction, direct or indirect, of Lord Clarendon. He defied any one to show from the correspondence that his Lordship ever countenanced the slightest infraction of the law of the United States; and, moreover, he maintained that the whole of the evidence which showed that any offence had in fact been committed was utterly worthless. The President of the United States had admitted that the offence was not intentional on the part of the British Government, and he (Mr. Phillimore) could not see anything in the conduct or history of the United States which should lead us to think that its Government felt any real indignation at what had taken place. When he reflected on the conduct of the United States with regard to this country, and its bearing towards other nations, he could not but be reminded of the words of Junius, when he spoke of the prude who prosecuted one man for rape, while, at the same time, she solicited the advances of another. Considering the excessive indignation which had been displayed by the United States Government in relation to the affair, and comparing with it their conduct with reference to Nicaragua, he thought the application of those words was à propos. The case of the British Government rested on the simplest basis possible. First, he contended that the law of the United States allowed enlistment for a foreign service; and secondly, there had been no violation of that law. The allegation of violation rested on testimony the most worthless; the contradiction rested on the word of a man of unblemished reputation.

MR. H. BAILLIE: Sir, Her Majesty's Attorney General was perfectly correct in stating that, in deference to many hon. Gentlemen with whom generally I have the honour to act, I withdrew the Motion of which I had given notice on this subject. But, at the same time, I must state to the House that I have no reason whatever to complain of the course taken by the hon. Member for Mayo (Mr. G. H. Moore). He, no doubt, believes that the time has arrived when it is impossible for Parliament, without failing in its duty, any longer to remain silent, and that the House is bound to give the case that consideration which the vast importance of the subject imperatively demands. Sir, it is impossible to deny that this is a question in which the honour and character of the nation are involved. Whatever may be our differences of opinion in this House as to the origin of that war in which we have unfortunately been engaged, or as to the manner in which it has been conducted, we shall all, I trust, be equally prepared to maintain and vindicate the honour of our country. That honour, Sir, has been compromised; not, indeed, by the dismissal of Her Majesty's envoy from Washington, but because the Ministers of the Crown have thought fit to maintain and declare that he has been dismissed without a reason and without a cause—that he has committed no offence, and that he has violated no law. Sir, if all these allegations be true, an outrageous insult has then been offered to the people of this country which the Government of Her Majesty has failed in a proper manner to resent. But in discussing this question I consider that it is necessary to go to its origin. We have often been told in this House that the late war with Russia was popular throughout the country, that a great martial spirit had prevailed among the people. If that be true we have a right to ask the Ministers of the Crown how it was that they were unable to fill up the ranks of their army in this country and raise the necessary number of men in order that the war might be carried on with vigour. We have further a right to ask the Ministers of the Crown how it was that they felt themselves under the necessity of employing agents to solicit and seduce the people of the United States to enter the service of Her Majesty contrary to the wishes and laws of that country. These, I think, are important questions well worthy the anxious attention and consideration of Parliament. Sir, I am not one of those who opposed the Foreign Enlistment Bill in this House. Whatever might have been the objections which I entertained to that measure, I thought at the time it was desirable that at the commencement of the war full and ample powers should be given to the Executive Government; but I certainly did not anticipate that they would have abused them. I never for one moment anticipated that the Government would have brought forward a Bill in this House to sanction foreign enlistment without having by previous inquiry and negotiation ascertained that permission would be given to the raising of a foreign legion. Such has always been the practice adopted by modern European nations. It has always been the practice of France. Not only has that country obtained the permission of the Swiss Government previously to enlistment, but it has also sought the assistance of the municipal authorities. Such likewise is the practice of the Roman and Neapolitan Governments, by both of whom it is well known Swiss legions are engaged. But, Sir, it has been reserved for the Ministers of England to set all decency at defiance, and outrage the laws of other States, calling down upon themselves a just rebuke from the Government of the United States. Fortunate will it be for this country if their proceeding does not lead to still more disastrous results. It has always appeared to me, Sir, that Her Majesty's Government neglected their duty in not impressing on the minds of the people of this country that, if they were anxious that the war should be carried on with vigour, they must be prepared to submit to all the evils and inconveniences which a state of war necessarily entails upon civilised nations. It was, I apprehend, because the First Minister of the Crown shrank from the unpopularity of affirming that principle that the character of the country has been compromised and lowered. I cannot conceive a greater insult to a nation than to attempt to seduce its subjects from their allegiance for the purpose of their serving against a Power with whom their Government is on friendly terms. Let us for a moment reverse the case. Let us suppose that some foreign nation did to us what we are accused of doing towards Prussia, Switzerland, and the United States. Suppose that during the last two years we had been at peace with Russia; that the Government and people of this country meant well to the Russian people; and that the war against Russia had been carried on by France alone. Suppose that the Russian Government, finding it impossible to man her fleets, had sent agents into our seaports to give bounties to our sailors to serve against France, contrary to the wishes and remonstrances of our Government. Suppose they sent vessels into the Thames and the Mersey, and fitted out ships with our sailors. Could, I ask, any Government exist in this country which was not prepared to resent such an insult? How, then, can we be surprised at the course taken by the Government of the United States? Sir, we have been told by a great authority, which receives its information and its inspiration from official sources (of course I mean The Times newspaper), that Her Majesty's Government were misled by the language held by the United States Minister, Mr. Buchanan. Now, Sir, that is a very serious charge to make against the American Minister; but one which he thought necessary formally and publicly to deny. But suppose the assertion were true, and that before the war broke out he had expressed his own private opinion that the great mass of the people of the United States would take a deep interest in the success of those European Powers which came forward to resist aggression and maintain the independence of Europe. Why such language as that would only prove that he had mistaken the views of his Government, and the sentiments of the American people. But, Sir, there never was any mistake about the feeling of the United States' Government with regard to the enlistment question. Why, within seven days after Mr. Crampton had intimated to the Government of the United States that we were at war with Russia, they told him that the course they intended to take was one of strict neutrality, and that they would not tolerate any breach of their neutrality laws by any of the contending parties. Now of what is Mr. Crampton accused? He is accused of having given his sanction to the employment of agents by the officers of the Canadian Government, for the purpose of seducing citizens of the United States from their allegiance to engage in the service of Her Majesty. That is the charge, and before I proceed to the proofs let us come to a clear understanding with respect to the nature of the offence. A great confusion of ideas has hitherto prevailed on that subject. The offence is described by the noble Lord the First Minister of the Crown, and by the noble Lord the Secretary of State for foreign Affairs, as a breach of some municipal law of the United States. Now if the offence charged has been committed, it is a direct and flagrant violation of the law of nations, and it is so held by various authorities on international law. I will very briefly advert to some of those authorities. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General adverted to the authority of Vattel. He did not quote him, and did not seem to hold his authority in much estimation. Now hear what Vattel says upon the subject—

"The man who undertakes to enlist soldiers in a foreign country, without the Sovereign's permission, and, in general, whoever entices away the subjects of another state, violates one of the most sacred rights of the prince and the nation. This crime is distinguished by the name of kidnapping or man-stealing, and is punished with the utmost severity in every well-regulated state. Foreign recruiters are hanged without mercy, and with great justice. It is not presumed that their Sovereign has ordered them to commit a crime; and supposing that they had received such an order, they ought not to have obeyed it, their Sovereign having no right to command what is contrary to the law of nature. It is not, I say, presumed that these recruiters act by orders of their Sovereign; and with respect to such of them as have practised seduction only, it is generally thought sufficient to punish them when they can be detected and caught. If they have used violence and made their escape, it is usual to demand a surrender of the delinquents, and to claim the persons they have carried off. But if it appears that they acted by order, such a proceeding in a foreign Sovereign is justly considered an injury, and as a sufficient cause for declaring war against him, unless he makes suitable reparation."

Klüber (who has acquired a great reputation in Germany by his works upon public law) says, in his Droit des Gens Modernes de l'Europe—

"A state entirely neutral has the right to exact, even by force if necessary, that belligerent powers do not use neutral territory for the purposes of war, that they take not therefrom munitions of war, and provisions and other immediate requirements of war for their armies, that they do not make there any military preparations, enrolments, or collections of troops."

The celebrated Ferdinando Galiani, a learned Neapolitan, whose writings upon political economy, as well as upon public law, were much admired by Voltaire, says in his work Dei doveri de Principi Neutrali, upon the duties of neutral powers, p. 325—

"All Governments are accustomed to forbid under capital penalty any foreigner to make military engagements or recruits within their territory; in doing which they do no more than to sustain and defend a natural right, and one inherent in every sovereignty."

Hautefeuille, a modern French writer of great authority, says—

"The duties of belligerents may be summed up in very few words. The belligerent ought to abstain from the employment of all such indirect means to molest his enemy as in the accomplishment of their object would first injuriously affect a neutral nation. He ought to respect in the most complete and absolute manner the independence and sovereignty of nations at peace."

And again, he says—

"The passage of armed troops, the levying of soldiers without the consent of the Sovereign, would constitute an offence against the sovereignty of the neutral, and a violation of the duty of the belligerent."

Sir, from the authority of jurists I will go to the authority of statesmen; and I will refer to the opinion of one whom I presume will be held in reverence and respect by the noble Lord the First Minister of the Crown—I mean Mr. Canning. On the 16th of April, 1823, a Motion was made by Lord Althorp to repeal an Act to prevent the enlisting or engagement of His Majesty's subjects to serve in foreign service. That Motion was supported by the noble Lord the Member for London (Lord J. Russell) and was opposed by Mr. Canning, the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs. In the speech which Mr. Canning made upon that occasion he illustrated the subject by reference to the conduct of the United States, and I am happy to have this opportunity of showing the House that the Government of the United States asks nothing from us now which they were not ready upon a former occasion, and under precisely similar circumstances, to concede. The coincidence is very striking, and I would beg the attention of the House to the statement of Mr. Canning. He says—

"All I now call upon the House to do is, to adopt the same course which it has recommended to neutral Powers upon former occasions. If I wished for a guide in a system of neutrality, I should take that laid down by America in the days of the presidency of Washington and the secretaryship of Jefferson. In 1793 complaints were made to the American Government that French ships were allowed to fit out and arm in American ports for the purpose of attacking British vessels, in direct opposition to the laws of neutrality. Immediately upon this representation the American Government held that such a fitting out was contrary to the laws of neutrality, and orders were issued, prohibiting the arming of any French vessels in American ports. At New York, a French vessel fitting out was seized, delivered over to the tribunals, and condemned. Upon that occasion the American Government held that such fitting out of French ships in American ports, for the purpose of cruising against English vessels, was incompatible with the sovereignty of the United States, and tended to interrupt the peace and good understanding which subsisted between that country and Great Britain. Here, Sir, I contend is the principle of neutrality upon which we ought to act."—[2 Hansard, viii. 1056.]

Such was the language—such the principles which Mr. Canning advocated. I cannot refrain from expressing my regret that they are no longer maintained by his successor, and I believe his Friend (Mr. Canning) might have added that the French Minister, engaged in the proceedings to which he referred, was recalled on the demand of the President. I will only quote one other authority, and that is of a great lawyer and statesman, I mean Sir William Scott. Sir William Scott moved the third reading of the Foreign Enlistment Bill, remarking "that there could be no solecism more injurious in itself, or more mischievous in its consequences, than to argue that the subjects of a State had a right to act amicably or hostilely with reference to other countries." This is directly at variance with the language of the noble Lord, who says, ubi civitas non carcer—that the people of the United States have a right to leave their country to enter into foreign service. The Act of Congress provides—

"That if any person shall hire or retain any other person to go beyond the limits or jurisdiction of the United States, with the intent to enlist or enter himself in the service of any foreign Prince, State, colony, district, or people, as a soldier, he is guilty of the misdemeanor created by the Act."

It may be true that the Act of Congress is not so complete and perfect as our Foreign Enlistment Act, but the intention and spirit are the same, and I have yet to learn that this nation has a right to violate even the spirit of the laws of other countries. Having, as I believe, established what is the nature of the offence, as well as the duty of the State, I will now proceed to consider the charge made by the President of the United States against the Government of this country. The President of the United States, upon a very solemn occasion, when making his speech to Congress, used the following language:—

"Meantime, the matter acquired additional importance by the recruitments in the United States not being discontinued, and the disclosure of the fact that they were prosecuted upon a systematic plan devised by official authority; that recruiting rendezvous had been opened in the principal cities and depôts for the reception of recruits established on our frontier; and the whole business conducted under the supervision and by the regular co-operation of British officers, civil and military—some in the North-American provinces, and some in the United States. The complicity of those officers in an undertaking which could only be accomplished by defying our laws, throwing suspicion over our attitude of neutrality, and disregarding our territorial rights, is conclusively proved by the evidence elicited on the trial of such of their agents as have been apprehended and convicted. Some of the officers thus implicated are of high official position, and many of them beyond our jurisdiction; so that legal proceedings could not reach the source of the mischief. These considerations, and the fact that the cause of complaint was not a mere casual occurrence, but a deliberate design, entered upon with a full knowledge of our laws and national policy, and conducted by responsible public functionaries, impelled me to present the case to the British Government, in order to secure, not only a cessation of the wrong, but its reparation. The subject is still under discussion, the result of which will be communicated to you in due time."

Acts of complicity, then, have been proved upon the trial of the British agents. But before I enter upon that question, allow me to call the attention of the House to the statement made by the noble Lord at the head of the Government, in answer to a question put to him at the beginning of the Session by the hon. Member for the West Riding (Mr. Cobden). The noble Lord on that occasion said it was true that some violations of the municipal law of the United States might have taken place; but that as soon as those violations of the law were brought to the notice of the Government, they took immediate steps to put an end to them; that the depôts for recruiting were ordered to be removed, and the recruiting itself stopped; and that a suitable apology was made to the United States Government, which was accepted by the United States Minister here, who stated that he had no doubt it would also be accepted by his Government. Now, in making that statement the noble Lord, no doubt unintentionally, completely misled the House and the country; for the noble Lord, drawing upon his imagination, I apprehend, stated that a "suitable apology" had been made, whereas, in fact, none at all had been made for that which was the principal complaint of the United States. The principal complaint of that Government was, that our Minister had violated their laws, and the answer of Her Majesty's Government was that the charges brought against him were based upon the fabrications of perjured witnesses. Well, that may have been a very proper answer if it were true, but surely it cannot be called an apology. Undoubtedly, on the 16th of July last year a despatch was delivered to Mr. Buchanan by Lord Clarendon, in which it was stated that if the laws of the United States had been violated, the noble Earl was very sorry; but he added, he did not believe that they had been, and it is also perfectly true that Mr. Buchanan was ready at that time to accept that as an apology, inasmuch as he said he would transmit it with satisfaction to his Government; but then he never said that his Government would receive it with satisfaction; and afterwards he repeatedly stated, that when he expressed that satisfaction he was not in the least aware of the charges that were made against Mr. Crampton. Now it is quite manifest that the charges against Mr. Crampton are of a much more serious nature than those for which the apology—if it can be called an apology—was made; because that was for acts supposed to be done by the over zeal of some of our Canadian officers. But when violations of the law are committed by the resident Minister of a Government, it is clear that the whole nature of the case is changed. It is, however, necessary that I should give Mr. Buchanan's explanation of the matter to the House. At page 156 of the Blue-book, Mr. Buchanan says that he was somewhat surprised at the broad statement made by the noble Lord at the head of the Government, that when the communication was made to the United States Minister in London he expressed himself satisfied with the explanation, and said he felt confident that his Government entertained a similar feeling in regard to it; that fortunately the only expression, verbal or written, which he (Mr. Buchanan) had employed on the occasion, was contained in his note to Lord Clarendon of the 18th of July, acknowledging the receipt of his Lordship's note of the 10th, and which was in the following language—

"And the undersigned will have much satisfaction in transmitting a copy of his Lordship's note to the Secretary of State by the next mail. From this it will be perceived that I made no allusion whatever to what would be the opinion of my Government as to Lord Clarendon's note, nor did I express an opinion of my own, except that which might be inferred from the statement that I should have much satisfaction in transmitting a copy of his Lordship's note to the Secretary of State."

It is not my intention, after the ample manner in which my hon. and learned Friend (Sir F. Thesiger) has dissected the question, to tire the House by going into a further analysis of it; but there are two or three points to which he has not referred, and to which I would beg to ask the attention of the House for a few moments. I will now give a short summary of the case presented by the Government of the United States against Mr. Crampton. Mr. Marcy states that when the recruiting first commenced in the United States it was carried on openly without any attempt at concealment, that houses were engaged in the principal towns for the reception of recruits, and that advertisements were put forth calling upon recruits to come forward, headed by the Queen's arms. It was natural that the attention of the United States Government should be immediately called to these proceedings, and an application was accordingly made by Mr. Marcy to Mr. Crampton to know whether the proceedings had received the sanction and approval of the British Government. Mr. Crampton at once assured Mr. Marcy that they were the acts of unauthorised agents, and that he entirely disapproved of them; in confirmation of which he read a copy of a letter which he had written to Mr. Barclay, Consul at New York, expressing that disapproval. This letter was dated the 22nd of March, and the date is very important; for it afterwards came out upon the trial of Hertz that Mr. Crampton had been engaged for two months previously in correspondence and in verbal communication with the two most active agents of the recruiting—namely, Hertz and Stroebel, and this was proved upon the trial by the production of three of Mr. Crampton's letters, two addressed to Hertz, and one to Stroebel, dated the 27th January and 4th February, 1855, nearly two months previous to his interview with Mr. Marcy, in which he assured him he had nothing to do with the notices in the papers. Hertz had been invited by Mr. Crampton to come from Philadelphia, where he had a recruiting office, to Washington, where he had information to give him. Mr. Crampton says—"With reference to our late conversation, I am now enabled to give you some more definitive information on the subject to which it related." Well, Hertz was arrested, tried, and convicted, and sentenced to imprisonment. He then made a confession, which, we are told, is a tissue of falsehood; I will not, therefore, ask the House to believe one word of it, that is not confirmed by Mr. Consul Mathew, and I suppose we are to believe him. Hertz says in his confession, "I was employed by Mr. Howe and acted as his agent, with the knowledge and approbation of Mr. Crampton and Mr. Mathew." "Mr. Howe," is now Sir Joseph Howe, an officer of high rank in Nova Scotia, whom Sir Gaspard Le Marchant despatched to Mr. Crampton, as a person in whom he had perfect confidence, to concert respecting the recruiting business. Hertz says he was employed by Mr. Howe, and I beg leave to say that Mr. Crampton has, in his last letter, written since he has been in London, made this statement—"Who, then, Mr. Marcy asks, were responsible for the illegal acts proved to have been committed? It may be replied only those who were convicted of them—namely, Hertz and Wagner." Well, Hertz, it appeared, did act for him; let us see if he acted without authority. He says he was employed by Mr. Howe, with the knowledge of Mr. Crampton and Mr. Mathew. How is that borne out? At page 34 of the Blue-book there is a letter from Mr. Mathew to Mr. Crampton, and in that letter Mr. Mathew says—

"At his (Hertz's) request I transmitted a sealed letter to Mr. Howe, and handed him a reply, containing, I believe, money, for which he gave a receipt made out to Mr. Howe, and enclosed by me to him. On a second occasion I declined to give him the money, though merely the channel of transfer, and the amount was sent to the proprietor of an hotel, from whose book-keeper he received it."

This, then, is a clear proof that Hertz was the agent of Mr. Howe, and that Consul Mathew had a full knowledge of their proceedings, which he doubtless knew to be illegal, and, therefore, declined upon the second occasion to commit himself. As regards Mr. Crampton, we cannot doubt that he acted in concert with Mr. Howe, and his frequent reception of Hertz at his house is an additional proof that he had a knowledge of his proceedings. I am quite ready to admit the statement of Mr. Crampton to Lord Clarendon, "That he never hired, or retained, or engaged a single person within the United States for the service of Her Majesty;" and no one ever accused him of having done so. I will even go further, and say that I do not doubt that Mr. Crampton told Hertz every time he saw him not to violate the law. But what is the use of telling a man like Hertz not to violate the law? Hertz's object was to obtain recruits; he knew that they were not to be had without money, and how was he to know what interpretation the United States lawyers might put upon the word hire or retain? The result was that he obtained the recruits, and, consequently violated the law. And now I come to the other agent, Stroebel. He seems to have acted a more conspicuous part than Hertz. Mr. Crampton's letter to him also was produced at the trial. It was dated Feb. 4, 1855, on the same day as that addressed to Hertz, and is expressed in nearly the same terms. After Stroebel's interview with Mr. Crampton at Washington he entered the recruiting service, and suddenly rose to the rank of captain of the 1st company of the Foreign Legion. He went with a detachment of recruits, raised in Philadelphia, to Halifax; was received into fellowship with the military and civil officers of the highest position in her Majesty's service there stationed; was invited to partake of the hospitality of his Excellency Sir Gaspard Le Marchant, the Lieutenant Governor of the colony; and the account of his triumphant entry at the head of his recruits into Halifax was published in all the papers. The vigorous application of the law in the United States, however, having put down the recruiting there, Mr. Crampton, in the month of May, went over to Canada; and upon his arrival at Halifax he again renewed his acquaintance with Captain Stroebel, which was proved by the following letter from Lieutenant Preston, of Her Majesty's 76th Regiment:—

"My dear Stroebel,—I am directed by the General to acquaint you that Mr. Crampton wants to see you at his house at ten o'clock to-morrow morning; be punctual. If you like to come up to my room at half-past nine we will go together."

Now, he considered that this letter was very important, as showing that almost the first person Mr. Crampton sought out upon his arrival at Halifax was Stroebel. In the evidence of Stroebel, at the trial of Hertz, he declares that he submitted to Mr. Crampton a new plan of operations, which was approved of; that the agents to be employed were left to his selection; and that Mr. Crampton drew up written instructions for their guidance, which instructions were delivered to Stroebel in the house and in the presence of the Governor of Canada. Mr. Crampton has admitted this, but he says the instructions were drawn up with a view to prevent a violation of the law. I do not wish to express any opinion as to what might constitute a violation of the Act of Congress; I suppose it will be admitted that the measure was passed to prevent American citizens from being sent out of the country to engage in foreign service, and I think it will also be admitted that the ingenuity of Mr. Crampton was exercised in order to evade the provisions of the Act. Here, then, a very grave question arises, whether any man in Mr. Crampton's position could be justified in writing out instructions for the guidance of men whom he now declares to be of an infamous character, and in pointing out to them how the laws of the country to which he is accredited may be evaded with impunity? I care not whether the written instructions delivered to Stroebel point to a violation or only to an evasion of the law; if they were issued after assurances had been given to the Government of the United States that Her Majesty's Minister had nothing to do with the recruiting, he committed his country, in a moral point of view, to a breach of faith most discreditable to the Government by whom he was employed, and calculated to compromise the honour of the nation in whose service he was engaged. In leaving this part of the subject let me be clearly understood; I do not stand here to defend the Government of the United States. Their conduct may have been as bad as possible, but this I do contend, that the conduct of our own Government has been quite inexcusable. It will now be my duty to show that these violations of international law were not accidental occurrences, which took place in consequence of the over-zeal of Canadian officials, but that they were carried out by the Government as deliberate acts of policy, not only in the United States of America, but also in the States of Europe, in Germany, in Prussia, in Switzerland, and in the Hanse Towns. It is perfectly true that we have no official information before with respect to the remonstrances which may have been made by the Governments of Prussia, the Hanse

Towns, and Switzerland, because the noble Lord at the head of the Government has refused to produce that information, upon the ground that he thinks it injurious to the public service to do so. But if it is injurious to the public service to produce that correspondence, there must surely be something in it which injuriously affects the character and the honour of the country; and I should like to know if this House will submit to be told by Ministers that important information with respect to transactions already closed shall not be laid before Parliament? Under the present circumstances of the case, then, as we cannot rely upon official information, it will be my duty, therefore, to take the facts that have been published in the newspapers, and talked about in every coffee-house in Germany to the dishonour and discredit of the very name of Englishman. And, first, with regard to Switzerland. The Switz Government having refused to allow the neutrality of their country to be violated, Her Majesty's Ministers addressed themselves to the Emperor of the French, and requested permission to establish a dépôt for the reception of Swiss troops at Huninguen, a town on the frontier of France, within a few miles of the city of Basle. This being acceded to, emissaries were at once sent into Switzerland for the purpose of "giving information;" and I must confess that I do not very clearly see the distinction to be drawn between those emissaries and what are termed "crimps." At all events, the measure caused very extensive desertions among the Swiss troops. On one occasion the whole of the soldiers on guard at the gate of St. John, Basle, deserted together in the course of the night. The results were, altogether, such as were disgraceful to this country, and calculated to render it a common nuisance to surrounding nations. Then, with regard to Prussia. The laws against recruiting for the service of foreign Powers in Prussia amounted to what in this country would be called felony. By the Prussian Code, whoever effected an enlistment of a Prussian subject for a foreign State, or brought recruits for such foreign State out of the Prussian dominions, though he might not be guilty of kidnapping, was punishable with four years' imprisonment in a fortress. It is well known that Her Majesty's consul at Cologne was tried, convicted, and sentenced on a charge of that description, and he was pardoned by the King only because he pleaded that he had acted under the orders of Her Majesty's Government. Now, that was the position in which Her Majesty was placed by her Ministers. The noble Lord at the head of the Government, when asked to lay on the table the correspondence on the subject of enlistment with Prussia and the Hanse Towns, said there was none. There had, he stated, been a few agents imprisoned, but there was no correspondence. Now, that is the way in which great men treat their tools—those whom they employ in these matters. Why, however, should there be any difference as between the conduct of the Government towards the Hanse Towns and Prussia, in this instance, and the United States? When the United States remonstrated, their remonstrance was at once attended to, recruiting was stopped, and an immediate apology was made; but nothing of the kind has been done in regard to Prussia and the Hanse Towns; on the contrary, a sloop of war was lying in the Elbe all through the war, for the purpose of receiving recruits from these places, against the will of their respective Governments, and transferring them to Heligoland. Was it the policy of the Foreign Office, as it was when the noble Lord at the head of the Government more immediately superintended its action, to be humble and submissive to great naval States, and to treat with disregard those States which were not great naval Powers? The House must doubtless remember how humble and submissive the noble Lord was to Russia, in the case of the capture of the Vixen; and how humbly he submitted to the absorption of Cracow, and the violation of the Treaty of Vienna which it involved. It should also be remembered how determined he has been with Naples, and Sicily, and Greece, and other of the smaller Powers of Europe. I did hope that the foreign policy of the noble Lord would be improved with the change of his position; but I regret to find that it is not so, and I can imagine none other better calculated than that then and now pursued to render the name of England detested and despised by all Europe. Looking at the question, however, not so much in its relation to foreign States as in its relation to domestic policy, what do we see? In the year 1813, an army was maintained in this country of far greater efficiency than that which was voted last year, though the population of the country was then only 16,000,000, whereas it is at present over 28,000,000. It is admitted on all hands that in time of war the only effective means of recruiting the army is from the militia; to neglect the militia, therefore, is to neglect the army. The state of the militia in 1813, was as follows: The county militia, embodied and called out for effective service, was 93,210 men; the local militia, not liable to removal from the place where they were raised, amounted to 304,000; the volunteers and cavalry were 68,000 in number; making, in all, 465,210 men. The regular army in, 1813, was 227,442 men. During the last war with Russia, however, the militia embodied only amounted to 45,000 or 50,000 men. In fact, the voluntary system entirely failed for the purpose of obtaining men of a proper age for active service. The hon. and gallant Member for Westminster (Sir De L. Evans) asked, in the early part of the Session, what had become of the army of 212,000 men voted by Parliament, as then only 60,000 had landed at Balaklava; and he also inquired if they were doing duty as policemen in the colonies? Now, I can answer that question. They were not doing duty in the colonies, for the regular troops had been removed from Canada, from Corfu, and elsewhere, to the Crimea; the truth was, they had never been raised. At the commencement of the present year, and all through the past year, the army was 45,000 men below the number that had been voted by Parliament. So it was during the war, the average being from 40,000 to 50,000 short of the number voted by Parliament. I believe there is not a man in the country who does not feel humbled at the manner in which the war has been conducted, as regards the army. It ought to have been the main-spring of the action of the Government to maintain the native army in a state of efficiency in point of numbers; but the Government, on the contrary, seemed to think that a lavish and profuse expenditure of money, far beyond what was spent in those times which were called the "rampant days of Toryism," when the noble Lord (Viscount Palmerston) was Secretary at War, was sufficient for all purposes. In those days of rampant Toryism, however, we had at least a national army to show for our expenditure; now we have none, for our army in the East boasted of no fewer than six different nations, namely—a corps of Germans, a corps of Swiss, a corps of Italians, a corps of Poles, a corps of Sardinians, and a corps of Turks. Such was the motley assemblage to which the maintenance of the honour and dignity of England was entrusted. I may be told that this is the result of our system, and that this country can never have a large army, because of the aversion of the people to conscription. The people of the United States are not less free and independent than the people of England, and yet the United States Government find no difficulty in raising an army. Does any one think that the safety and honour of England can be defended and protected by hired troops? If such be the views of the Government the people of England must make up their minds to submit to a far worse evil than the conscription; they will have to submit to the degradation of our country, and her reduction from the high and lofty position which she has always occupied, and sink permanently into the position of a second-rate Power. The position of England has been changed in reference to other countries by the introduction of steam power into naval warfare, and unless we are prepared to adopt those means of defence which are demanded by this great change, we may give up all hope for the future.

SIR GEORGE GREY: Sir, it is my intention to occupy only a short portion of the time of the House, on the matter under consideration, but I feel it necessary to make some remarks upon the speech which has just been delivered by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Inverness-shire. It is difficult to ascertain what is the precise nature of the charge which hon. Gentlemen opposite intend to prefer against Her Majesty's Government. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Mayo (Mr. G. H. Moore) has moved a Resolution on this question after a Resolution on the subject had been abandoned or given up by the hon. Gentleman the Member for Inverness-shire (Mr. H. Baillie), from considerations of regard for the public interest, and in concert with that party with which he acts. The hon. Member for Mayo has shown too clearly that he has but one endeavour—to dishonour and depreciate the character of Lord Clarendon, which stands far too high in the estimation of Europe to be affected by the sarcasms even of the hon. Gentleman. The hon. and learned Member for Stamford (Sir F. Thesiger) has cast a shaft at the Government for another reason—namely, because he thinks an indignity has been thrown upon the Government by the removal of Mr. Crampton; and he says that if the Government were satisfied with his conduct they ought to have resented his dismissal by the dismissal of Mr. Dallas, the United States Minister here. He says that, in doing so, the Government have stooped to an indignity that compromised the honour and character of this country, and did not deserve to meet with the approbation of the House. But the hon. Gentleman the Member for Inverness-shire has taken a different view of the subject altogether. His ground of attack is the whole policy and spirit of the Foreign Enlistment Act. The hon. Gentleman has, indeed, made a speech that might have been made with force and effect, and which I am not sure was not made, at the time the Foreign Enlistment Act was passing through this House. He has laid down distinctly the position that no foreign country can allow its subjects to enter into the service of a country engaged in a war with a State with which that country is at amity. He says that the law civitas non carcer est is incorrect, and that the United States have no right to allow their subjects to enter the service of a State at war with a country with which they are not at war. [Mr. BAILLIE: Not without the permission of their Government.] But what did Mr. Marcy say? Mr. Marcy, writing to Mr. Molina, April 25, 1856, said,—

“The right of expatriation is not, I believe, withheld from the citizens of any free Government or from residents under its jurisdiction. The laws of neither country (Costa Rica and the United States), it is presumed, have conferred the authority to examine into the motives which may lead any one to exercise the right of expatriation. The liberty to go where hopes of better fortune may entice them belongs to freemen, and no free Government withholds it. It is, therefore, no cause of complaint against a neutral country that persons in the exercise of this right have left it, and have been afterwards found in the ranks of the army of a belligerent State.”

The President, in his Message of May 15, 1856, also said,—

“In these circumstances of the political debility of the Republic of Nicaragua, and when its inhabitants were exhausted by long-continued civil war between parties, neither of them strong enough to overcome the other or permanently maintain internal tranquillity, one of the contending factions of the Republic invited the assistance and co-operation of a small body of citizens from the State of California, whose presence, as it appears, put an end at once to the civil war, and restored apparent order throughout the territory of Nicaragua.”

Thus the hon. Gentleman the Member for Inverness-shire has laid down in defence of the United States a doctrine which the United States do not lay down in their own defence. He asserts what has been disclaimed both by Mr. Marcy and also by the President. The law of the United States has been, I apprehend, clearly laid down by my hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General—except that he did not state it so high as, in my opinion, he might have done—that it is within the competence of a citizen of the United States to leave the territory of that country with the avowed object of taking service in the army of a foreign State, provided he does not enlist or engage himself within the limits of the territory of the United States. With regard to the Foreign Enlistment Act, the hon. Gentleman (Mr. H. Baillie) has adverted to the state of the army which this country had in its pay in 1813, at the close of the great war, and when our military force was very great, and he has argued that it was quite unnecessary to have recourse to foreign soldiers to recruit our ranks during the war with Russia. But the hon. Gentleman has overlooked the fact that it is at the beginning of a war much more than at the end of a war that the difficulty in recruiting a British army is found. The Government of that day thought, and I think justly, that, looking at the difficulty of raising our English forces with the rapidity that was necessary, it was desirable not to have recourse to any new method of recruiting, but to resort to a mode which prevailed during the war to which the hon. Gentleman has referred, and to see whether we could not draw to our standard those subjects of other countries who were disposed to make common cause with us. I believe that was sound policy, and it became the duty of the Government, after that Bill was passed, to take those measures which they thought most expedient to carry into effect the intention of that enactment. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Mayo says, that the first step in this enlistment question was taken by the Colonial Secretary in his despatch dated February, 1855, and addressed to Sir Gaspard le Marchant, in which he suggested that a dépôt should be opened at Halifax for the reception of volunteers. But that, I must state to the House, was an incorrect description. The first movement, it is well known, was made by parties who resided within the United States, many of whom were British subjects, others being Germans who had taken part in the Schleswig-Holstein war, and others foreigners who, from the force of political circumstances, had taken refuge in that country, who wrote to express their desire to take part in the war. Does the hon. Gentleman mean to say that it was not the bounden duty of the Government to write that letter? The Government felt that great caution was necessary in accepting these offers. They were aware of the neutrality laws of the United States, and they were most anxious that nothing should be done to infringe them. They thought it right that the fact of a dépôt being opened at Halifax, where the British Crown had an undoubted right to open a dépôt, should be communicated to Mr. Crampton, at Washington, Mr. Crampton having sent those offers, to which I have alluded, to Her Majesty's Government. They therefore directed Sir Gaspard Le Marchant to place himself in communication with Mr. Crampton, so that Mr. Crampton, knowing everything that was being done, might take care that nothing was done in violation of the sovereign rights or municipal law of the United States. Both Sir Gaspard Le Marchant and Mr. Crampton were enjoined to avoid anything that might be construed into a violation of the laws of the United States. In that spirit the Government acted, and in this spirit they believed that their officers had acted, and they therefore believed that it would be an act of baseness and injustice if, when they were asked to recall them, they had acquiesced in that demand, which would have amounted to an admission that, in the opinion of the British Government, their officers had violated their instructions, and that their assertions were not entitled to credit. They felt assured that their officers had acted up to the letter and spirit of the instructions they had received, and, therefore, Lord Clarendon, in the despatch of April 30, said he felt it to be his duty to abstain from recalling those officers, because there was nothing in his opinion to justify their recall. How did Mr. Crampton act? My hon. and learned Friend the Attorney-General, in the course of his speech, quoted a passage from the correspondence which showed that Mr. Crampton communicated to the Government of the United States the offers made by persons resident in the United States to take service in Her Majesty's army, and here is at once the answer to the hypothetical case put by the hon. and learned Member for Stamford, as to what would be thought by this Government of the conduct of the French Government if, being at war with Russia or any other country, they should, because they were in want of seamen, send steamers to the ports and rivers of England and enlist men in a war to which we were no party, and against a State with which we were at amity? The first answer is, that it would be a direct violation of British law. The distinction between the law of England and the law of the United States has been pointed out by my hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General. No country could take that course without a direct violation of the law of this country. But suppose that it was no direct violation of the law of this country, and suppose that the French Government were to do what it is imagined possible they might do, if at the same time the French Ambassador communicated to Her Majesty's Government that the French Government were anxious to obtain the services of British seamen, and were taking measures to enlist them in their service, and we said, "So long as they respected our laws any seamen were welcome to enlist," the case would be wholly different, and all cause of quarrel between the two countries would be removed. That is precisely what was done by Mr. Crampton with respect to the United States' Government. He made no concealment of the offers of service; he made no concealment of the desire of Her Majesty's Government to avail themselves of those offers; and if he did not enter minutely into all the arrangements, with the view of respecting the laws of the United States, in obtaining the services whether of British subjects or of foreigners, it was because he was impressed with the conviction, that while Mr. Marcy asserted, and very properly asserted, the determination of the United States' Government to enforce the neutrality laws, he would not be anxious to inquire as to what was going on relative to persons like those who went to Nicaragua, who were induced to leave the United States for the purpose of entering the service of the British Crown. That was the spirit in which Mr. Crampton acted, and when criticism is passed upon a single passage of Lord Clarendon's despatches, or on the fact of Mr. Crampton being in communication with persons whose characters are most disreputable, the House will do injustice if it overlooks the general spirit of moderation and friendliness, as well as fairness, which characterised the despatches of Lord Clarendon, and the friendly spirit in which Mr. Crampton acted throughout these transactions. When it was found that persons were engaged in acts which Her Majesty's Minister at Washington and Her Majesty's Government were bound to disavow—when it was found that persons, professing to act with authority they never received from Her Majesty's Government or Mr. Crampton, Her Majesty's Minister at Washington, were doing acts tending to compromise friendly relations between the two countries, and which it was impossible strictly to defend—whatever the letter of the law with regard to enlistment might be, Her Majesty's Government avowed their determination to put an end to the scheme of keeping open a depot at Halifax for the reception of persons desirous of entering the British service. It has been stated in the course of the discussion that no apology or explanation was offered to the United States' Government which could be considered satisfactory. The apology, said to be no apology, does not admit acts to have been done by persons who were under the authority of Her Majesty's Government, because they felt that no act had been done under the authority which gave just cause of complaint; but the terms of the apology were these:—

"The undersigned must, in the first instance, express the regret of Her Majesty's Government if the law of the United States has been in any way infringed by persons acting with or without any authority from them; and it is hardly necessary for the undersigned to assure Mr. Buchanan that any such infringement of the law of the United States is entirely contrary to the wishes and to the positive instructions of Her Majesty's Government."

It was impossible that apology should distinctly admit that the acts done were contrary to the laws of the United States, because we had no evidence to satisfy us of the fact. But we said, the fact may be so, and if so, we regret that such acts have been done. But was that the only passage calculated to remove any dissatisfaction in the United States with regard to these transactions? I think the concluding passage of this despatch is of a character which the House ought to mark in esteeming the spirit by which the Government has been influenced throughout this affair:—

"The undersigned has, however, the honour, in conclusion, to state to Mr. Buchanan that Her Majesty's Government, having reason to think that no precautionary measures, with whatever honesty they might be carried out, could effectually guard against some real or apparent infringement of the law which would give just cause for complaint to the Government of the United States, determined that all proceedings for enlistment should be put an end to, and instructions to that effect were sent out before the undersigned had the honour to receive Mr. Buchanan's note, as the undersigned need hardly say that the advantage which Her Majesty's service might derive from enlistment in North America would not be sought for by Her Majesty's Government if it were supposed to be obtained in disregard of the respect due to the law of the United States."

Now, I ask the House whether the whole tone and spirit of that despatch is not an apology for any acts done in contravention of the law of the United States, though we were not aware of any such act; and whether the conclusion of it did not intimate that we would forego all the advantages we were likely to obtain from the zeal of certain persons in the United States to enter into our service, and take part in the contest in which we were engaged, rather than risk the occurrence of any circumstance which might give just cause of dissatisfaction to the United States? A good deal has been said as to the effect of that despatch on Mr. Buchanan, and my noble Friend has been accused of misrepresenting the feeling produced by that despatch. What are the facts of the case? Mr. Buchanan, to whom that despatch was addressed, made but a short answer. He did not enter into argument whether the line taken by Her Majesty's Government was likely to give satisfaction, nor did he controvert the statement of Lord Clarendon; but he answered thus:—

"The undersigned Envoy Extraordinary and Minister Plenipotentiary of the United States has the honour to acknowledge the receipt of the note which the Earl of Clarendon, Her Majesty's Principal Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, addressed to him on the 16th inst., in answer to his note of the 6th inst., on the subject of the enlistment and employment of soldiers for the British army within the United States; and the undersigned will have much satisfaction in transmitting a copy of his Lordship's note to the Secretary of State by the next steamer."

If that stood alone, I should say Mr. Buchanan was satisfied with the explanation given by Her Majesty's Government—with their apology, in case any acts had been done in violation of the United States' law, and the decision they had come to to abandon all these proceedings, to avoid any cause of offence. But it did not stand alone. That despatch was crossed by one on its passage to this country from Mr. Marcy to Mr. Buchanan, insisting on satisfaction, in ignorance of the explanation and apology it contained. Mr. Buchanan received that despatch of Mr. Marcy, but did not think it necessary to give it to Lord Clarendon, although he was directed to do so; and it is impossible to doubt that he abstained from so doing because he felt that the despatch, which, as he terms it, "he should have great satisfaction in transmitting to his own Government," was likely to terminate, and, as we think, ought to have terminated the whole affair. To show the spirit in which we received the remonstrances of the United States' Government, and our anxiety to avoid everything which could give just cause of offence, I will read a few lines of the despatch of Lord Clarendon to Mr. Crampton, on the 16th of November, in which he says—

"Before I proceed to offer any remarks upon this despatch, it will be proper to state that when it was read to me by Mr. Buchanan, I had no cognizance of Mr. Marcy's despatch of the 15th of July, to which it alludes, and of which a copy was also transmitted to you; and upon my observing this to Mr. Buchanan, he said he had not thought it necessary to communicate it to me, as before it had reached him he had received my note of the 16th of July, which he thought would finally settle the question that had arisen between the two Governments."

Now, I think this passage clearly shows that the impression made upon Mr. Buchanan's mind by the receipt of the despatch from which I have quoted was, that it ought and would terminate the whole affair, and that he concurred in thinking the conciliatory course we had taken, out of deference to the opinions of the Government of the United States, would be entirely satisfactory and remove all cause of complaint or remonstrance. I know it is said subsequent transactions occurred, but the whole rests on no other foundation than that some persons were paid who had gone to Halifax with the expectation of being received as recruits in Her Majesty's service and were not so received in consequence of the determination to abandon the scheme altogether, in deference to the feeling of the United States' Government. Money was paid to them, not for the purpose of enlisting them in Her Majesty's service, or for the purposes of inducing them to go anywhere, but merely to reimburse them for their loss of time and expenses incurred in a fruitless journey. I will not read the despatch which counterbalances that read by the hon. and learned Member for Stamford (Sir F. Thesiger) and which he thinks not at all calculated to maintain friendly relations, but I may say that it was an answer to a despatch of a character not very friendly to Her Majesty's Government. Looking at the despatch of the 30th of April, and the despatch the other day sent to Mr. Dallas, I think that while Her Majesty's Government have been jealous of the honour and dignity of this country they have shown an earnest desire to maintain unimpaired the friendly relations of the two countries. They have done nothing by any hasty, harsh, or even unguarded expression which places them in the wrong, in case any of these affairs shall not be brought to a satisfactory and peaceful result, and I believe that the effect of the despatch of the 30th of April was most satisfactory in the United States, although it did not produce in the mind of the President the effect with which it was hoped the assertions of Mr. Crampton and the consuls, as to their not having violated the laws of the country, would have been received. Her Majesty's Government felt that those assertions were entitled to infinitely greater weight than the evidence adduced against those Gentlemen. That evidence has been completely thrown over to-night. Every Gentleman has said that the characters of the witnesses were such that they could not be believed upon their oaths, and no Gentleman has ventured to quote anything said by them, unless it was corroborated by some evidence of an unimpeachable character. It had been exultingly stated that the evidence connecting Mr. Crampton with these proceedings showed that he had been in communication with Stroebel and Hertz. No doubt the fact was so; but those persons, when they first came forward to interfere in this matter, were utterly unknown to Mr. Crampton, to Sir Gaspard le Marchant, and the other officers of Her Majesty's Government. They professed to be in pursuit of a legitimate object, and as there was no immediate means of ascertaining their character, their integrity was taken for granted, and it was never suspected that they would turn out to be men undeserving of credit whose object was to entrap the English Minister. The friendly feeling of the British Government, and their unwillingness to do anything that could give just cause of offence to the Americans, were evident on the face of every despatch that had issued from the Foreign Office, and in none were they more conspicuous than in that despatch in which Lord Clarendon intimated that if any recruits had been enlisted in a manner contrary to the laws of the United States they should be sent back without delay. But it did not appear that, in point of fact, there were any such recruits; for the few who had been enlisted were men who had come forward freely and of their own accord, and without persuasion or compulsion from any quarter. The intentions of Her Majesty's Government throughout these transactions, and the motive of their conduct, should be inferred from the general tone and spirit of their correspondence rather than from particular passages carefully selected to make out a case against them. A candid review of all the circumstances connected with the subject would not fail to lead to the conclusion that they had been animated throughout by the best intentions, and that they had had no deliberate purpose of violating either the municipal laws or the sovereign rights of the United States. It was to be hoped that the House would view the question, not with passion or prejudice, but rather by the calm, clear light of reason; and if they did so they would scarcely be prepared to condemn the Government for not having taken the extreme course recommended by the hon. and learned Member for Stamford and others—that of dismissing the American Minister at the Court of St. James's—a gentleman with whom we had no personal cause of offence, and whose presence was desirable in the interests of both countries, inasmuch as he was authorised to enter into negotiations with Her Majesty's Government for the settlement of various important questions. No doubt it was the bounden duty of Her Majesty's Ministers to uphold the honour of the country, but they should also act with forethought and manly prudence, and it would ill become them to plunge two kindred nations in the horrors of war through hasty and ill-considered notions of dignity. The House would most faithfully interpret the feelings of the country by declaring that the national honour was entirely untouched, and that the Government in adopting moderate and conciliatory counsels had acted in the manner best calculated to promote the interests of both nations.

SIR FREDERIC THESIGER: Sir, I just wish to correct an error into which the right hon. Baronet fell, in supposing that we complain of the Government for not resenting the indignity offered to them—for not retaliating on the Government of the United States for sending back Mr. Crampton by dismissing Mr. Dallas. We never stated anything of the kind. What we stated was this—that by the conduct of the Government in infringing the laws of the United States in the way they had done, the Government have compelled us to submit patiently to the insult that has been offered us.

SIR JOHN WALSH moved the adjournment of the debate.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he objected to an adjournment. He considered that there was ample time to bring the discussion to a satisfactory conclusion that evening.

Motion made and Question put, "That the debate be now adjourned."

Question again proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

SIR JOHN WALSH said, that considering the lateness of the hour, and the certainty that the debate must be adjourned, the exultation of hon. Members opposite at the result of the division was, he thought, rather misplaced. They had not yet heard many leading Members of that House, to whose opinions the country, as well as that House, looked with interest upon a subject so important. None of his right hon. Friends near him, nor several hon. and right hon. Gentlemen opposite, to whom the House always listened with interest, had as yet spoken, and therefore he did not think he had been premature, at twelve o'clock, in moving the adjournment of the debate. However, since the House has resolved to continue the discussion at this late hour, he bowed to its decision, and would briefly state the reasons which must oblige him to vote for the Motion. It must be remembered that it emanated from an hon. Member with whom he (Sir J. Walsh) had no political sympathies, nor should he, perhaps, in the delicate state of our American relations, have himself originated such an one. But, it having been brought forward, he had no option but to express an opinion upon it, however reluctantly. Finding that his vote was asked upon the question, whether the conduct of the Government in its transactions with the United States was such as to meet the approbation of that House, and whether it had been such as to maintain the honour of the country, he should not shrink from expressing his opinions. Having listened to all the arguments that had been put forth on behalf of the Government, he could not withhold his support to the Motion of the hon. Gentleman (Mr. G. H. Moore). The hon. and learned Attorney General seemed to regard the dismissal of our Minister by the American Government as a proceeding in no degree offensive towards this country. Unless, however, such an act were based on some sufficient reason, it must be an insult either to the Minister individually, or to the nation which he represented. It was one thing if our Minister had become distasteful to the Court to which he was accredited for some reason of a purely personal nature; and quite another thing if the offence laid to his charge was the adoption of a particular policy in the discharge of his official functions. In the latter case it became a question, whether his conduct had been authorised by his Government. If it had been so authorised, the fault did not lie at the door of the Minister, but at that of the Government of which he was but the instrument. Be that, however, as it might, our Government, by permitting Mr. Dallas to remain, had, he apprehended, acquiesced in the slight cast upon them by the United States. Without condemning their conduct in Mr. Dallas's regard, it was yet obvious that their only justification for not dismissing the American Minister was, that they felt they had been in the wrong towards his country, and that the indignity offered to us was merited by their own laches. If two private individuals quarrelled, one of them might frankly admit that he had been in fault, and accept the reproof administered to him in consequence; but if the rebuke was undeserved, his submission would be pusillanimous. The position of our Government appeared to be that of men who felt that they had been in the wrong, and they were in this paradoxical position, that their having been in the wrong in the original dispute furnished their only excuse for submitting to the mortifying reproof of Mr. Crampton's dismissal. The speech of the right hon. Baronet the Secretary of State for the Home Department had been from beginning to end, in his opinion, nothing but an ingenious piece of special pleading. The right hon. Gentleman had laboured to establish a distinction between the evasion of the law of the United States and a direct infraction of its letter. The President and Mr. Marcy both declared the systematic evasion of their neutrality by our enlistment agents to be as great an affront as its open infringement; and certainly an adroit and even successful evasion of the spirit of her neutrality laws could not be regarded as the fulfilment of the obligations due from one friendly State to another. He was, therefore, forced to vote for the Motion of the hon. Gentleman the Member for Mayo, for he felt that the conduct of the Government had placed this country in a humiliating position before the world. By acquiescing in the dismissal of Mr. Crampton, they had acknowledged themselves to be in the wrong; and an expression of opinion on the part of that House under those circumstances, so far from throwing obstacles in the way of a satisfactory adjustment of the differences between the two countries, was calculated, he believed, to facilitate that happy issue.

Sir Frederic Thesiger

Mr. MILNER GIBSON then moved the adjournment of the debate.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, that if the Motion for an adjournment was to be repeated in that way at that time of night, he could have no alternative but to agree to it: yet he would do so on the distinct understanding that the discussion should be resumed to-morrow.

GRAND JURY ASSESSMENT (IRELAND) BILL.

Order for Third Reading read.

Bill read 3^o.

On the Question that the Bill do pass.

COLONEL FRENCH proposed some additional clauses, which, after some brief conversation, were withdrawn.

Mr. MACARTNEY proposed a Clause relative to the duties of a contractor for any county work or the repair of roads, and also defining the powers of the country surveyor.

Clause was added to the Bill.

Mr. FORTESCUE moved to insert, after clause 3, the following clause:—

"In making such applotment, the treasurer shall omit therefrom every tenement consisting wholly or in part of a dwelling-house, the total annual valuation of which tenement, as set forth in such final list or in such revised valuation as aforesaid, shall not exceed the sum of three pounds.

Clause brought up, and read 1^o.

Mr. MACARTNEY opposed the clause. He did not think it would work well.

LORD NAAS and the ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND also opposed the clause.

Motion made, and Question put, "That the clause be now read a second time."

Another Clause added.

Bill passed.

The House adjourned at Two o'clock.

BURIAL ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

Moved, That the Bill be now read 2^a.

THE ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY was understood to say that he entertained strong objections to some of the clauses of this measure, which involved questions of much gravity and importance connected with the recognised rights of the clergy; and suggested that the Bill should be referred to a Select Committee upstairs.

Amendment moved to leave out from "That" to the end of the Motion, and insert "The Burial Acts be referred to a Select Committee, to consider and report thereon to the House."

LORD PORTMAN agreed that the course recommended by the most rev. Prelate was likely to avoid a very disagreeable discussion. He (Lord Portman) could have no objection to submit the question before their Lordships to a Select Committee, and he trusted that the result would be a restoration of that harmony which existed before the present unfortunate course of legislation embodied in the Burial Acts was adopted. He should be sorry that any hasty attempt at amendment should lead to an extension of ill-will, and he was therefore ready to withdraw this Bill and submit the whole subject to a Select Committee.

THE EARL OF MALMESBURY entirely agreed with his noble Friend opposite (Lord Portman), that the course suggested by the most rev. Prelate was the best that could be adopted under the circumstances. There was only one serious object in view, and that was to prevent any increase of dissension in the course pursued. He hoped that when the Select Committee met upstairs, difficulties might be arranged. Afterwards, those who were fond of discussion and polemics would get the Act of Parliament instead.

LORD REDESDALE said, the principle involved in this Bill was one which he hoped no noble Lord would for a moment support. He was surprised that any one of their Lordships should propose such a Bill, the effect of which was to make the Secretary of State judge of what the Bishops ought to do in a matter purely ecclesiastical; and, further, to enact that when a burial-ground had been so constituted as not to meet with the approbation of the Bishop of the diocese, or of the Archbishop of the province, the Secretary of State might approve it.

Motion, as amended, agreed to; and the Bill was (by leave of the House), withdrawn.

EXPENSES OF SCOTCH AND IRISH PEERS.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE rose to call the attention of the House to the heavy expenses incurred by Irish Peers in proving their right to vote for Representative Peers. The Fourth Article of the Act of Legislative Union thus describes the persons who should vote for Representative Peers :—

“ Every temporal Peer of Ireland who shall have sat, and voted in the House of Lords for Ireland, and whose right to sit and vote therein shall have been admitted by the House, before or after the Union.”

To the former class it was not necessary for him to refer, as only two Irish Peers existed who sat in the Irish House of Lords before the Union. The great majority of the present constituency of the elective Peers of Ireland were persons who had proved their right to vote. He submitted that the expenses of proving their claims were both excessive and unnecessary. In order to show that those expenses were excessive, he would adduce the course of proceeding when an English Peer took his seat. He merely sent a simple document to the Lord Chancellor to show his right; and, the Lord Chancellor satisfied, he took his seat. In the case of a son succeeding his father, the whole expense scarcely exceeds £5. The Irish Peer, on the contrary, had to adduce evidence before the Committee for Privileges of his right. He (the Earl of Donoughmore) was present on a Committee for Privileges, when a noble Earl proved his right to vote as an Irish Peer. The case was rather complicated. The pedigree was produced for a considerable number of years, involving several lines of descent; a number of persons, clergymen, both of the Establishment and of the Roman Catholic Church, produced the registers; and unless those had been produced, the claim to vote would not have been substantiated. The expense of bringing witnesses from a great distance in these cases was very great; and a serious question, he urged, was involved in the circumstance. The Irish Peerage was closely approaching the position contemplated by the Act of Union. The number of Irish Peers, including those who had not as well as those who had proved their right to vote for representative Peers, was 123. It was plain that it was the intention of the Act that the Irish Peers should be kept up to a certain number; but the expense was now beginning to interfere with that intention and setting it aside. In many cases, where there was no doubt whatever, the claimants were deterred by the expense from proving their claims. He did think that there existed nothing which should prevent the Irish Peers entitled to vote for Representative Peers, being put in as favourable a position for proving their right as British Peers enjoyed for proving their right to seats in that House. He would ask their Lordships to appoint a Select Committee to inquire into the subject, and to report what could be done to remedy this manifest injustice to a large class of Members of that House—for many of their Lordships, though sitting as English Peers, possessed votes for Irish Representative Peers, and were therefore as deeply interested in this subject as the whole body of Irish Peers. The noble Earl concluded by moving that a Select Committee be appointed to inquire into the expenses incurred by Scotch and Irish Peers in proving their right to vote for Representative Peers.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that he quite admitted that it was desirable to reduce the expenses incurred by Irish Peers; but it was quite impossible to adopt the course suggested by the noble Earl without passing an Act of Parliament, because the Act of Union provided that the claims of the Irish Peers were to be determined by the House of Lords. In the case of English Peers this was different. They had merely to go to the Lord Chancellor, representing not that House, but the Crown; and if he, on the part of the Crown, saw no difficulty, the writ of summons was issued. He did not think that it would be possible to reduce the expenses of proving a claim to vote for the Representative Peers of Ireland as low as those now incurred by English Peers on taking their seat, but he fully concurred in the propriety of appointing a Committee to inquire into the subject, and to ascertain what reductions could be effected.

VISCOUNT DUNGANNON corroborated the statement made by the noble Earl—namely, that these heavy expenses deterred many Peers from claiming their right to vote. He thought the matter was well worthy of their Lordships' consideration, and he was sure the Irish Peers in general, whatever might be the result of this inquiry, would feel greatly indebted to the noble Earl (the Earl of Donoughmore) for the part taken by him in this matter.

LORD REDESDALE said, the sole remedy for the evil complained of was an Act of Parliament which should establish some other mode of inquiring into claims made to vote in the election of Irish Representative Peers. But he questioned very much whether it was desirable to relax the evidence now required before claims of this kind were admitted, because a great number of cases of a suspicious character came before a Committee of Privileges.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE said, the case of injustice made out on the part of the Irish Peers had not been in any way answered by the noble Lord. To show how the system worked he might mention his own case. It cost him less than £5 to take his seat as an English Peer, but to prove his right to vote for an Irish Representative Peer cost him £150. He would ask their Lordships whether in these days of financial reform this state of things ought to continue?

Motion agreed to.

PRISONS (IRELAND) BILL.

Order for Committee read.

MR. MACARTNEY rose and said, that whilst he admitted that there was a necessity for an alteration of the law affecting the management of gaols in Ireland, the present measure went further than was desirable, and he trusted the Government would give some assurance before going into Committee that they would not carry out the centralisation principle to the extent to which the Bill proposed to go. The power of framing regulations for the government of gaols was at present vested in the Judges of the Court of Queen's Bench; but by this Bill it was proposed to transfer that power to the Lord Lieutenant, which was virtually to place it in the hands of an irresponsible person—namely, the Chief Inspector of Prisons. Seeing how well and efficiently the gaols in Ireland were now managed in the north, and especially in the province of Ulster, he hoped the Government would not deprive the several boards of management of the jurisdiction they now exercised and possessed.

MR. HORSMAN said, that the object of the Bill was merely to introduce into Ireland that system which already existed in England and in Scotland, by transferring the superintending power over the gaols from the Court of Queen's Bench to the executive. The Bill merely followed the precedent of England and Scotland.

COLONEL FRENCH said, that the fact of transference made all the difference. The Bill was one of a series of most objectionable measures referring to Ireland that were being forced through the House.

COLONEL DUNNE said, that at present the jurisdiction of the Queen's Bench over the prisons was ineffectual, and therefore, in transferring that jurisdiction to the Executive, the Bill might be so far considered an improvement. He thought the House ought to go into Committee on the Bill in order to amend many details which were objectionable.

House in Committee, Mr. FitzRoy in the chair.

Clauses 1 and 2 agreed to.

On Clause 3, which transferred the power of superintendence from the Court of Queen's Bench to the Lord Lieutenant being read,

MR. MACARTNEY said, it had been represented that the Judges of the Queen's Bench had expressed their approval of the transfer of the authority now vested in them ; but he had recently seen a letter from one of their Lordships to the effect that he had taken the opinion of his brother Judges, who not only denied that they had been consulted on the subject, but expressed their disapproval of the power being taken out of their hands. If the clause were passed in its present shape it would give all power, in fact, to Mr. Corry Connellan, the Chief Inspector of Prisons. He would, therefore, move, as an Amendment, that the words "and Privy Council," be inserted after "Lord Lieutenant."

MR. HORSMAN objected to the proposition as contrary to the principle of Executive Government, which should be the same in Ireland as it was in England. He was quite satisfied with the inspectors in Ireland, and he thought they might safely trust to the Lord Lieutenant.

MR. MACARTNEY denied that he had any personal distrust either of the Lord Lieutenant or of the inspectors.

COLONEL DUNNE did not see practically much difference between the Lord Lieutenant in Council and the Lord Lieutenant himself. The Executive must be responsible for the proceedings of the Inspectors General, who could get what was necessary from the Queen's Bench.

COLONEL FRENCH thought the Amendment would be satisfactory to the Irish people.

LORD NAAS highly approved of the transfer from the Court of Queen's Bench. He could only remember one case in which the Queen's Bench ever did anything. As to the difference between the Lord Lieutenant himself and a Council, it practically amounted to nothing at all. But although he approved of the principle of the Bill, he never saw a Bill drawn up so unintelligibly.

Amendment negatived; Clause agreed to.

Clause 4 (Board of Superintendence, with approval of Grand Jury and Lord Lieutenant, to make By-Laws, &c.)

MR. MACARTNEY objected to the mode in which the clause dealt with preceding measures. One of its provisions was to give the Lord Lieutenant control over the by-laws of the gaols. He did not think that this would work. All by-laws ought to be under the control of the boards themselves.

MR. HORSMAN said, that the Bill was not drawn by the present Government, and they thought it the best plan to adopt the Bill, and pass another in the next Session to amend it.

MR. BLAND said, the practical effect of the clause would be to place the whole power of managing the prisons in the inspectors, and take it from the boards of superintendence.

SIR GEORGE GREY: The 26 Geo. IV., c. 38, regulated the government of prisons in England and Wales, and the Secretary of State had by it the power of making rules and regulations. This was to ensure uniformity in those rules. If the Irish Government discharged its duty, the whole power would not, as had been said, rest with the Inspectors of Prisons. He saw no reason why the same power should not rest with the Lord Lieutenant in Ireland as with the Secretary of State in England.

MR. MACARTNEY said, if there were the same kind of officer in the Irish Office as there was in the Secretary of State's Office in England, he would be perfectly content; but unfortunately there was no such officer to whom the Irish country gentlemen could refer.

CAPTAIN MAGAN objected to the arbitrary forms of the clause.

COLONEL FRENCH said, if the object of the Bill was to assimilate the Irish to the English law, why were not the words of the English statute quoted by the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Home Department put into this Bill?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, the provisions in the Statute he had quoted were analogous to those in the present Bill, though not the ipsissima verba.

Question put, "That the words 'and it shall be lawful for the Lord Lieutenant' stand part of the clause."

The Committee divided: — Ayes 66; Noes 9: Majority 57.

MR. MACARTNEY said, that their only object was to preserve the right of the boards of superintendence. He proposed, therefore, that if the Lord Lieutenant required any alteration in the by-laws, he should submit a proposal to that effect to the board. He should move an Amendment to that effect on bringing up the Report.

MR. HORSMAN thought this contrary to the principle followed in England.

COLONEL FRENCH moved to omit the word "repeal," so as to give no more power to the Lord Lieutenant than that given to the Secretary of State in England.

MR. HORSMAN objected to the Amendment, which was negatived without a division.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 5 to 9 were then agreed to.

Clause 10 agreed to, after a short discussion.

Remaining clauses agreed to.

House resumed.

Bill reported, as amended.

DUBLIN METROPOLITAN POLICE BILL— ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order for resuming Adjourned Debate on Second Reading [9th June] read.

COLONEL FRENCH asked the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for Ireland whether it was right to force this Bill upon the city of Dublin, when its inhabitants had made such strong representations against the objectionable powers the Bill would give, especially to the Commissioners of Police?

MR. MAGUIRE thought nothing could be more fair than the offer which had been made on the part of the corporation of the city of Dublin to refer the Bill to a Select Committee. It was impossible at this late period of the Session to pass such a Bill, considering the strong opposition that existed against it.

MR. BEAMISH said, he did not see the use of referring the Bill to a Select Committee.

LORD NAAS said, his right hon. Friend on a former occasion had stated that this Bill was merely a consolidation of the existing laws; but the city of Dublin distinctly denied that statement. He certainly, himself, understood that there were decidedly new provisions in the Bill of a very important character. Considerable additional power would be given to the Commissioners of Police in regard to the licensing system. It was, therefore, not correct to say that it was merely a consolidation Bill. He thought the Bill ought to be referred to a Select Committee.

MR. HORSMAN regretted that so strong a feeling of opposition should exist against this measure, and he did so the more because every objection that had been taken only showed how completely in the dark hon. Gentlemen were as to the provisions and object of the Bill. He would repeat that it was a consolidation Bill, and nothing else. If any hon. Member could show that any new power was contained in it, so far was it from the intention of the Government that it should be so that in Committee he would strike out any such power. At the same time, no doubt, the corporation of the city of Dublin, from misconception, entertained a strong hostility against the measure, and as it appeared to be the general opinion on the part of Irish Members that the Bill could not be passed into a law this Session, he did not think, under the circumstances, he should be justified in taking up the time of the House in discussing the measure further. He therefore moved that the order for the second reading be discharged.

COLONEL LAKE AND COLONEL TEESDALE—QUESTION.

MR. OLIVEIRA rose to ask Her Majesty's Government whether some substantial mark of approbation might not be given to Lieutenant Colonel Lake and Lieutenant Colonel Teesdale for their distinguished services at Kars?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON was understood to say that Colonel Lake's position as a colonel in the army would enable him to receive the Order of the Bath; but it was not usual, as he had observed on a former occasion, to recommend Parliament to make any pecuniary provision for any officers except those who had the good fortune to be at the head of the forces by which a distinguished achievement was accomplished.

HOUSEBREAKING IN SCOTLAND— QUESTION.

MR. COWAN asked the Lord Advocate if his attention had been drawn to the recent alarming increase of the crime of housebreaking, caused, as he believed, by the ticket-of-leave system, in certain parts of Scotland, and to the difficulty hitherto experienced in its suppression; and whether, under those circumstances, it was the intention of the Government, by the revocation of tickets of leave, by the establishment of a Scottish constabulary, or otherwise, to afford a greater measure of security to property than was at present possessed in some districts of Scotland?

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he knew nothing of the circumstance referred to by the hon. Gentleman, except that, according to the newspapers, last year a great many cases of housebreaking occurred, but all the depredators had, he believed, been apprehended. The subject of the ticket-of-leave system was now under the consideration of a Committee of the House ; and with regard to the establishment of a Scottish constabulary, the subject was now under the consideration of the Government.

DEPARTMENT OF PUBLIC JUSTICE.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER moved that the notices of Motion be postponed till after the adjourned debate on the Amendment for going into Committee of Supply.

MR. NAPIER said, he had had a Motion on the paper since the Easter recess for an Address, praying Her Majesty to take into consideration the formation of a separate and responsible department of public justice, and he thought it rather hard that no opportunity had been afforded him of bringing it before the House. On the 12th of February a Resolution had been agreed to—

“ That, in the opinion of this House, as a measure of administrative reform, provision should be made with a view to secure the skilful preparation and proper structure of Parliamentary Bills and promote the progressive amendment of the laws of the United Kingdom.”

Since that time the Statute Law Commissioners had presented their Report, in which they recommended the appointment of a single responsible person to superintend the amendment of the law, with adequate assistance, nothing had been done, and our legislation had been getting worse and worse.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, the right hon. Gentleman was not correct in saying that nothing had been done since the date to which the right hon. and learned Gentleman referred. If the debate for the adjournment of which the right hon. and learned Gentleman had voted had been concluded last night, the right hon. and learned Gentleman might now have brought forward his Motion, and his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Duchy of Lancaster, who was a member of the Statute Law Commission, would have stated what the Government had done and what they proposed to do. If the right hon. and learned Gentleman would on a future day put a question on the subject, his right hon. Friend would make a statement which would enable the right hon. and learned Gentleman to judge whether it would be worth while to bring forward his Motion, but it would be quite impossible for the Government to allow that Motion at once to be carried.

Motion agreed to.

The Lord Advocate

OUR RELATIONS WITH THE UNITED STATES — ADJOURNED DEBATE (SECOND NIGHT).

Order read for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to be made to Question [30th June]—

“ That Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair ;” and which Amendment was to leave out from the word “ That ” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words “ the conduct of Her Majesty’s Government, in the differences that have arisen between them and the Government of the United States, on the question of enlistment, has not entitled them to the approbation of this House,” instead thereof.

Debate resumed.

MR. MILNER GIBSON, who said that he had ventured to move the adjournment of the debate last night because he felt that whatever doubt might exist as to the propriety of this discussion coming on at all, there could be no doubt that, if once the discussion was commenced, it ought not to be prematurely or abruptly concluded, and that all Members, either on one side of the House or the other, who were desirous of speaking, should have an opportunity of stating their views. Some hon. Gentlemen had made an appeal to the hon. Member for Mayo not to bring on the Motion, feeling that no good would arise from the discussion, and that perhaps some evil would be occasioned by it. He confessed that he was reluctant himself, on other grounds, that the Motion should come on ; but he could not conceal from himself that there was no Parliamentary ground whatever for shrinking from the fullest discussion. Whenever a Minister of the Crown laid papers before Parliament and correspondence with foreign Governments at the close of a negotiation, he by that act invited the opinion of Parliament, and any hon. Member was at liberty to bring those papers under consideration. Therefore he did not think that the Government had any right to complain of hon. Members discussing this question. If publicity were objectionable in reference to these recruiting proceedings in the United States, the Government should not have courted publicity by laying these papers before the world ; but that having been done, it might be pretended by some that silence on the part of Parliament implied acquiescence in the course taken. At any rate, as the Motion was now before the House, it was impossible for any Gentleman, anxious on public affairs, to feel it to be consistent with his duty to shrink from recording his vote on the subject. What was the nature of the Motion? The House was called on to say whether the operations carried on in America by Her Majesty's Government, for the purpose of raising soldiers to serve the Queen of this country, met with its approval; whether the policy was wise, of going to the United States in search of soldiers; and, if wise, whether that policy was judiciously and properly conducted? He was one of those who was opposed altogether to the Foreign Enlistment Act. He believed it to be unsound in principle, and he entertained a strong conviction, looking at the state of the municipal laws of the countries to which recourse was likely to be had for men, that any attempt to act on it would lead to serious international disputes. He expressed that conviction at the time, but he admitted that, as the question now stood, he was not to allow his opinion on the Foreign Enlistment Act, which received the deliberate assent of Parliament, to bias his judgment in reference to the conduct of the Administration in endeavouring to give effect to that Act of Parliament. No doubt it was the duty of the Executive—Parliament having consented to pass the Bill into law—to give effect in some form to the intentions of the Legislature. Nevertheless, he understood the right hon. Gentleman the Home Secretary to insinuate that hon. Members would be influenced by their opinions with respect to that Act in forming a judgment on the conduct of the Government, and he thought the right hon. Gentleman said that the speech of the hon. Member for Inverness-shire was one which might have been, and probably was, delivered against the Foreign Enlistment Act. There was a statement of the right hon. Gentleman in his speech last night, in reference to the Blue-book, in which he could not concur. The right hon. Gentleman said that the friendly feeling of the British Government, and their unwillingness to do anything to give just cause of offence to the American Government, were evident on the face of every despatch issued from the Foreign Office. The right hon. Gentleman added:—

"They have done nothing by any hasty, harsh, or even unguarded expression which places them in the wrong, in case any of these affairs shall not be brought to a satisfactory and peaceful result."

Such was the description which the Home Secretary gave of the contents of the Blue-book, but he could not concur in thinking it a true description. On the contrary, he found passages in the despatches of Lord Clarendon than which he could conceive nothing more insulting to the United States of America, or more calculated to produce irritation and bad feeling. He found in a despatch from Lord Clarendon to Mr. Crampton, dated November 10, 1855, that the former stated:—

"Mr. Buchanan called at this office some days ago, and in a very friendly manner asked me if I should object to inform him why such large reinforcements had been sent to the British squadron on the West India station, as he was apprehensive that when the intelligence reached the United States, it would cause considerable excitement, and tend to increase the feelings of irritation which already existed in that country. I told Mr. Buchanan that I had no difficulty in answering his inquiry with perfect frankness, and that I would, in the first place, assure him that there was no intention on the part of Her Majesty's Government to attack or menace the United States, but that, as we had reason to believe that ships were fitting out for Russia in the ports of the United States, and that a great conspiracy was in progress there for the purpose of promoting insurrection in Ireland, as we knew that a United States' ship had lately taken soundings in the ports of most of the British West India colonies, and that the commander of that ship had privately made minute inquiries respecting the state of the defences and garrisons in those colonies; and as we had received a note from Mr. Marcy to Mr. Crampton, couched in terms so unfriendly that it appeared to indicate a fixed purpose on the part of the United States' Government to provoke a quarrel between the two countries, Her Majesty's Government had thought it their duty to take measures for the protection of British interests against any attack that might be made upon them, and to be prepared for events which they had done nothing to provoke, and which they would still do their utmost to avert."

Now, he denied that it was true that ships were fitting out for Russia in the ports of the United States. The charge was made by Mr. Barclay, British Consul, that one barque ship was fitting out as a privateer for Russia; information was laid to that effect, and the United States' Government at once caused inquiry to be made, and it was found that Mr. Barclay had been misled; that the ship had been advertised for some time in the newspapers as an ordinary merchant vessel; the trade in which she was about to be engaged was ascertained, and Mr. Barclay published in the newspapers a public apology to the effect that he was mistaken, and that there was no foundation for the charge he had brought. Therefore, that statement in Lord Clarendon's despatch was erroneous, and was founded on misinformation; and to state that, on such a ground, the British Government were about to send out an increase of force, was insulting to a friendly nation. He denied, too, that a great conspiracy was in progress to promote insurrection in Ireland. He denied that such an imputation was properly applicable to the Irish population in the United States of America. A great conspiracy was talked about in a written despatch, about to be followed by an armed invasion of Ireland. Would any man in that House stand up and say on his conscience he believed that? If this were true it was grave indeed, but if it were not true—and the United States did not believe it to be true—could they feel otherwise than deeply aggrieved that it should impute to them that they were allowing this great conspiracy to go on within their territories, and that it should be thought necessary that British men-of-war should be sent to watch their conduct, in order to prevent a hostile aggression from their shores? The fourth charge was, that the commander of an American man-of-war had been taking soundings in most of our West Indian ports. This was an old story. Just before the panic of a French invasion was raised, somebody was reported to have been taking soundings on the coast of Scotland, and there was always some tale of the sort flying about when it was thought necessary to excite apprehension in the mind of the British public. The only meaning which this insinuation could have was, that the United States' Government were contemplating a descent upon our West India Islands, but he declared most solemnly that he did not believe the American Government had ever had any such intention. He could not, therefore, agree with the Government that there was nothing irritating or provoking to the American Government in these Blue-books. On the contrary, charges of this kind were calculated to produce feelings of alienation, to prevent the success of negotiations, and seriously to disturb the good relations between the two countries. The defence of the Government with reference to the particular matter now before the House was, that they had been entirely right in whatever they had done in the United States, that they had broken neither international law nor the municipal law of the country. That was the position taken by the Attorney General, and by the right hon. Baronet the Home Secretary. Seeing, however, that we had got into scrapes in other countries as well as in the United States in this matter of enlistment—seeing that the Prussian Government had taken a much stronger course than the United States' Government, and without troubling itself about writing despatches and withdrawing exequaturs, had put our consul into prison—and that at the Hanse Towns our agents had been very roughly handled, it was just possible that we might have been mistaken in our view of the American law. It certainly would be very strange, to say the least of it, if Prussia, the Hanse Towns, Switzerland, and the United States were all wrong in their interpretation of their own municipal laws, and if we were the only persons who could put a proper construction upon them. Our Government had put their own construction upon the United States' law, and upon that construction they felt at liberty to assert that they had not broken that law. This was a most convenient mode of proceeding. There was no act which a man might not commit if he were allowed to justify himself by pleading that his interpretation of the law which he was alleged to have broken differed from that of his accusers. All that we had done, according to the Government, was "to disseminate information" to those men who were invited to enlist in the British forces. We had gone into the United States with our agents, not to hire or retain any person to go to Canada to enlist in our army, but only to circulate information as to the advantages which persons might obtain by leaving the United States and going to Canada to enlist in the British Foreign Legion. That was all our proceedings had amounted to, according to the Attorney General. Suppose a voter were told, "If you vote for Mr. So-and-So you will receive £10"—that was merely "disseminating information," it implied no contract, and voting was a perfectly legal act; but he doubted whether the Attorney General would put such a charitable construction on that proceeding as he had put on the acts of our agents in the United States. It was obvious that our Government, to suit their own purposes, had put a construction on the American law which rendered it inoperative, but the American Government had put a construction on it, very rationally, which made it operative. They said that no foreign Government should come into the United States to put themselves into communication with individual persons residing within their territory for the purpose of persuading those persons to leave the United States to enlist in a foreign army. That was the obvious and common sense view of the American law. The right hon. Baronet the Home Secretary had told the House on the previous evening that nobody had been persuaded, but that the very few men (and very few they appeared to be) who had entered our service were men who had come forward freely, of their own accord, without any persuasion from any quarter. The right hon. Gentleman must have been misinformed on this point. Lord Clarendon, in his despatch of November 16, 1855, laid it down distinctly that we had an incontestable right to persuade men to leave the United States to enlist in the Foreign Legion, and that we had a right to make promises to them to induce them to leave the United States; and, if that were so, why should the Home Secretary attempt to deny that there had been any persuasion? He believed, on the contrary, that there had been persuasion, and he differed entirely from the doctrine of the Foreign Secretary that we had a right, according either to international or municipal law, to pursue that system of persuasion. If we could go into the United States with our agents and organise an extensive system of persuading men to leave that country to enlist in our army, then we could exercise there all the powers which the United States' Government could exercise, and, being at war at the same time that the United States were at war, we might enter into competition with their Government with their own territory in raising forces to carry on our war. It was very necessary that the House should be informed whether Lord Clarendon's instructions, that there should be no concealment from the American Government, had been carried out. The hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Moore) had insinuated that he could not discover whether any very direct instructions were ever given to Mr. Crampton to practise no concealment from the American Government. If Lord Clarendon had told Mr. Crampton in the first instance to have no concealment from the American Government he would have been taking a wise course, which, if acted upon, would infallibly have spared us from our present humiliating and difficult position. If Mr. Crampton had told Mr. Marcy how he meant to act—that he meant to have agents throughout the country, that promises would be held out to persons to induce them to leave the United States to go to Canada—and had asked him how such a system would be viewed, he would have been told directly that it was inconsistent with the American law, and that it could not be carried out without giving offence to a considerable portion of the community. Mr. Crampton himself seemed to admit that he had, perhaps, not been without fault in this matter of concealment. He said that on the 22nd of March, the only occasion on which he had any conversation upon the enlistment with Mr. Marcy, he told that Gentleman that applications had been made, and so forth; Mr. Marcy informed him that persons might leave the United States—which of course everybody knew—but that he would enforce the neutrality laws. Mr. Crampton, in his despatch, said that he did not enter upon the bearing of international law, adding, "I can scarcely take blame to myself for not doing so," and then continued:—

"I entirely agree with him, that it was unfortunate that the matter was not mentioned and the difference of our views brought to light. I should not have concurred with his opinion, but I should have thought it matter for grave consideration whether it would not have been better for Her Majesty's Government at once to abandon all idea of accepting aid in soldiers from this country than to run the risk of any difference or unpleasant discussion whatever with the Government of the United States. It is perfectly true that I did not enter into any details of the means which were to be adopted by Her Majesty's Government to render available the services of those who tendered them to us in such numbers. There seemed to be obvious reasons for abstaining from this, even if it had occurred to me. I should have been unwilling to do anything which might have borne the appearance of engaging Mr. Marcy in any expression of favour or approbation of a plan favouring the interests of one of the parties in the present war."

If Mr. Crampton abstained from informing Mr. Marcy of the means by which the services of these men were to be rendered available to the British Government, he, in fact, abstained from telling him anything which was worth knowing. Everybody knew that men had a right to leave the United States, and that the British Government had a right to establish recruiting depôts in Canada or Nova Scotia. The difficulty was, how were men living in the territory of the United States to be brought to these depôts? In not informing Mr. Marcy of the means by which it was proposed to effect that object, Mr. Crampton failed to comply with the instructions of Lord Clarendon,—“above all, have no concealment from Mr. Marcy.”

Had he informed Mr. Marcy of the exact means intended to be employed, Mr. Marcy would have told him that the use of such means was out of the question, and would render it necessary that a prosecution should be instituted against his agents. It was so strongly denied that anything wrong had been done, that he supposed the House must presume that the Government would see no objection to a repetition of these operations. Was that the case? He did not see why he should desist from doing what he had a right to do, and could not understand all the talk about having apologised, and all the wonder that the United States were not satisfied, if we had never done anything wrong. If our acts were to be justified we ought to avow and stand by them. He would not encourage the Government to surrender our rights in any part of the globe; but he did not believe that in the territory of the United States we had any such rights as we had claimed. If there had been no municipal law in existence, if the United States had passed no law with reference to enlistment, the Government of England would have had no right to put itself in communication with the citizens of the United States, for the purpose of levying forces, without the previous consent of their Government. The true view of international law, as he understood it after a perusal of the works of the best writers upon this subject, was, that Governments should correspond with Governments, diplomatists with Ministers of State, but that they should not, through agencies of questionable character, put themselves in communication with individual citizens, in the meantime keeping all their proceedings secret from the Government of the country to which they were accredited. If there were no municipal law at all, one Government must not act within the territories of another in such matters without the full consent of the latter. The right hon. Baronet the Secretary of State for the Home Department said that nothing had been done which was plainly and clearly a violation of the municipal law of America, but he admitted that there had been some money stirring in the business. When he (Mr. Gibson) heard of money payments, he always doubted the voluntary action of those who had come forward. He had recently read a pamphlet published by a gentleman who had been in the United States, and had made accurate inquiries into all these matters, and who said that we had spent between

Mr. Milner Gibson

£30,000 and £40,000, and that the net proceeds of the operations were about thirty-seven Germans, who had therefore cost somewhere about £1,000 a piece. He believed these were the very men who had lately been mutinying in Plymouth, who had disturbed the garrison of that town, and whom the authorities were afraid to trust with their arms in the streets. A more miserable and impotent result it was impossible to conceive; but how Ministers of State could ever recommend that we should go across the Atlantic into the United States in pursuit of Germans, he was at a loss to understand. There was a talk of British subjects and political refugees; but almost the only persons whom attempts were made to obtain in America were for the most part the German emigrants, who, it was said, were in distress, and would be likely to join the German legion. It was very doubtful whether a single British subject was recalled to his standard, as it was called, or whether any person was obtained except these Germans, and, perhaps, some few Poles and Hungarians. The right hon. Baronet the Secretary of State for the Home Department had taken a most extraordinary view of the question. He said,—

“That some persons were paid, who had gone to Halifax with the expectation of being received as recruits in Her Majesty’s service, and were not so received in consequence of the determination to abandon the scheme altogether, in deference to the feeling of the United States’ Government. Money was paid to them, not for the purpose of enlisting them in Her Majesty’s service, or for the purpose of inducing them to go anywhere, but merely to reimburse them for their loss of time and expenses incurred in a fruitless journey.”

So that the House was told that the Government paid not those who enlisted and rendered their services, but those who came too late and were of no use to us. This seemed very strange. How was it possible to conceive that, unless these men had had some previous claim upon the Government, they would, after all recruiting had been given up, have received these payments? He would undertake to say that, when applications were made to the Government for places or employment, and they had none to give, they did not reward the applicants for having made a “fruitless journey.” He very much doubted whether some contract had not been entered into with these men in the United States, and therefore the Government had felt bound to repay them for going to Halifax to join the foreign legion, after the depôt at that place had been abolished. There was, however, pretty direct evidence that there was a contract between the agents of the Government and those persons in the United States. He did not speak particularly of Mr. Crampton. He put Sir Gaspard le Marchant, the Hon. Joseph Howe, and Mr. Crampton all in the same category as having joined together to superintend the carrying out of recruiting operations in the United States. He found among the papers the following letter from the Hon. Joseph Howe to Major Joseph Smolenski:—

“ My dear Sir,—Referring to the conversations which we have had as to the policy of the British Government, as explained to you, and to the wishes of the Gentlemen associated with you, as you have explained them, I have now the honour, by command of the Lieutenant Governor of Nova Scotia, to authorise you to raise in that province a regiment to form part of the foreign legion, upon these terms:—You shall be colonel of the regiment when raised. Mr. Souckorowski shall be major. The commissions of captains and lieutenants will be given to such officers as you may select. The fares and passages of the men will be paid or provided by my agents at Boston or New York. Four dollars per man will be paid to your order in Boston for any man shipped thence. If any, on their arrival, refuse to enlist, you will find another to take his place. Men who are in debt, or who may live beyond New York, may pay their debts or additional expenses by order on the provincial secretary in Nova Scotia, to be deducted from the bounty of thirty dollars which each man is entitled to receive.

“ I have the honour to be, my dear Sir,

“ JOSEPH HOWE.”

“ Major Joseph Smolenski.”

To that letter Major Smolenski replied as follows:—

“ Boston, April 28, 1855.

“ My dear Sir,—I have read the annexed letter, a copy of which has been furnished to me, and I undertake to serve Her Majesty the Queen upon the terms as therein explained.

“ I have, &c.,

“ JOSEPH SMOLENSKI.

“ Hon. Joseph Howe.”

Surely, if ever there was in this world a valid contract for raising a regiment that was one. What, then, could be the use of denying that even persuasion had been used to promote such an object? Here was something far beyond persuasion. If the object contemplated had been legal, the transaction would have involved a contract binding on the respective parties. It would have been a “hiring and retaining” according to the words of the American law, and it required no straining of phraseology to bring it within the terms of that definition. Mr. Mathew, the consul, admitted that he paid money to Hertz. Why did he do so if the latter was nothing more than a self-constituted and unauthorised agent? In the despatch of Consul Mathew to Mr. Crampton, bearing date “Philadelphia, October 13, 1855,” there was a passage which could not be interpreted otherwise than as an admission that Hertz received money from the consul. It ran thus:—

“ At his (Hertz's) earnest request I transmitted a sealed letter to Mr. Howe, and handed him a reply, containing, I believe, money, for which he gave a receipt made out to Mr. Howe, and enclosed by me to him.”

In replying to the despatch from which that sentence was extracted, Mr. Crampton used these remarkable expressions:—

“ I have satisfaction in assuring you that I can see nothing in any of your proceedings in regard to this matter which appears to me to be incorrect or derogatory to your office.”

It was clear, therefore, that Mr. Crampton took upon himself the responsibility of Mr. Mathew's acts, and by approving his conduct made the consul's cause his own. It appeared, moreover, that Hertz was on terms of intimate familiarity with Mr. Mathew, and occasionally burst in upon him with ludicrous abruptness. Mr. Mathew, in his despatch of October 13th, wrote—

“ On one occasion he forced himself into my presence without sending up his name, in my bedroom, stated he was going on most important business to see Mr. Howe at New York, and ended by asking me, under many oaths and protestations, to lend him as a private loan 50 dollars, which I did to get rid of him. He has not fulfilled his pledge of repayment.”

Assuming that Hertz was not in the pay of the British consul, how could an incident such as this have possibly happened? Had the Government incurred expense in defending Hertz and his associates in the American Courts? Had they wrangled about law points with the law officers of the United States, and spent much of the public money in carrying on what Mr. Marcy had properly designated as “most unseemly contests?” It were much to be wished that some Member of the Government would rise in his place and authoritatively deny that they had done so; for if these men had been defended by the Government, and if the Government had incurred expense in that respect, such a course of proceeding must be regarded as a practical avowal that the men were to all intents and purposes their agents, and that for their acts they (the Government) were responsible. But, in truth, the matter was so clear as not to admit of controversy.

Mr. Crampton had himself confessed that he had furnished Stroebel with money, and sent him into the United States to procure recruits. The sums were said to be trifling, and the exact purpose to which the money was to be applied was not stated in Mr. Crampton's confession, but to give money to a man like Stroebel, and to tell him that he might have a carte blanche to wander through the States in search of recruits, was to render himself responsible for Stroebel's proceedings. Whatever that man's character might be, he was for all practical purposes the servant and agent of Mr. Crampton. In his despatch to Lord Clarendon, dated Washington, November 27, 1855, Mr. Crampton made the following singular statement:—

"I arrived at Halifax on the 11th day of that month. It was here that Stroebel, who had already brought with him some men from New York and Boston, and who appeared to be well acquainted with the condition and desires of his own countrymen in the United States, positively asserted that he knew many hundreds of Germans in the cities and country in the vicinity of the Great Lakes who only required to be informed of where they could be received in Canada, and to be supplied with the small sum which would cover their travelling expenses, immediately to present themselves on British territory for enrolment in Her Majesty's service. That plan was adopted."

From that it was manifestly to be inferred that Stroebel was authorised by Mr. Crampton, and supplied with money to raise recruits in various districts of the United States. That proceeding he (Mr. Gibson) deemed to be contrary, not only to the spirit, but to the letter of the American law, and he very much regretted that Her Majesty's Government should have mixed up this country in such transactions. He could conscientiously assert that, as an Englishman, he deeply deplored it. If he were now a traveller in the United States, he should feel that his Government had involved him in the liability of some unpleasant remarks being made to him; for, unfortunately, every Englishman abroad was compromised by the conduct of his Government. He repudiated most emphatically the proceedings of the Government, and greatly lamented that any attempt had been made to raise men in America, and that, when that policy was decided on, the Government had not pursued a candid course, and put themselves in frank communication with Mr. Marcy and the other American Ministers. It had been said that Judge Kane had given a sort of sanction to the proceedings of the Government by admitting that the payment of travelling expenses did not involve an infringement of the law. Of course it did not per se constitute a violation of the law, but "the mutuality of understanding"—to use Judge Kane's expression—between Mr. Crampton and his agents, that the reason why the expenses were paid was, that men might be induced to leave the States for the purpose of being enlisted in the service of a foreign Power—that it was that constituted the essence of the offence, as amounting to "a hiring and retaining." The following passage from the judgment delivered by Judge Kane in Hertz's case showed, with sufficient significance, the opinion which that learned person had formed on the conduct of the British Government, viewed as a whole—

"Our people and our Government have been accused of forgetting the obligations of neutrality, and pushing ourselves forward into the conflicts of foreign nations, instead of minding our own business as neutrals, and leaving belligerents to fight out their own quarrels. For one, I confess that I felt surprised, as this case advanced, to learn that, during the very time that these accusations were fulminated against the American people by the press of England, there was, on the part of eminent British functionaries here, a series of arrangements in progress, carefully digested, and combining all sorts of people, under almost all sorts of influences, to evade the laws of the United States by which our country sought to enforce its neutrality; arrangements matured, upon a careful inspection of the different sections of our statutes, ingeniously to violate their spirit and principle without incurring their penalty, and thus enlist and send away soldiers from our neutral shores to fight the battles of those who were incontinently and not over courteously admonishing us to fulfil the duties of neutrality."

Such was the opinion of Judge Kane on the whole case, and assuredly it did not tell in favour of Mr. Crampton or his agents. It was to be hoped that our relations with America would not long feel the effect of these unfortunate differences. It was most important that the people of the United States should understand that the people of this country were not backing up Her Majesty's Government in a deliberate violation of the American laws of neutrality. Nothing would so much tend to keep the two nations on friendly terms as the belief that this was merely a question as between Mr. Marcy and the Ministry of the day in this country, and not as between the American people and the English. It amounted to no more than a personal difference between the Ministers of the two countries. The Ministers of Her Majesty were responsible to the House of Commons, and it was the duty of that House to pronounce an opinion upon their conduct. It was no business of his to sit in judgment on the conduct of Mr. Marcy, Mr. Cushing, or President Pierce. He did not undertake to defend all their acts, or the spirit in which they had conducted their part of the correspondence; and, indeed, he should be prepared—if it could be done legitimately—to agree in a vote of censure upon Mr. Cushing. But, he repeated, it was not within his province to pass a sentence on the Government of the United States. His duty lay with the Government representing the community to which he belonged, and his deliberate opinion was, that they had not done well for the interests of England in picking this miserable poultry quarrel for the sake of raising a few German recruits in the territories of the United States. It was to be regretted that the present Motion came before the House as an Amendment on going into Supply, as it might enable hon. Gentlemen to avoid delivering their judgment on a grave international question. It would be much better if a plain substantive Resolution had been submitted to the House, and they had been called to vote "Aye" or "No" on the question—"Do you approve of the conduct of Her Majesty's Government in endeavouring to raise soldiers in the United States?" [An hon. MEMBER: We do.] In conclusion, he had only to thank the House for the kind indulgence it had extended towards him.

Mr. BAXTER said, that as he was intimately connected with the United States in a commercial point of view, and it had also been his good fortune to spend a considerable time in that country, in order to make himself acquainted with its social and political institutions, he trusted he might be allowed to make a few observations. He was not one of those who felt any jealousy of the power of America—on the contrary, he rejoiced in its consolidation, and even in its extension. He had no sympathy whatever with those who regarded the great republic, not as a child to whom we had ourselves given birth, and in whose prosperity we ought therefore to take a deep interest, but as a rival whose progress we ought to curb and to check. It was much to be regretted that so many persons on this side the Atlantic could not distinguish between the people of the United States and the mob, between the farmers and merchants in whose society an Englishman would immediately feel himself at home, and those noisy demagogues and trading politicians into whose hands, he said it with sorrow, the government of the country had of late fallen. The Government of the United States had no doubt many faults, and its constitution many defects, which all wise men must see with apprehension and regret. The change of the President and the subordinate officers every four years, the payment of Members, and the state of the naturalisation laws, were circumstances calculated to embroil the Union with foreign Powers and to lead to numberless intrigues. At the same time he would exhort Englishmen, abandoning our natural proneness to find fault with the institutions of other countries, to look upon the shortcomings of America with that magnanimity and forbearance that so well befitted a country standing in the relationship which England bore towards them. Turning to the subject immediately before the House—for his own part, he confessed that if he had any bias, when he sat down to peruse the correspondence that had been laid upon the table, that bias was in favour of the Government of the United States—not that he regarded the honour of America above the honour of England, but he did feel that there was at times a disposition on the part of British statesmen to misconstrue the policy of our trans-Atlantic kinsmen. A calm, dispassionate, and very careful study of the Blue-book, however, had thoroughly convinced him that the House of Commons had no ground upon which to pass a vote of censure on Her Majesty's Government, such as was implied by the Motion before the House. It seemed to him that the Motion of the hon. Member for Mayo was unjust both to Mr. Crampton and to Her Majesty's Government. He did not stand there as the apologist for either, and he would cheerfully admit that there were things in the conduct of both of which he did not entirely approve; but he denied that either Mr. Crampton or Her Majesty's Government had been guilty of conduct that deserved the censure of Parliament. In the first place, he should never cease to feel surprise, that when Mr. Crampton received the legal opinion which he procured as to the operation of the neutrality laws—he did not wash his hands of the whole business, and advise Her Majesty's Government, by the first steamer, to relinquish a measure which threatened to embroil us with a friendly State. Mr. Crampton also led Her Majesty's Government to believe that he had fully and freely told Mr. Marcy what were their intentions; and, therefore, if any one was to blame, it was that gentleman rather than the Government. He thought it was also to be regretted that Mr. Crampton, when he saw the impracticability of the scheme, did not take upon himself to put an end to it, instead of grumbling at the feeling which perseverance in it excited in the American Government. But it must be obvious to all—and he confidently appealed to the generosity of the House on this point—that the error of Mr. Crampton was an error of judgment and not of intention, and that he had no disposition to offend the American Government, or to break the American laws. He had, in short, as the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bucks (Mr. Disraeli) had observed, done his very best to do his duty to his Sovereign and his country. He would further put it to the House whether, if the American Government had only treated the matter in the same friendly spirit, and had not shown an evident desire to fasten a quarrel on some one, the dispute would never have been permitted to assume the formidable magnitude which it had since done. With regard to Her Majesty's Government, that Lord Clarendon had never used an unguarded expression, he (Mr. Baxter) would not assert; but no sooner did the noble Lord discover that the enlistment scheme was a mistake, than he atoned for it in the fullest, frankest, freest, possible manner. As for the language of which the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gibson) complained, he would not deny that Lord Clarendon's despatch certainly contained some unadvised expressions; but they had obviously been provoked by language of a similar character held by Mr. Marcy against the British Government. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gibson) said that, besides the passages in the despatch to which he was alluding, there were many similar ones in Lord Clarendon's other correspondence. Well, he (Mr. Baxter) fearlessly challenged the right hon. Gentleman to point out one such passage. The right hon. Gentleman said, it was an act of absurd folly to send to America to enlist Germans; but the order was, in the first instance, given by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wiltshire (Mr. S. Herbert), who had no doubt friends enough in that House to defend the policy he thus originated. The right hon. Gentleman had referred to the opinion of Judge Kane. But there were two opinions of Judge Kane. The last was, no doubt, very strongly in favour of the American Government, and, perhaps, Judge Kane had had good reasons for changing his views; but, nevertheless, the fact remained that his first opinion was one very much calculated to mislead both Mr. Crampton and Her Majesty's Government. The English Government had certainly had a most difficult game to play. Both the district Attorney of Virginia and Mr. Attorney General Cushing—not newspaper editors, be it remembered, but officers of the Federal Government—and in their official capacity made use of language of the most insulting and most offensive nature towards the British Government. The right hon. Gentleman said, he was not prepared to defend that language; but he (Mr. Baxter) would go further, and say that it was language which in most civilised countries must have necessitated the instant removal from office of those who uttered it. The great thing the House of Commons would, after all, have to consider was, whether in the conduct of these negotiations Her Majesty's Government had behaved in a friendly and conciliatory spirit towards the Government of a country with which the people of Great Britain must always desire to be at peace? For his own part, he could not conceive any unprejudiced and candid person rising from a perusal of the Blue-book and answering other than in the affirmative. He had no doubt that the feeling of friendliness which the people of this country entertained to America was reciprocated by the respectable classes in the United States. He believed, moreover, that though certain politicians had been vapouring and blustering about war with England, it was civil war—war in Kansas—war, the result of the system of slavery—which all the time they feared. The very men whose names had been most prominent—Mr. Cushing and the present Secretary for War—at the time the Mexican war was going on, opened offices in Canada for recruits, and they had allowed whole shiploads of armed men to leave American ports to go and interfere with the Government of Nicaragua. A dislike for England was just now a political necessity with certain classes in the United States; but he had listened to the whole of the debates in the American Senate on the Oregon question—he had attended the democratic meetings in all parts of the Union—and he did not believe that the devices of politicians would ever be allowed to create hostilities between the two countries. He believed that the general sentiment of the whole nation was against it; and the real strength of America, the honest and substantial citizens, had three or four times interposed to prevent the schemes of the politicians. He believed they would do so again, for they were satisfied that a war with England would be in the highest degree disastrous to both the belligerent parties.

Mr. Baxter

Mr. PEACOCKE said, he wished to offer a few observations upon the arguments which had been used by two members of the Government in last night's debate. Those arguments were, first, that the conduct of Mr. Crampton was free from blame; and, next, that it was inopportune to raise a discussion upon this subject at the present moment. With regard to the last argument, he would ask, what then would be the proper time for raising the question? The hon. Member for Inverness-shire (Mr. Baillie) had, at a very early period of the Session, placed a notice upon the paper referring to the enlistment of troops in America; but when he proposed to bring that Motion under discussion, he was invariably met by the objection that negotiations were still pending. Negotiations were, however, no longer pending; they had terminated in a manner most humiliating to this country; yet if such subjects were not to be discussed while negotiations were pending, nor when negotiations were closed, the effect would be to prevent the House from expressing an opinion upon the foreign relations of the country, and to exempt the Foreign Minister from Parliamentary control and responsibility, however culpable his conduct might have been. As to the argument that Mr. Crampton was perfectly blameless, he would ask hon. Gentlemen who maintained that position, how it was, if such were the case, that Mr. Crampton had been sacrificed and abandoned by the Government? They had been told yesterday by the hon. and learned Attorney General that Mr. Crampton's conduct on the enlistment question was perfectly free from blame, and that the only evidence against him was that of men of abandoned character. He (Mr. Peacocke) believed, however, that no hon. Member on that side the House wished to advance a single fact upon the testimony of Hertz and Stroebel which was not entirely confirmed by other evidence, and even by the admissions of Mr. Crampton himself. Mr. Crampton admitted that he corresponded with Stroebel in cipher; that he had given instructions to various persons as to the best mode of enlisting; that he furnished Stroebel with instructions for evading the municipal law of the United States; and that he went to Halifax for the purpose of organising the system of enlistment. Such admissions showed that Mr. Crampton had violated the spirit, if not the letter, of the municipal law of America. He was able to show that this was not an insulated act of indiscretion on the part of Mr. Crampton, but part and parcel of a policy that had been deliberately planned and organised by the Government at home, and deliberately carried out by its agents abroad. He would not quote the law of Prussia on this subject, for it was analogous to that of the United States and our own, but he would call the attention of the House to the case of our consul, Mr. Curtis, who had been prosecuted at Cologne for a violation of that law. He had perused the judgment of the court of the district in that case, and found in it the following statement with reference to Mr. Curtis:—

“That he furnished those anxious to enlist not only with information as to the conditions of enlistment, but even detailed instruction as to the mode in which their entry was to be effected, and what course must be pursued to effect this end; and furnished them with cards to his agent, Boyer, the publican, who on the strength of them was to provide for their free board and means of going forward. That he furthermore pictured in glowing colours the rank in the service, the high pay they would receive, and gave them advances of money for facilitating their journey, and lastly cautioned them to be aware of the police.”

What was this but the very system pursued by Mr. Crampton towards the Government of the United States? And what was the defence of Mr. Curtis? Did he plead not guilty? No; but he pleaded that the acts of which he had been convicted were done in his official capacity and under the instructions of the British Government. But, after all, this question might be reduced to the simplest of alternatives—was Mr. Crampton right or wrong? If he was right he ought to have been upheld, and Mr. Dallas dismissed; if wrong, he ought to have been recalled. If Mr. Crampton was right, the conduct of the Government was indefensible; if he was wrong, the conduct of any Government which should appoint him to any situation would be as indefensible; and if, in the last alternative, the noble Lord should think to purchase connivance in an unjust disgrace by the promise of impossible promotion, he would tell them both that the eyes of the House of Commons were upon Mr. Crampton. England had received an insult and an affront which she was either not in a position or had not the courage to retaliate; and what would the public opinion of Europe say—the public opinion of that Europe, throughout which, in the language of England's last apologist, De Montalembert, "the insufferable arrogance of England had called forth the indignation of the majority of thinking men"? Why, it would say that that same England, which had insulted Spain until she resented it, which had menaced Naples, and intimidated Greece, and which had even the courage to make war upon Russia when she had France for an ally—now, at the first act of hostile aggression from the United States, plucked from her brow at the menace of the strong, the laurels which she had gained by the intimidation of the weak. And by whom had this humiliation been inflicted on the country? Why, by the Cabinet of the noble Lord, the orator of Romsey, and the rhetorician of the Mansion House. The Minister who declared he would make the English as respected as the Roman citizen, yet who had failed to obtain for the representative of his Sovereign the immunity from insult which he declared he would command for the meanest of her subjects. He (Mr. Peacocke) did not know whether the blood flowed warmer in the veins of the sexagenarian Secretary of 1848, than in those of the septuagenarian of 1856; but, when Sir Henry Bulwer was dismissed in 1848 from Madrid, M. Isturitz, the Spanish Ambassador in this country, received his passports, and the Government of that day refused even to receive the Minister (Count de Mirasol) who was sent to explain why Sir Henry Bulwer was dismissed. The noble Lord the Member for the city of London recited the other night the cases of the Ambassadors who had been sent away from Washington; but there was a marked difference between those instances and the present. The acts for which those Ministers were dismissed were repudiated and disavowed by their respective Governments, whereas the conduct of Mr. Crampton had been defended and maintained by his Government; and he believed this was the first instance in which the dismissal of a Minister whose acts were approved by the Ministry at home, had been tamely acquiesced in by the Government which he represented. But if this case were to be quoted as a precedent hereafter, he still hoped there was enough of English feeling in this House to repudiate the petty policy of a system which may have been learned amongst the Camarillas of Madrid, which may have been improved in the ante-chambers of Dublin Castle, but which could never be allowed to sow the seeds of small intrigue between two great countries like England and America.

MR. SPOONER said, he had last night expressed his great regret that this subject should have been brought forward, and every speech he had heard since, every argument which had been used, and every document read to the House, had only increased that regret, and led him the more deeply to deplore the course taken by the hon. Member for Mayo (Mr. G. H. Moore). His hon. Friend the Member for Inverness (Mr. Baillie), from patriotic motives, had given up his notice; but the hon. Member for Mayo had no sooner found an opportunity than he had rushed in to supply his place. The hon. Member for Mayo had a perfect right to take the course which he had done, but, doubting the wisdom of it, he could not follow the hon. Member. That hon. Gentleman last night chose to represent him (Mr. Spooner) as frequently, amidst cheers from both sides of the House, denouncing casuistry and equivocation, and called upon him now to denounce the papers under consideration as being of that character. He could assure the hon. Gentleman that he was as averse to casuistry and equivocation as that hon. Gentleman himself, and he was glad to hear the expression he (Mr. Moore) had now used, and he should have been still more glad if he had, in addition, joined with him (Mr. Spooner) in denouncing what he had so often done—jesuitry; but for reasons best known to himself, he had omitted so to do. He would not enter into the merits of this case, as he believed the more it was discussed the more danger would attend the discussion; but there was one point to which he would allude which had not been adverted to by any speaker. It was said we had broken the law of the United States and greatly irritated the Government of that country; but what said the American Government? Why, they acquitted our Government altogether. ["No, no!"] No, no! Why they said distinctly that they acquitted our Government of any intention to insult them; and he would say that a person who could not make a difference between an intentional and unintentional insult did not know what ought to be the conduct of a Christian or a gentleman. He would not say that Mr. Crampton had been dismissed in the most courteous manner, but he would say that, if the Government had refused to accept the dismissal of Mr. Crampton, considering the offers with which it was accompanied, the whole country would have resounded with a cry of indignation. The American Government said they could not treat with Mr. Crampton, but they were ready to treat with us, through Mr. Dallas, on the subject of the Central American question; and, if the Government had refused such an offer, they would, in his eyes, have been guilty of a most desperate crime, and would probably have involved the two countries in a most lamentable war. He would not enter into the merits of the question, for, although he had listened attentively to the various speeches which had been addressed to the House, he could not pretend to understand the legal arguments sufficiently to justify him in giving an opinion between the Attorney General and his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Stamford (Sir F. Thesiger). But this much he did understand—that in the event of our being obliged to go to war with America, it was of vital importance that England should be in the right; and certain he was that our Government would not have been in that position if they had not taken the greatest pains to avoid a hostile collision with the United States. He believed that our Ministers would have been to blame if they had resented the dismissal of Mr. Crampton by sending away Mr. Dallas. The eyes of the country were upon them, and his opinion was, that if the people of England were polled to-morrow an overwhelming majority would be found in favour of the maintenance of cordial relations with the United States. For his own part, believing that the discussion was premature, he would give his vote against the Motion of the hon. Member for Mayo, reserving to himself the right, upon some more convenient occasion, to canvass freely the conduct of Her Majesty's Government.

MR. GLADSTONE: Sir, the speech which has just been delivered by my hon. Friend marks a feature in this debate so important and so much connected with the vote that I shall probably myself give at its close, that although I am likely upon a division to go into the same lobby with the hon. Member, yet I think there is no impropriety in my following him in discussion.

It appears to me that the two cardinal aims which we ought to keep in view in the discussion of this question are peace and a thoroughly cordial understanding with America for one, the honour and fame of England for the other. I am bound to say that in regard to neither of these points am I satisfied with the existing state of things, or with the conduct of Her Majesty's Government. A cordial understanding with America has not been preserved; the honour of this country has been compromised. Sir, I am not one who will set up the phantasm of honour in a case where the plea appears to me unreal, or who will condescend to separate between honour and the honourable conduct of which it ought to be the symbol. But as respects the honour of England, I assent—I cannot but assent—to the statement of the hon. and learned Gentleman who has already spoken from an opposite bench (Sir F. Thesiger), that what is considered by the world to be an insult—that which, at any rate, cannot but be called an insult—has been put upon England by the Government of the United States. Has it been put with or without a cause? If with a cause, it ought to be confessed; if without a cause, it ought to be resented. Sir, I am bound to say that upon this question my feelings are of such a nature that it would be impossible for me to meet with a direct negative the Motion of the hon. Member for Mayo. I could not say “No” to a Motion which states that the conduct of Her Majesty's Government, in regard to enlistment in America, has not entitled them to the approval of this House. Nor do I mean simply to take my stand, when I say I am likely to vote with the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Spooner), upon the circumstance—though it is an important one—that we are not called upon to say “Ay” or “No” to that question. The question which you, Sir, will put from the chair, that we should go into Committee of Supply, gives to the matter the technical Parliamentary aspect of what is called the “previous question;” but at the same time, I must say that I do not concur in the censures which have been bestowed upon the hon. Member for Mayo with respect to the time of bringing forward his Motion. Yet the question is one of the greatest difficulty. I cannot say that there is no inconvenience attending a Motion which criticises or assails the conduct of Her Majesty's Government engaged in transactions with a foreign country.

But, before deciding the question whether the hon. Member for Mayo is open to the severe censures which have been cast upon him, we must consider whether the papers which have been laid on the table do or do not make us acquainted with all the facts of the case—whether the misunderstanding with America has not gone beyond the point of mere diplomatic communication, and has assumed form and action in the face of the world, and whether the House itself, or at least those individual Members who have familiarised themselves with the contents of the Blue-books, will not by declining to take this opportunity of expressing their opinion upon them become parties to the approval of the conduct of Her Majesty's Government? For myself, Sir, I frankly own that I have felt the greatest difficulty in considering the question what vote to give upon the present occasion. I never recollect a question more difficult as pressing upon my own understanding and conscience. But with my knowledge and experience of this House, I am convinced that those who feel with me cannot do better than throw themselves on the indulgence of the House, stating fully the difficulties which they experience, exposing themselves, if need be, to adverse criticism, but relying with confidence upon the generous forbearance of the House to put a fair construction upon their language. At any rate, after what I have said, I shall state in intelligible language why it is I expect to find myself voting with the hon. Member for North Warwickshire. My hon. Friend stated, at the commencement of this discussion, that he deprecated the beginning of it as likely to injure the interests of peace, and he likewise characterised it as a party question, casting some discredit upon it on that account. Is it, then, in point of fact, a party question? Why, I appeal to his own example against his precept. He himself has risen in his place and declared that he will vote against the Motion of the hon. Member for Mayo. So far that is an indication that it is not a party question. Again, within the last few minutes the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Manchester (Mr. Gibson), who, I apprehend, does not belong to the same political school as the hon. Member for Mayo, has declared his intention to support the Motion. But if my right hon. Friend and the hon. Member for Mayo are making it a party question, on behalf of what party are they raising it? Is it of the party opposite? Does the hon. Member for Mayo belong to the school of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli)? Why, Sir, it is quite plain this is not a party question. And, Sir, I am bound to say that, in my opinion, that is a vital element in the consideration of the case. Disapproving the conduct of Her Majesty's Government in the management of the foreign enlistment question, I say here that I should be ready to express that disapproval by vote, if I saw a Motion to that effect made by a party ready to be responsible for the consequences of success. Now, Sir, I say to the hon. Member for Mayo, without the slightest disrespect, that these questions of votes of censure upon Governments are matters of great importance, and that in considering them, we must look not merely to the terms in which they are framed, but likewise to the quarter from which they emanate. I mean nothing disparaging to the hon. Member for Mayo—I look merely to the terms of his Motion; but are we to regard his Motion as the declaration of a party ready to be responsible for the results of its adoption, or is it merely the expression of the opinion of individual Members of this House who can have little influence upon the division, and who, if the Resolution were carried, could not themselves be responsible for the consequences? I think, Sir, it is a good practical rule in Parliamentary discussions that we should not by our votes weaken the hands of Governments unless we are prepared, if the result of the division should prove adverse to them, to displace them from office. I think it is not desirable in these foreign transactions that the Government should be assailed by votes that tend to weaken their influence on behalf of their country, unless they are moved by those who would become responsible for carrying those opinions into effect; and I merely state what is notorious to all the world, when I observe that no great party in the House can be held responsible for carrying the Resolution of the hon. Member for Mayo into effect, should the vote of the House resolve his question in the affirmative. For a vote of censure on the Government, as an abstract Resolution, I am not able to vote; but if the Motion had come before me supported by those who were ready to carry out the principle it embodied, I should have felt it my duty to give effect to my opinion. But then I may be asked, "Why, admitting that we ought not to weaken the hands of the Government in carrying on their difficult negotiations with a foreign country—why do you enter upon this discussion and express opinions contrary to the course taken by the Government?" My answer is plain. I have no choice, after the turn which this debate has taken. [An Hon. MEMBER made a remark, which was inaudible.] My hon. Friend says, I am going to speak one way and vote another. Sir, I can only repeat in reply to that charge, that I cannot vote in favour of a Motion which, if carried, would only weaken the hands of the Government without leading to any practical result. I believe it to be a wise rule that votes of censure on the Government should only be proposed by those who are able to give effect to the principle contained in those votes; and if the opportunity were such as would enable the House, if it should come to a decision adverse to Her Majesty's Ministers, to give due effect to that decision, I should not shrink from giving my vote in accordance with that opinion; but as matters stand, I shall vote for going into Committee of Supply. The state of things with which you have to deal is this:—Upon the British Minister the penalty of dismissal from Washington has been inflicted. As far as the honour of this country is concerned, the state of things is therefore unsatisfactory. As far as regards the American Government, what is its condition? Was the breach with America closed up by his dismissal? Will any man say that he believes it is? If it were right to retain Mr. Dallas, why do you keep our diplomatic relations in a state of half animation. Why do you not appoint a successor to Mr. Crampton? I can conceive no reason for not sending away Mr. Dallas, that does not equally prove that you should appoint a successor to Mr. Crampton. If the American Government had no cause to justify them in dismissing Mr. Crampton, why do you retain Mr. Dallas as the Minister of the United States at this Court? If they had a cause to justify them, why do you not admit that they are right and send a successor to fill Mr. Crampton's place? My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department having spoken last night, I presume we are in possession of the views of the Government, and the Government were not content to debate this question except upon its merits. My hon. Friend the Member for North Warwickshire said he would not enter upon the merits of this question, and that is a perfectly consistent measure for me to take or for my hon. Friend to take. But the Government have entered upon the discussion upon the merits of the case. That was a manly course, and I do not find fault with it. Whether it was a prudent course I am not so sure. But they declared their adherence to all that has been done and stated during the whole progress of this painful discussion. Nothing can be more explicit than the declarations they have made to this effect. The Attorney General declared that, whereas there had been charges against the Government of violating both international law and the municipal law of the United States, he denied both those charges, and denied that either law had been violated. My right hon. Friend the Secretary of State for the Home Department was even bolder in his manner of dealing with this subject than the Attorney General. He said that the officers of the Government had acted up to the spirit of the instructions that they had received. He said that no acts had been done contrary to the American law, and that the apologies made to the United States' Government did not admit that such acts had been done, because her Majesty's Government felt all along that no wrong had been done. So that the doctrine of the Government is, that their proceedings are justifiable on their own merits. I am certainly not prepared to be responsible for that opinion by the side of the evidence in this Blue-book. I believe, indeed, that such an assertion is made in the teeth of the plainest evidence in every page of these documents. That is not only my opinion, but I believe it is, in effect, the opinion of a great many of the Members of this House who have given their time and labour to the perusal of these Blue-books. Small is, I fear, the number who answer to that description. There are many things that the English people will do. They will sign petitions; they will attend meetings; they will get up agitations; they will pay taxes, and double taxes if need be. But Blue-books they will not read. That is the case, also, with hon. Members of this House. I say, fearlessly, that the Attorney General has not read these Blue-books. That is a fair challenge, and I will show that the references of the Attorney General to these books—references evidently supplied to him at second hand—betray that he has never entered upon the study of these important documents. To return, however, to the points to which I was addressing myself. I will remind the House that the effect of the declaration now made by the Government will be to keep alive the recollection of the differences which, with respect to the enlistment question, exist between this Government and the Government of America, and I am not prepared to assent to the opinion of those who say that it is not desirable to remove the affairs connected with the American Government from the hands of those who have hitherto conducted them. On the contrary, I think that no Government is so little qualified to conduct these negotiations with America to a successful result, because of the differences that have prevailed, because of the course of combined obstinacy and weakness which the Government have pursued, and because the recollection of these differences, kept alive by the course they have taken in this debate, must of necessity form an unfortunate introduction to those negotiations with respect to Central America which are now pending. My right hon. Friend the Secretary for the Home Department stated in a fair and candid manner a point of great importance. I refer to the supposed apology of the British Government to the authorities of the United States. It has often been said that the American Government cannot complain, because, if any wrong has been done them, it has been covered by a handsome apology. But that is not the language of my right hon. Friend. He did not say that if any wrong had been done to the Government of the United States it had been covered by an apology. On the contrary, my right hon. Friend said, with the greatest candour and truth, that the apology offered to the United States' Government had always been a conditional apology, and was not an apology that implied or admitted that a wrong had been done, because Her Majesty's Government, having been fully conscious that they had done no wrong, had not offered an apology that supposed that a wrong had been done. My right hon. Friend stated these were the apologies that had been made. They have been repeated in various despatches. They all run in one form—they may be summed up in these words, "The British Government would regret deeply if, either intentionally or unintentionally, they have done a wrong to America; but they have not done a wrong to America." If no wrong had been done I grant you that an apology so couched ought to be accepted, and that it would be a frank, generous, and conciliatory step, going as near as possible to meet the views of the American Government. But if a wrong has been done, such an apology is no apology at all. Whether a wrong has been done, therefore, is the question upon which we have to fall back. I maintain that if a wrong has been done, that wrong has not been atoned for by the apology. Let me say two things, which will shorten my part in the discussion. In the first place, I will not, as a general rule, quote from these Blue-books, but for every word I utter I am ready, if called upon, to repeat the chapter and verse. If I do not quote verbatim from these Blue-books it is because it would be unreasonable in me to trespass upon the indulgence of the House. In the next place, I shall forbear to discuss questions of international law, not that I think it unimportant, because I hold that no position is less defensible and no position less tenable than that we may exclude the question of international law from the consideration of this subject from the frivolous reason that the Americans have a municipal law. But as the case is clear upon the municipal law, I am ready to confine myself to that in the practical view of the case which I have prescribed to myself. I am sorry to say that the propositions that I have to support, as embodying my conscientious convictions, are unfortunately propositions which attach very strong blame to the conduct of Her Majesty's Government. Sir, I shall not attempt to qualify these opinions by any expressions of regret. These things are of little value in hostile discussion. It is better for a man to speak out what he has to say, leaving it to those who may follow him to contradict, correct, or expose him if he has made statements or expressed opinions not supported by the facts. What I have to say is this: In the first place, so far as I can judge, concealment was practised towards the American Government in respect of the enlistment question; and, in the second place, not only was concealment practised, but the American Government were deluded and misled by representations, which I do not say were intended to mislead, but were evidently such that they must mislead, if properly considered. I say this—that the municipal law of the United States was not only broken, but it was broken in defiance of the advice of those who were chosen as counsellors—it was knowingly broken on the part of the agents of the British Government. I do not say that in these papers is to be found the proof that this was done under the direction of the British Government. In that respect I venture to differ from the hon. Gentleman the Member for Mayo; and, permit me in passing to say, I could not but listen with regret to the observations expressed from the Treasury bench, not only on those portions of the speech of the hon. Member for Mayo in which he introduced, by way of illustration, certain passages from Irish history, but on the general tendency of that speech to throw blame on one particular Member of the Cabinet. I must say, in justice to the hon. Member for Mayo, that although it may be good tactics to strive to keep out of view one's own incapacity by introducing exciting matter, the hon. Gentleman has no cause for any such expedient, because he has amply proved, by argument, his full ability to deal with the merits of the question. But I differ from the hon. Gentleman in that point. I think he stated these things were done under the direction of Her Majesty's Government. I confess I do not discern that on the face of the papers. But, in my view, it matters little whether they were done under the direction of the Government or not, if the Government made themselves parties to the acts by their subsequent approbation. And here, Sir, I cannot help regretting deeply the injustice done to Mr. Crampton by the hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter). One proposition that I state with the greatest confidence is this—that injustice was not done to Mr. Crampton by any Member of the Government, but it was done by the hon. Member for Montrose. The hon. Member, with his regard for America, was not willing to inculcate America; and, with his regard for the Government, was not willing to inculcate the Government. So, following the example of President Pierce, and passing by both the British and the American Governments, he threw the blame upon Mr. Crampton, and said that Mr. Crampton, when he had taken the lawyer's opinion, ought to have stopped the scheme of recruiting of his own accord. I give Mr. Crampton credit for taking a lawyer's opinion. It was a wise and prudent step; but when it is said he should have stopped the scheme of recruiting of his own accord, I ask, was it within Mr. Crampton's province to give up that scheme? Can it be said that it rested with him to disobey the orders on that subject which he had received from the Government of which he was the representative? In my opinion, Mr. Crampton sailed as near the wind as he possibly could; and, in justice to Mr. Crampton, it must be remembered that, when he had taken the opinion of a distinguished American lawyer, he sent home that opinion to his Government, and wrote to Lord Clarendon—

I take it that it was a fair intimation that in his opinion the whole thing should be abandoned. That suggestion, unfortunately, was not adopted by the Government at home. Mr. Crampton had then proceeded to act in accordance with what he deemed to be the spirit of the intention of Her Majesty's Government, and the result is that Her Majesty's Government has been unreservedly acquitted by the Government of the United States of the matter, and Mr. Crampton has been dismissed from his post as Minister at Washington. With respect to these circumstances, however, the proposition that I am prepared to maintain is this—that there is not one hair's breadth of distinction between the position of Mr. Crampton and the position of Her Majesty's Government, of which he was the representative. I think, as far as I can judge, that the zeal of Mr. Crampton, and, perhaps, what he believed to be the intentions of the Government, but were not the instructions of the Government, were the source of the evils which have arisen. Everything which Mr. Crampton did was approved by the Government at home; every claim that Mr. Crampton made was maintained by the Government at home, and I entirely decline to draw the least distinction between the original responsibility of Mr. Crampton, as the subordinate person, and the subsequent responsibility of the Government by its unrestricted posterior approval of Mr. Crampton's conduct. But I say that, at first, Mr. Crampton concealed those proceedings from the American Government, and that is a point of great importance. The hon. Member for Mayo has quoted a passage from Lord Clarendon's despatch of the 15th July, in which Lord Clarendon says, that he has instructed Mr. Crampton, above all, to have no concealment from the American Government. My right hon. Friend the Member for Manchester says, that if that were so, then Mr. Crampton had been guilty of a serious offence in having resorted to that concealment which he had been told to avoid. The American Government, not doubting the assurance conveyed by Lord Clarendon, said the same thing, and laid on Mr. Crampton's shoulders this burden—that, having received strict instructions not to practise concealment, he did practise concealment. The hon. Member for Mayo has stated that there does not appear in these papers any instruction to Mr. Crampton not to practise concealment, and he has called upon the Government to point out to him where that instruction is. The Attorney General followed, and he did not answer that appeal. The Home Secretary spoke later in the evening, and did not answer that appeal. The appeal must be renewed, for this House has a right to know from Her Majesty's Government whether it is true that Lord Clarendon instructed Mr. Crampton to have no concealment from the American Government. If he did so instruct Mr. Crampton, then undoubtedly the American Government are justified in the distinction which they have drawn between the conduct of Her Majesty's Ministers and that of their representative; but, if Lord Clarendon did not so instruct Mr. Crampton, and if the reference in the despatch of July 15 is erroneous, then it is impossible to find words to describe the injustice inflicted on Mr. Crampton—because Mr. Crampton has been made to bear the responsibility of concealment, which the hon. Member for Montrose well said was the fatal error from the outset, whereas the responsibility of that concealment belongs to the Government. I frankly own I think it does belong to the Government, for, although reference is made in the despatch of July 15 to some instruction not to practise concealment, there is no passage in any prior despatch, or, indeed, in any despatch, prior or subsequent, to that effect. The material point in the case is, whether concealment was or was not practised? The hon. and learned Attorney General yesterday evening replied to that question in the negative, supporting his statement by reference to the circumstance that Mr. Crampton had pointed out to Mr. Marcy that the British Government had established, or intended to establish, a depôt at Halifax for the purpose of recruiting. And this is what induced me to say the Attorney General had not read the papers; because my hon. and learned Friend gave two references to despatches, neither of which contain a word as to the depôt at Halifax; but there happens to be a third extract which does refer to it. I presume the person who prepared the references for the Attorney General had unfortunately placed the wrong figures in the margin, or they were wrongly supplied at the moment, and my hon. and learned Friend, not having read the papers himself, was unable to correct the error. However, it is quite true Mr. Crampton did say to Mr. Marcy that the British Government intended to establish a depôt at Halifax. It is not in the Blue-book, but it is in the 14th page of the last papers presented to Parliament. I think there is no doubt it was mentioned, but it is a fact for which I do not think Mr. Marcy had any great reason to feel obliged, inasmuch as this depôt was the subject of great discussion in the public journals, and it is just possible Mr. Marcy might have acquired a knowledge of its existence without any such communication being made by Mr. Crampton. The question is, did you conceal from the American Government that which was the whole matter and the cause of the complaint? The American Government never complained of the establishment of the depôt at Halifax. There is not a word which implies such a complaint on their part. They knew quite well that the establishment of such a depôt at Halifax, whether prudent or not, was perfectly within the rights and competence of the British Government, and I am perfectly ready to say that I and my right hon. Friend near me (Sir James Graham) are equally responsible for that act in conjunction with the Members of the present Government, because that Resolution was the last step taken within our cognizance before we were compelled to quit the Cabinet of my noble Friend on the question arising on the Motion of the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield. But that was never made the subject of complaint. What the American Government have complained of is the employment of an agency within the United States, not only to give information, but to tempt, to induce by the offer of valuable considerations, the subjects of the United States to go beyond the United States for the purpose of enlisting in our service. That is the subject matter of their complaint, and I want an answer to this question—Did Mr. Crampton tell or did he not tell the American Government that he, on the part of the British Government, was about to establish such an agency or not? Mr. Crampton says he did not tell the American Government the details. I must say that appears to me an unworthy mode of dealing with a question so important. This is not a question about details. It is a question about a measure, constituting the corpus of the complaint on the part of the American Government—namely, the employment of an agency within the United States for the purpose of disseminating information and inducing their subjects to go beyond the United States to enlist in the service of a foreign State. Did Mr. Crampton communicate that or did he not? If not, it is useless to talk of not concealing, when you conceal not a detail but the very head and front of the offending—the very ground and foundation of the whole case. I say, without the smallest doubt, that Mr. Crampton did not communicate any such purpose to the American Government; and I say so, because there is the declaration, express and positive, of the American Government, and because that declaration is entirely contradicted by anything stated on the part of the British Government; and because there is nothing in the statement of Mr. Crampton himself which sustains the allegation that he made such a communication to Mr. Marcy. This fact stands the first great proposition in the case—that the going about to establish an agency within the United States, for the purpose of inducing American citizens to go beyond the border and be enlisted, was concealed from the American Government. That is the charge of concealment, and it will be well if the Government can give some answer to it. But that is not the only charge I have to bring against the Government. There was more than concealment in the matter. I request hon. Gentlemen to look at the 14th page of the last papers which have been laid upon the table, and there they will find that Mr. Crampton, referring to his despatch of the 22nd of March of last year, gives us a large part of a despatch which was not given in the original Blue-book. He there gives his account of his conversations with Mr. Marcy, and states the substance of his communications with that Gentleman. He says:—

“ I took good care to explain to Mr. Marcy, with perfect frankness, our position and intentions as regards this matter. I said, besides reading to him my letter to Mr. Barclay, that we were certainly anxious to obtain efficient recruits from whatever quarter they should come, and that depôts for enlistment had been established in the colonies, where those who should voluntarily present themselves would be received and enrolled; but to inquiries which had been addressed to me by persons in this country, I had invariably replied by referring them to the provisions of the Act of Congress of 1818, and stating that neither I nor any of the agents of Her Majesty's Government could either ‘enlist’ them in the United States, or ‘hire and retain’ them to go to any of the British dominions, with the intent of there enlisting; that consequently all I could do was to give such persons the information of which I was in possession, as to terms, and the time and place at which they might, if so disposed, be received into the British service, being aware of no law which prevented citizens of the United States or others from emigration from this country, for whatever purpose they might think proper.”

Is that a promise to the American Government? It appears to me to be not only a promise, but a promise of a most solemn character, Mr. Crampton's own communication to Mr. Marcy resting upon Mr. Crampton's allegations now produced by himself in self-defence. Was that promise kept? Did Mr. Crampton confine himself to the communication of information? Is there a man in this House who will rise and say he did so? If he did not, how are we to meet the charge of the American Government, when they say we deceived and deluded them—that we threw them off the scent and induced them to believe that although proceedings were going on in the Union we had nothing to do with them—because they gave credence to our assurance, as conveyed by Mr. Crampton, that whatever agency was employed in the United States it was the agency of unsupported and unrecognised volunteers with which the Government had nothing to do. But was there nothing more? There was a certain Angus M'Donald, who appeared to think that free trade being a very good thing, it might properly be applied to recruiting, and who, upon receiving a remunerative price for the passage, offered to take persons to the British dominions. Well, we laid hold of this convenient despatch to Mr. M'Donald, carried it with great pomp to the American Minister, who read the indignant and almost ferocious terms in which the offer of Mr. Angus M'Donald was repudiated. Upon the very day of the conversation with Mr. Marcy, to which I have referred, this letter was written to Angus M'Donald, and it will not be very uncharitable to suppose it was written for the purpose of being exhibited to Mr. Marcy. It was, however, read by

Mr. Marcy, was regarded by that gentleman as an important fact, and led to the expression of great satisfaction on the part of the American Government. Let me say I was very sorry to hear the criticisms of the hon. and learned Member for Leominster (Mr. J. G. Phillimore) upon the conduct of the American Government upon this subject. If peace be our object, together with the maintenance of the honour of England, I would ask whether the attainment of those objects are likely to be promoted by private Members setting themselves up as judges of the conduct of the American Government? I would not hesitate to give my judgment upon the conduct of that Government if that were the question before us, but it is not. But if it be true that the American Government is "pettifogging and litigious," then I say, instead of that being a reason why we should trample upon the laws of the United States, it is a reason why, if not out of regard for them, at least in consideration for the great country which we represent, we should have held those laws more sacred, and have avoided still more carefully to give so litigious and pettifogging a people the slightest reason for complaint. A comparison has been made between the proclamation of Mr. Angus M'Donald and that of the Nova Scotian Government, and it has been argued that what was against the law if done within the boundaries of the United States was not against the law if done beyond those boundaries. Upon that, all I can say is, I cannot conceive a sorrier answer to the American Government than that things which were not lawful for a man to do because done by a private individual within the dominion of the United States, might lawfully be done by the British Government immediately upon the borders of the United States. But that is not the question at issue. Compare the proclamation of Mr. Angus M'Donald with that of Mr. Wilkins, and with the actual proceedings of the British Government in the United States. Mr. M'Donald disseminated the information that, upon certain terms, he was prepared to send recruits to a British colony. Mr. Crampton and his agents disseminated information, too, and advertisements appeared in German newspapers published in the Union, that persons were required to go abroad—sometimes it was said as mechanics, but everybody understood the kind of machinery they would be expected to use. The only difference was, that they provided a free passage, or paid money for the purpose of enabling such persons to go there. Therefore, it stands thus—we actually paraded, in the face of the American Government our condemnation of the unfortunate Angus M'Donald, and thus, perhaps, ruined his innocent and well-intended enterprise, while at the same time we ourselves were doing all that he promised to do, superadding the provision of a free passage, or paid money to meet the expense. I think no one will deny that a Government who by its agents pursued that course, and afterwards signified its approval of their acts, is not only fairly chargeable with concealment, but it is also liable to the charge of having deluded the American Government. Therefore, nothing is more unjust than the charge which is made against the American Government of having at first confined its complaints to the proceedings of unauthorised persons, and subsequently extended those complaints to the British Minister and his subordinates. The American Government at first confined their representations to the unauthorised persons, because it believed the representations which were made to them by the authorised representative of the British Government; but they extended their complaints when they found that those representations were not based upon truth. Aiming as I do at a plain and intelligible statement, I must say that the American Government was deceived by the proceedings of the British Government, and I say we intentionally broke the law of the Union. My hon. Friend (Mr. Spooner) tells us not to judge generally of intentions. I agree with him, except so far as we can infer them from acts, and from these acts we may reasonably infer that we knew what we were about. Mr. Crampton—and I give him credit for it—began his proceedings by taking the opinion of a most eminent American lawyer—one in whom, according to Mr. Crampton's significant description, he had perfect confidence, not only as to professional ability, but also as to political principles—that is to say, a man who, he believed, could confidently be reckoned upon as having no feeling adverse to the interests of Great Britain. That gentleman seems to have given a very wise and prudent opinion; but whether it was so or not, it was one upon which, I conceive, Mr. Crampton was bound to act. Why did Mr. Crampton take that opinion? He himself, at page 131, gives us the reason. He says he took it because he did not understand the neutrality laws, and therefore he says—

“ I requested an eminent American lawyer, in whose judgment and professional ability I felt entire confidence, to draw up for me an opinion on the subject; and a copy of this opinion I thought it right to transmit to Her Majesty's Consuls in the chief cities of the Union, and a copy of it accompanied my despatch to your Lordship of the 13th of March.”

Now, in this opinion it is distinctly laid down that any person would be found guilty of offending against the neutrality laws who either gave money or money's worth to any other person within the territories of the Union in order to induce or enable him to go abroad for the purpose of enlisting in a foreign service. Why do I say that we intentionally broke the law? I will show you from the declaration of a British officer how he understood the meaning of that opinion. Mr. Lumley, who still remains in America, and who has entirely identified himself with the proceedings of Mr. Crampton, says at page 15, in a letter to Consul Dyer—

“ But a promise to pay the travelling expenses or to provide for the family of any person who may join Her Majesty's service, as proposed by your correspondent, would not deprive such emigration of its voluntary character, but would constitute a violation of the neutrality laws of the United States, and no proposition of this nature can therefore be entertained by Her Majesty's Minister or Consuls.”

So it stands upon these documents themselves that the counsel of the British Government stated that giving either money or money's worth to persons to induce them to go abroad for the purpose of enlisting would be a violation of the law of the United States; and it stands upon these documents, also, that Mr. Lumley, on the 13th of May, representing Mr. Crampton, wrote to Consul Dyer to say that a promise to pay travelling expenses constituted a violation of the neutrality laws of the United States. The meaning, therefore, of these laws, as expounded, was known and admitted by the agents of the British Government. That was on the 13th of May. On that day Mr. Lumley stated a promise to pay travelling expenses would be a violation of the law. Where was Mr. Crampton on the 13th of May. He was at Halifax. What was Mr. Crampton doing at Halifax at the time when Mr. Lumley was thus soundly expounding the American neutrality laws? Mr. Crampton was committing that very breach of the neutrality laws—ay, and something even beyond that—which Mr.

Lumley was denouncing from his office at Washington. If you turn to page 133, you will see that Mr. Crampton begins by saying that he left Washington on the 2nd of May to go to Halifax; that he arrived at Halifax on the 11th; it was there that—

“ Stroebel, who had already brought with him some men from New York and Boston, and who appeared to be well acquainted with the condition and desires of his countrymen in the States, positively asserted that he knew many hundreds of Germans in the cities and country in the vicinity of the great lakes who only required to be informed of where they could be received in Canada, and to be supplied with the small sums which would cover their travelling expenses, immediately to present themselves on British territory for enrolment in Her Majesty's service.”

They required something more than a promise of travelling expenses; they wanted the money in hand; the promise of travelling expenses was declared illegal by Mr. Lumley at Washington—Mr. Crampton at Halifax says—

“ This plan, seeming to me to present a better prospect of success, and at the same time to be unobjectionable as regarded the laws of the United States, was adopted.”

After this, will any Gentleman rise in this House and state that the laws of the United States have not been violated? Is it possible to carry evidence further? I have shown you the American construction of the law, and I certainly hold that the American Courts and Government were better entitled to construe their own municipal law than any foreign Government. I should like to know how we should deal with the American Minister who was in this country, doing certain acts contrary to our construction of the law, judicial and otherwise, and should bring forward some ingenious view taken on the other side of the Atlantic with respect to that construction in order to justify his acts? But the case does not stand upon the opinion of your own American lawyer; it stands upon Mr. Lumley's declaration on the part of the British Government, that it was a breach of the law to promise to pay these travelling expenses, combined with Mr. Crampton's simultaneous declaration that at that very period, at Halifax, he agreed to a plan for paying hard cash to persons then in the United States to enable them to find their way to Halifax and enlist. That is what I call an intentional breach of the American neutrality laws. It is unnecessary to go through the various cases; I am sorry to say they are too many. My right hon. Friend (Mr. M. Gibson) has mentioned the case of Mr. Smolenski and the contract with Mr. Howe. There is no answer to that case except this—that Mr. Howe was not diplomatically employed by the British Government in the United States. There were, in fact, no means of getting hold of this gentleman—as one of the newspapers said of him, he was too slippery. But there is one case to which I shall refer for a few moments—I mean the case of Consul Mathews. The Attorney General yesterday seemed to suppose that this was a question where the evidence was all on one side: that on the one side we had the testimony of Hertz and Stroebel, and on the other the assurances of Mr. Crampton and the three consuls. That is one reason why I congratulate the Attorney General on his felicitous and all but total ignorance of what the Blue-books contain, for it is impossible he can have read the Blue-books and imagine that that is the whole issue raised. Now, I throw over Hertz and Stroebel altogether, and am only sorry that that mass of affidavits from one person and another, swearing to all sorts of things, should have been produced as public documents,—those affidavits being the most worthless trash ever printed in this world. I do more than reject the testimony of Hertz and Stroebel. I do not attend to the allegations of the American Government; I look solely to the evidence afforded by our own officers and our own agents. I will not remark on the dove-like innocence of the Government in conferring commissions in the Queen's service upon gentlemen of this not very doubtful character. But, treating as you please the evidence of Hertz and Stroebel, is it true that the charges are denied by Mr. Crampton and the three consuls? With regard to these three consuls, I may observe that the evidence is not equally full as to all. I have read a most manly letter written by Mr. Barclay, and, looking to the character of the allegations made against that gentleman, whether as regards the bark Mauvy, or as respects recruiting, I think it is clear that Mr. Barclay was free from all complicity. I should also give entire credence to the assertions of Consul Mathew, but those assertions prove the very worst part of the case. The Attorney General says, there has been no breach of the municipal law of America. I am clear, then, that his studies must have stopped short of the thirty-fourth page of the Blue-book, or he would have found there evidence which, to my mind, is conclusive on this case. In the first place, I think there is no doubt that Hertz was engaged in breaking the law. In the second place, there is no doubt that Howe was the recruiting agent in connection with Hertz, and if Howe was found supplying Hertz with money it must be presumed that Howe was cognizant of the use which Hertz was about to make of it. That principle, at least, would apply to such a case occurring in this country. I have heard the Attorney General speak most ably in this House with respect to a charge of bribery at an election. If the name of Howe had been Frail, and it had been proved that Frail had handed money to Hertz for certain purposes, the Attorney General would not, I think, have had much difficulty in identifying Frail with those purposes. But between this Howe and Mr. Hertz comes in a third person, and that third person is Consul Mathew. He says, in the thirty-fourth page, that Hertz's confession was a tissue of falsehoods, and he was determined to know nothing about Hertz or anything of his proceedings. Well, that is the kind of answer we sometimes receive in committee-rooms in this House when inconvenient questions are put to witnesses about acts done at elections and money misapplied there; in that case they tell us they know nothing of the use to which that money was applied. Consul Mathew says—"At his (Hertz's) earnest request I transmitted a sealed letter to Mr. Howe, and handed him a reply, containing, I believe, money." Well, that is very cautious on the part of Consul Mathew, when we remember that his belief was not formed without good and sufficient grounds, for this reason—that he took a receipt for the money—"for which," he says, "Hertz gave a receipt, made out to Mr. Howe, and inclosed by me to him." Mr. Mathew was always very judicious; the receipt was not made out to him; Hertz swears wrongfully that the receipt was made out to Consul Mathew; but it was made out to Howe; Mr. Mathew handed money from Howe to Hertz; he took a receipt from Hertz and sent it back to Howe.

"On a second occasion," he says, "I declined to give him the money, though merely the channel of transfer; and the amount was sent to the proprietor of an hotel, from whose bookkeeper he received it."

These are not chance or casual expressions, for much further on in the book Consul Mathew travels over the same ground. He twice handed money from Howe to Hertz; he sent the money by a circuitous channel; and there is no doubt he sent it in that way in order that it might be the more difficult to trace. Can there be a doubt as to the character of that act? Is there any lawyer who will say that in a Committee of this House Consul Mathew would not have been held to be implicated in the proceedings of Howe, or that the American Government were not right in the view they took upon this point? Then, shall I be told that this was the proceeding of Consul Mathew—that the British Government had nothing to do with it? Now, Consul Mathew, upon the whole, behaved with considerable prudence and propriety, for, although he had done these acts, yet, at any rate, he was determined that the responsibility should not rest with him, and therefore, he took very good care to inform Mr. Crampton. Mr. Crampton, at page 35, acknowledges the receipt from Consul Mathew of the letter to which I have just been referring, and says—

“I have in the meantime forwarded a copy of your despatch to Her Majesty's Government, and I have satisfaction in assuring you that I can see nothing in any of your proceedings in regard to this matter which appear to me to be incorrect, or derogatory to your office.”

I apprehend, therefore, that Mr. Crampton is pretty clearly responsible for the whole of Mr. Mathew's proceedings. But does the responsibility stop there? Mr. Crampton again, with perfect propriety, sent home to Lord Clarendon Mr. Mathew's letter, together with his own letter of approval, and on the 2nd of November Lord Clarendon acknowledges the receipt of that communication in the following terms:—

“I have received your despatch of the 15th ult. and its enclosures, respecting the proceedings which have been taken in the United States' District Court at Philadelphia, in the case of Henry Hertz, who has been pronounced guilty of having violated the neutrality laws by enlisting recruits for the British army; and I have to state to you that I approve the answer which you returned to Mr. Consul Mathew's communications to you upon this subject.”

Consul Mathew thus identifies himself with Mr. Crampton. Mr. Crampton identifies himself with Lord Clarendon, and Lord Clarendon we can only regard as the organ of the British Government. What is the explanation of these facts? There are plenty more, but I will not weary the House with going through them, for the length of these discussions even now bewilders one, and it is necessary to throw overboard much matter. The acts which I have detailed were contrary to the municipal law of America, not only as construed by the executive Government, by the Courts, by the Attorney General of America, but as construed by the confidential adviser of Mr. Crampton, as construed on the 13th of May by the British Mission at Washington itself. Here, however, we are traversed by the opinion of Judge Kane. In September, Judge Kane delivered a judgment, in which he stated distinctly that the payment of passage money, the giving an inducement in money or money's worth to people to enlist in a foreign service, was a breach of the American law; but it is said, “Oh, that was in September; look at his opinion in May! In September the American Government had entered into a controversy with the British Government, in May it was supposed that they were merely persecuting a few wretched unsupported individuals.” It is thus coolly insinuated that Judge Kane prostituted the judicial conscience, and gave, in September, a contrary opinion as to the construction of a law to that which he had given in May, in order to serve a political purpose. I hope that all Members of this House will show some respect for the feelings of the Americans. There is nothing of which the Americans are more justly proud, nothing in which they associate themselves more closely with the great country from which they have sprung than the character of their judicature, and the character of their laws and of their courts is established in the world. How should we look upon a charge against one of our own eminent Judges, first, of having given two opposite constructions of a law within a few months, the second being a false construction, in order to please a Government of the day? But the charge rests upon a very sandy foundation; there is no evidence of any real contrariety in Judge Kane's opinions. The allegation of the British Government is, that in May, Judge Kane said it was not contrary to the American law to pay the passage of a person going to enlist abroad; but while the opinion of September is authentically reported in the official reports of the proceedings of the Court, the opinion of May is a paragraph out of a newspaper, a paragraph which grossly misquotes the American law, by asserting that it is an offence in an American citizen to go beyond the boundaries of the United States with intent to enlist. Of course an abridgment, a mere synopsis of what is said, does not contain those details and explanations without which it is impossible to give judicial force and meaning to the words of a magistrate. But, after all, there is nothing in Judge Kane's opinion, assuming the paragraph to be correct. He says:—"I do not think that the payment of the passage from this country of a man who desires to enlist in a foreign port comes within the Act." That is his bare and naked proposition; but you insert in it other words—you say that because the payment of the passage of a man does not in itself constitute an offence, ergo, the payment of the passage of a man by the British Government does not constitute an offence. The two cases are very different. Suppose my right hon. Friend near me and I reside in the United States; he is rich and I am poor; I tell him that my feelings are with the old country in the war in which she is engaged, and that I will go to Halifax and enter her service if he will assist me. I do not apprehend that my right hon. Friend would be guilty of an offence if he complied with my request. Would not that be a totally different case from the payment of money by the British Government to its agents for the purpose of inducing men to go; That is not all. Judge Kane's opinion was given at the end of May, but what were you doing at the beginning of May, in April, in March? Then you had the construction put upon the law by your own lawyer, yet you fall back for your justification upon an unauthenticated paragraph in an American newspaper coming long after the acts with which you are charged had been committed. Such is the celebrated case of Judge Kane's opinion! In the beginning of March your own lawyer told you the meaning of the American law; why did you not act upon it? Why did you, long after it had been communicated to you, and long before Judge Kane opened his mouth, give men free passages and hard cash, and offer them other inducements to enlist! The two chief points urged in defence of the Government are the apology and the abandonment. I have already spoken of the apology—now where is the abandonment? This is one of the most mysterious and singular parts of a case which contains much that is singular and mysterious. The hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter) said the mistake was no sooner discovered by the Government than it was corrected: and last year a question was put by the vigilance of the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck), to which the noble Lord at the head of the Government gave an answer that was very satisfactory to the country. The noble Lord said that, not only had recruiting been abandoned in the United States, but that even our depôt at Halifax had been abandoned—that the exercise of an unquestioned right had been foregone rather than the risk should be run of having the slightest misunderstanding with the American Government. I am astonished to see the evidence as to this point; it absolutely demands a full, detailed, and careful explanation. On the 22nd of June, Lord Clarendon addresses a letter to Mr. Crampton, which may be construed as an order for the abandonment of the recruiting scheme. The noble Lord states that the abandonment takes place by the desire of the Minister for War, and that similar letters will be addressed to the Governors of Nova Scotia and Canada. If letters containing those orders had been so sent the proceedings would have been altogether discontinued; the subsequent correspondence assumes that they were discontinued, and consequently when the American Government at a much later period complained of their continuance they were taunted with the fact that even before they had had time to make a complaint—namely, on the 22nd of June, the scheme had been abandoned. Was it or was it not abandoned? Now, I am confident that the letter of the 22nd of June was intended to be sent; but some unfortunate mishap appears to have befallen it; we do not know the course it took, and no explanation respecting it is given. A careful consideration of the dates of the alleged abandonment is important, because the Americans have been condemned in this country as highly unreasonable on account of having complained of acts which had been put an end to long before those complaints were made. That is a most important statement, if true, but a most extraordinary figment if not true, and a grievous wrong to the American Government. I am convinced that there was no intentional misstatement made with regard to the time at which the abandonment of the recruiting system by her Majesty's Government took place; but at the same time let us see at what time the abandonment really did take place: and to arrive at that we must consider the statements of Mr. Crampton and Sir Gaspard le Marchant as to when they first became cognisant of the wishes of the Government in that respect. Mr. Crampton states that he first became aware of the desire of the British Government to abandon the scheme of recruiting on the 2nd of August. Sir Gaspard le Marchant, whose position was of still more importance, because Halifax was the great centre of operation, states that it was on the 17th of August that he first received an intimation that he was to cease his proceedings, and even then he did not receive the intimation from the Colonial Secretary at home, but through Mr. Crampton. Her Majesty's Government found out, therefore, that during this period these proceedings were going on and were being complained of, and yet to those complaints they retorted that they had abandoned the scheme of recruiting long ago, and Lord Clarendon, in a somewhat contemptuous tone, stated that recruiting had long ceased, at the same time expressing the opinion that the American Government had not appreciated as they ought to have done the conduct of Her Majesty's Ministers in abandoning those proceedings. He stated that the abandonment of recruiting took place on the 22nd of June; but, as I have pointed out to the House, the letters ordering a discontinuance of the system reached Mr. Crampton only on the 2nd of August, and Halifax on the 17th of the same month. It appears to me, then, that we originally commenced a system of concealment towards the American Government; and not only did we do that, but we also adopted measures calculated to mislead them. It appears that we took the most trustworthy opinion as to the law of the United States, and not only acted against that opinion, but continued to do so for many months after the time at which we professed to have abandoned the course which we had commenced. After this can the House say that the American Government had no just cause for complaint? Can we refuse to admit a wrong to America, because the Government assert that no wrong whatever has been done? It appears to me to be that sort of case which scarcely admits of further argument or illustration. If it is to be made a matter of dispute that any cause of complaint has been given to the Government of the United States, then I think that we may fold our arms in despair and say, "Even in this imperfect world some things have hitherto been held to be real, and beyond the possibility of a doubt; but henceforth nothing is certain, there is nothing upon which reliance can be placed, there is nothing which may not be made a subject for captious disputation." It is said that there is nothing in the instructions of the British Government to cause a wrong to the American Government. Now, what is the real fact? That there was not a single act with which the Government were not acquainted. Lord Clarendon, arguing with the American Government, says that anything short of the conclusion of an actual contract to enlist within the limits of the United States may be done, and innocently done. Now, that is one way of avoiding responsibility, because a contract is governed by the lex loci, and therefore a contract to enlist could not be concluded at all; and he then goes on to say to the agents of the Government, "You may persuade persons to enlist, you may assist them in so doing, you may pay their passage to a place where they can be enlisted," although such an opinion was contrary to the opinion of the American courts, contrary to the opinion of his own law officers, and contrary to the declaration of Mr. Lumley himself, the agents of the British Government. Well but, says the hon. Member for North Warwickshire, "The American Government has accepted the apologies which have been made." Now, Sir, I admit that such is the case, and I do not seek to detract from the force of what they have done. But a most extraordinary state of things has been brought about. The American Government acquits the British Government, but at the same time punishes Mr. Crampton and the three consuls; while the British Government maintains and acquiesces in the acts of its agents, and yet accepts with satisfaction its own acquittal. This is a simple unadorned statement, it contains no heightening epithets, and, indeed, I do not think that any epithet could heighten it. Mr. Crampton has been made a scapegoat—by whom is a question which I will not discuss—but I want to know what single act of Mr. Crampton has not been fully covered by the British Government—and whether it would not be contrary to the character and practice of this House, when there is no single action of Mr. Crampton which has not met with the approval of the Government, to allow any distinction to be drawn between the proceedings of Mr. Crampton and those of the British Government. I admit fully the honourable conduct in this respect of those who sit upon the Treasury bench, because they have not attempted to draw any such distinction in debate; but whether they have not practically drawn that distinction is a matter open to more argument. The dismissal of Mr. Crampton was either right or wrong. Now, the hon. and learned Member for Leominster (Mr. J. G. Phillimore) says that it is the undoubted right of any State to ask for the withdrawal of any Minister accredited to it at its own pleasure, and without assigning any reason. Now, I am not, like the hon. and learned Gentleman, qualified professionally to deal with that subject; but, from referring to authorities upon the subject, I am inclined to think that some reason should be assigned, and in the present instance the American Government have admitted that principle, because they have assigned a reason. But, Sir, what an extraordinary course is that adopted by the hon. and learned Gentleman! The hon. and learned Gentleman says that the American Government had a perfect right to demand the dismissal of Mr. Crampton, and he gives that as a reason for supporting the conduct of a Ministry which, when the demand was made, refused to comply with it. That, Sir, appears to me a considerable anomaly. The American Government had either received just cause for offence or not. If it had, then it had a right to make a demand, which ought to have been complied with. If it had not, then it had no right to make the demand for the recall of Mr. Crampton, and the dismissal of that Gentleman ought not to have been accepted as it has been. And whatever happens, the Government ought not to allow matters to remain in their present doubtful and anomalous state; for to allow Mr. Dallas to remain here, and at the same time, by not replacing Mr. Crampton, to exhibit a certain amount of ill-feeling to the American Government, does not redound to the credit or honour of the country. It is true that if we send a substitute for Mr. Crampton, it is going far towards admitting that the Americans have received just cause of offence; but that they have, can any one in this House seriously doubt? It is impossible for any hon. Gentleman to read the Blue-book and question whether the law of America has been broken. I will not enter into the inquiry whether the question was one which it was worth the while of the American Government to raise; that is a matter for them to judge. It might have been a more generous course not to raise it, but no one can dispute its right to raise it. We commenced by a course of concealment, and even now, so far as the vast majority of the public and even of Members of this House is concerned, the whole affair is so complicated with dates and events, which require great pains and study to extract from these papers, so long buried in the archives of the Foreign Office, that very imperfect information exists. The ultimate judgment, however, of this House and of the country is not doubtful, as may be gleaned from the character of this debate. At the commencement of the debate, several hon. Members rose to deprecate the Motion of the hon. Member for Mayo; but all carefully avoided giving any opinion on, or defending the conduct of, the Government. The hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Spooner) deprecated the policy of raising the present discussion, but he carefully avoided giving any opinion upon its merits. The hon. Member for Montrose carefully avoids defending the proceedings of the Government, but he says that they do not deserve the censure of this House of Commons, and, to prove his position, he has condescended to throw upon Mr. Crampton the responsibility which ought to belong to his employers. It is impossible that the result of this discussion can have any effect on the real question, whether the law of America has been broken. The evidence on that point is smashing—it is impossible to resist it—it only required to be sifted. There is no principle on which the contrary can be maintained, unless a principle which would render all construction impossible and all intercourse between nations absurd. I do not deny that it is a question which deserved discussion in this House. I do not know what may be the intentions of the hon. Gentleman who made the Motion, not being in his counsels; but he has acted on his privilege as an independent Member. The debate which has taken place will, I believe, not be altogether free from inconvenience, but I am certain that it will have this great advantage, that it will tend to the real elucidation of the facts. It is for the true, substantial, and permanent interest of the two countries that the facts should be elucidated. If the American people are made aware of the facts, they will take care that their Government does not heedlessly carry them into a quarrel. The English people, too, when properly informed on the subject, will also exercise a similar salutary influence, and this debate is the first effort made to bring a knowledge of the facts to the mind of the English people. Hitherto, the facts have never been brought to the test of argument. They have been the property of the writers or of persons using them for purposes of their own; and they were now for the first time exposed to free discussion. I was sorry when the noble Lord at the head of the Government attempted to put a close to this debate last night, but I do not suppose that the discussion is of the most agreeable character to the Government. I grant that my noble Friend acts on a sound general rule in giving the weight of his authority against the practice of frequent adjournments of debate; but the importance of this matter is hardly to be overstated. The facts with respect to American law are too clear for sophistry itself to disguise. If it were possible to insure the real study of the Blue-book by all the Members of this House, there would be no serious difference of opinion remaining as to whether the American law had been observed or not. If persons responsible for the consequences of their opinions were prepared to take up this question, I should not hesitate to give my adhesion to an authentic expression of the sentiment of the House; but, in an abstract vote of censure, I am not prepared to participate. When the hon. Gentleman opposite said this was a party question, I could not help hoping that he would not give the weight of his character against party combinations in this House, which are associated with some of the best chapters in our history. When I look back to the period when party combinations were strong in this House—when Sir Robert Peel was on those (the Opposition) benches, and Lord John Russell on these, I think, though many mistakes and errors were committed on both sides, that, on the whole, the Government of the country was honourably and efficiently carried on. I believe that the day for this country will be a happy day when party combinations shall be restored on such a footing. But this question, instead of being a party question, is a most remarkable illustration of the disorganised state of parties; and of the consequent impotency of the House of Commons to express a practical opinion with respect to the foreign policy of the country. Under these circumstances, the only resource left to me is the undisguised expression of the opinions, which I strongly and conscientiously (perhaps erroneously) feel after the study of these papers. I have had the privilege of expressing those opinions freely and strongly—a privilege which I would not have waived on any account when I consider the bearing of the case with respect to the American alliance, which I so highly prize; or with respect to that which I still more highly prize and more dearly love—the honour and fair fame of my country.

MR. J. G. PHILLIMORE explained. His expression with regard to Judge Kane was, that Judge Kane had—no doubt, conscientiously—changed his opinion with respect to the neutrality-laws; and that if so eminent a Judge as that had been in doubt as to the real interpretation of the law, it was excusable in an English consul.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, he was conscious of the disadvantage of following so accomplished a speaker as the right hon. Gentleman who had just sat down; but he was greatly relieved by the impossibility which he felt in believing that the right hon. Gentleman was in earnest in the arguments which he had used. He was utterly unable to see in what way the right hon. Gentleman connected his arguments with the conclusion at which he had arrived. The right hon. Gentleman commenced by telling the House that he should not vote in the same lobby with the hon. Member for Mayo; but he went on to deliver a speech which, if it was sincerely felt, was completely irreconcilable with the conclusion which he had enunciated. He could not, therefore, but think that what they had just heard was a mere intellectual excitation, which, indeed, if it were to have any effect at all, must lead to an entirely different vote to that which the right hon. Gentleman said he meant to give. True, the right hon. Gentleman told the House very clearly what it was that he should have wished to see. He complained very much that the angels on the other side had feared to tread where the hon. Member for Mayo had rushed in, and he avowed that if the party on the opposite benches had not felt their obligation to their country to be greater than their views of personal interest, and if they had led this attack, he would have been in their ranks, provided they had directed it to seizing the Government from the hands of those who now held it. But, further than that, the right hon. Gentleman had been bold enough to say that the American Government did not know their own case, and that they ought not to have arrived at the satisfactory termination of the matter that they had. After telling the House that he would dismiss altogether from consideration the evidence of Hertz and Stroebel, and the affidavits subsequently made, the right hon. Gentleman, by some mysterious and wonderful process, would make it appear that the American lawyers did not know their business—that they did not understand their own law, and that, in point of fact, there were abundant materials on which to form a conclusion which were never produced at the trial. The right hon. Gentleman's view of the present position of this question was, that the English Government were happy to acquiesce in their own acquittal, and that Mr. Crampton was the scapegoat whom they were willing to sacrifice as the price of their own exoneration; but he was surprised to find that the right hon. Gentleman, who had evidently studied these papers with the greatest care, should expect the House of Commons to adopt an opinion entirely at variance with that which the American Government had expressed, and had placed on record in Mr. Marcy's despatch of the 27th of May. Surely, the American Government knew their own case better and were better able to say what ought to satisfy them than the right hon. Gentleman, and they in Mr. Marcy's despatch had stated, that they were abundantly satisfied with the explanations which they had received from the British Government, and that they were perfectly convinced that there never was any intention on the part of the British Government to offend either against the municipal law or against what they were fond of calling "the Sovereign rights of the United States." The real position of the matter was simply this—and it was, no doubt, perfectly well known to the acute mind of the right hon. Gentleman. The American Government, in effect, say in this despatch:—

"You (the British Government) have exonerated yourselves, but your agents have acted indiscreetly—they have been led into the commission of acts which we perfectly see were altogether foreign to your instructions, and you are therefore bound to recall them."

To this the British Government replied, by asking for the evidence on which the

The Solicitor General

American Government had arrived at this conclusion. To what evidence did the American Government point? Why, to that very evidence which the right hon. Gentleman has himself admitted to be altogether unworthy of belief. The British Government said, in reply, that they could not accept such testimony in the face of the declarations of our Minister and of our consuls as conclusive proof of their indiscretion. Mr. Marcy did not complain of our not adopting the American view of the matter; on the contrary, he allowed, in the fairest manner, that there might be a difference of opinion as to the correct conclusion to be drawn from the evidence produced, with reference to the complicity of Mr. Crampton and the consuls; but he maintained that his Government were bound to accept the conclusion drawn by their own courts of justice, and that, consequently, as we would not withdraw Mr. Crampton, they were compelled to dismiss him. How could that possibly be represented as an intentional insult to this country? Nothing was more common in life than that from the same facts, different conclusions should be drawn. Nothing could be more natural and reasonable, therefore, than the position in which the matter at present stood. The American Government said, they were perfectly satisfied with the conduct of our Government; but that they differed from us as to the bearing and value of certain evidence affecting our agents, and they, not being bound to attach so much moral weight to their declarations as we did, had determined to act upon their own conclusions and to dismiss them. That was the simple state in which the matter now stood. The right hon. Gentleman, however, maintained that the American Government ought not to have been so easily satisfied, that they ought to have formed an entirely different conclusion. This, he submitted, was not the view which this country ought to take of the matter. It was exactly one of those things which had been wisely deprecated by the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Spooner). The adoption of this view of the matter in the House of Commons would produce ten times as much mischief as any argument, any representation, which could be found in the despatches of Mr. Marcy or in the disquisitions of Mr. Caleb Cushing. Now, before examining the arguments of the right hon. Gentleman, and in order to fix the data on which this question ought to be argued, it was necessary to ascertain first of all, what the law of the case was. He had observed in the American despatches, and in the arguments addressed to the House, a great deal of looseness and want of precision in the representations of the law upon this subject. At one time the whole complaint in the American papers was, that there had been an invasion of the municipal law of the United States. ["Hear, hear!"] At another time, as the hon. Member who cheered had no doubt seen, they altogether abandoned that position, and rested their case more particularly and more anxiously upon what they called an invasion of their rights of sovereignty. Then there was a third view of the matter put forth, especially by American writers—that the offence committed by this country consisted not in a direct invasion of the municipal law, nor in any breach of the international law, but in an attempt to evade, and by so evading, to break the municipal law. It was requisite that these matters should be well understood. In the observations which he was about to make, he should particularly refer to an opinion of Mr. Cushing, which had been put forward as a sort of manifesto of all that jurisprudence could supply upon the subject, and which some person had been at the expense of printing and extensively circulating, no doubt with a view to this discussion. In this document the argument was based not so much upon the municipal law of the United States as upon an exposition of international law. Upon an examination in the original language of the citations from the writings of jurists made by the Attorney General of the United States, it would be found that their result was, that international law went only to the extent of forbidding any nation actually to enrol or enlist soldiers in the territory of another. ["Hear!"] Actually to enlist or enrol. The hon. Member who cheered would probably think, for a moment, that he might understand the full meaning of those words. The offence, therefore, prohibited by the international law was the actual enrolment or enlistment of soldiers—What Wolfius, who was one of the authorities referred to, termed the inscriptio militiæ. That was the full limit of the international law applicable to this case. The American Attorney General, in page 11 of this great pamphlet, referred especially to a treatise of Mr. Wheaton on international law, a translation by Mr. Laurence, and the admirable commentaries of Mr. Chancellor Kent. Mr. Wheaton, in speaking of the time when the municipal law, first adopted in 1790, and re-enacted in 1818, was introduced into America, cited the authority both of Wolfius and Vattel, in order to show that the levying of troops was an exclusive prerogative of sovereignty which no foreign Power could lawfully exercise, within the territory of another State, without its express permission. That was the only principle which was furnished by the international law in reference to this subject. The municipal law of the United States went much further; for it not only enforced this principle of the international law, but also prohibited any person from hiring or engaging any citizen of the United States within the territories of those States to go to a foreign country to be there enrolled or enlisted in the service of a foreign Power. It was necessary to observe, that under the municipal law it was requisite that the offence should be committed within the territory of the United States. With regard to the third point of the argument, that of the evasion of the municipal law of the United States, it was necessary to remember that the principle of the law of the United States was, that an American citizen might, with perfect liberty, expatriate himself. There was in the American law no such principle as that which prevailed in the law of England, and was embodied in the Act against enlisting in the service of foreign Powers, passed in the year 1819. The Americans had admitted the possibility of persons being naturalised in their country with great facility, and they had a corresponding principle that their citizens might expatriate themselves, and put on a different citizenship, except only to the extent to which they were absolutely forbidden by their laws. That principle was very well expressed by Mr. Marcy in a despatch which would be found in page 43 of the supplemental papers. Mr. Marcy wrote to M. Molina, the Minister of Costa Rica:—

"The right of expatriation is not, I believe, withheld from the citizens of any free Government, or from residents under its jurisdiction.
* * * The liberty to go where hopes of better fortune may entice them belongs to free men, and no free Government withholds it."

Therefore, in considering the argument on which a great deal of stress had been laid—that the British Government were exposed to censure because their proceedings were deliberately intended to enable parties to evade the law of the United States

—it must be remembered that there was no principle embodied in the law beyond the letter of its enactment. The law was in restraint of natural liberty, and the principle therefore was natural liberty, except so far as it was expressly and positively restrained. You could not violate the principle of such a law unless you violated its letter. It must be construed strictly; it could not by construction be extended beyond the letter of the enactment. It was idle to speak of a breach of international law where there was no breach of the municipal law of the United States, because the municipal law went beyond the international. If there were no breach of the municipal law, à multo fortiori there could be no breach of international law, or of the rights of sovereignty or national privileges of America. The whole of that argument was, if he might say so, very respectfully, most idle, for their rights of sovereignty were nothing in the world more than the power of preventing the enrolling of soldiers within their territory. These rights of sovereignty were embodied in their own municipal law, and consequently the question was reduced to whether we had violated the letter of that law. That law, let it be remembered, must be construed strictly, and not in an enlarged and indefinite extent. It must be taken according to the letter, according to the exact restraint which it put upon what was otherwise the natural right and liberty of the citizens of the United States. With this introduction he would approach the arguments which had been urged with so much force and so much ingenuity by the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone), who began with a reference to the document published by Mr. Angus M'Donald. Had the right hon. Gentleman understood the bearing of that document, he would have abstained from the remarks and the arguments which he had founded upon it. He had said that Mr. Crampton not only practised concealment towards the American Government, but was also guilty of a species of false suggestion, because he went to the American Government, referred to this document, and produced a letter, which the right hon. Gentleman seemed to suppose was written for that very purpose, in which he stated that he had prohibited its publication. The right hon. Gentleman would be so good as to bear in mind that the manifesto was published in the United States—that it professed to be issued on the authority, in the name, and with the voice of the British Government, and that, holding out an offer on behalf of that Government to every individual who might be willing to accept the terms of the proposal, it formed the foundation for a contract with all who were prepared to comply with the specified conditions. If the handbill bearing the signature of "Angus M'Donald" had been published with the sanction and authority of Mr. Crampton, that gentleman would indeed have been obnoxious to the censure sought to be cast upon him, for the document would have amounted to a proposal to certain individuals then being in the United States to enter the service of a foreign Power. There would then have been a clear hiring and retaining within the United States of persons who were willing to go abroad for the purpose of being enlisted. Nothing could be more precise or intelligible than the proposals set forth in Angus M'Donald's placard. They comprised a bounty of £6 or 30 dollars, "together with the pay of 8 dollars a month, rations, good clothing, and warm quarters." But it was, above all things, important to bear in mind that this manifesto, so far from being sanctioned, was expressly repudiated by Mr. Crampton. [Sir F. THESIGER: The Bill stated what had been actually done.] The hon. and learned Gentleman was wrong in the construction which he put upon the handbill, for it clearly stated that "the British Government offer," not that it had offered. That the Bill did not refer to a past transaction was, moreover, clear from the concluding passage:—

"It is hoped that those effective men who are now suffering and in distress will avail themselves of this rare opportunity of bettering their condition before it is too late."

Upon the receipt of the information that such a handbill was in existence, Mr. Crampton wrote the following letter to Consul Barclay:—

"Washington, March 22, 1855.

"Sir—I have received your letter of the 21st instant, inclosing a printed handbill, signed Angus M'Donald, and informing me that the said M'Donald states to you that he has issued it by the authority of Her Majesty's Government. I have to state to you that Angus M'Donald has no authority from Her Majesty's Government for the issue of the handbill in question, or for hiring or retaining any person in the United States to go beyond the limits of the same with intent to be enlisted in Her Majesty's service. This would constitute an infraction of the Neutrality Laws of the United States (Act of Congress, 1818, s. 2); and Her Majesty's Government, however desirous they may be to obtain recruits for the British army, are still more anxious that the laws of a State with which Her Majesty is at peace should be respected."

It was clear from this extract that Mr. Crampton put the same construction on the handbill for which he (the Solicitor General) was contending, and that, perceiving that it might be taken to constitute an infraction of the neutrality laws of the United States, he, so far from de-luding the American Government, or at-tempting, as had been insinuated, to throw dust in their eyes, at once denounced and repudiated it. It had, indeed, been darkly hinted against him that though he dis-avowed this particular document, he had acted in the spirit of it, and had agents actively employed throughout the Union in obtaining recruits, and offering proposals similar to those which it contained. But there was not the slightest foundation for any such statement. Except in the tainted testimony of Hertz and Stroebel—witnesses whom the right hon. Gentleman himself admitted to be utterly unworthy of credit—there was not a particle of evidence throughout these proceedings to show that Mr. Crampton had done, or had given to any human being authority to do, anything at all approaching to what was proposed to be done by Angus M'Donald. Dismissing, then, their testimony, the matter rested without any foundation, and that point of the right hon. Gentleman's argument fell to the ground. With respect to the payments made by Consul Mathew to Hertz in the name of Mr. Howe, it had suited the purpose of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) to call in question the accuracy of the newspaper report which represented Judge Kane as having expressed an opinion that those payments did not involve an infringement of the municipal laws of the United States; he said it was a mere newspaper report, and was totally without foundation. He (the Solicitor General) accepted without reserve the doctrine that we should not require the American Judges to bend to our interpretation of the law. He concurred in the eulogiums pronounced upon those learned persons, and admitted that he had no fault to find with the judgment delivered in this particular case by Judge Kane; but he certainly did think it a little hard, that while the right hon. Gentleman had impugned the accuracy of the report at-tributing a certain opinion to the Judge in question it had never occurred to him to inform the House that the American At-torney General had himself quoted and relied on that opinion, and that the state-ment of the Attorney General coincided exactly with the Report to which the right hon. Gentleman had alluded. Writing to Mr. Van Dyke, on the 12th of September, 1855, Mr. Caleb Cushing alluded to Judge Kane's judgment in these terms—

"This Government has, of course, addressed to that of Great Britain such demands of public redress and satisfaction in the premises as the national honour requires. But the Government of Great Britain, with extraordinary inattention to the grave aspect of its acts, namely, the fla-grant violation of our sovereign rights involv-ed in them, has supposed it a sufficient justifi-cation of what it has done to reply that it gave instructions to its agents so to proceed as not to infringe our municipal laws; and it quotes the re-mark of Judge Kane in support of the idea that it has succeeded in this purpose. It may be so. Judge Kane is an upright and intelligent Judge, and will pronounce the law as it is, without fear or favour."

That upright and intelligent Judge, pro-nouncing the law with such conscientious accuracy, had given it as his opinion that "the payment of the passage of a man who desired to enlist in a foreign port did not come within the Act of 1818, com-monly called the Neutrality Law." If this were so, what became of the whole fabric of argument attempted to be raised on the allegation that money had been paid for travelling expenses by Mr. Cramp-ton? Setting aside the evidence of Hertz and Stroebel, who, on the admission of the right hon. Gentleman himself, were totally unworthy of credit, there was not the faint-est pretext for anything that Mr. Crampton, or any agent acting in the name of the British Government, had paid one farthing for the purpose of hiring or retaining any person to enlist in the service of England. The next point taken by the right hon. Gentleman was, that Mr. Crampton had concealed from the Minister of the United States the means of employment he had provided for the persons whom he desired to hire with the view to enlistment. But did Mr. Marcy make that complaint? No. It was left entirely to the ingenuity of the right hon. Gentleman to suggest that of which Mr. Marcy never dreamt. He would venture to trouble the House with the statements of Mr. Marcy himself, which would be found in the last papers laid upon the table. In his last despatch Mr. Marcy, speaking of Mr. Crampton's repre-sentation of what took place on the 22nd of March, and citing a passage in Lord Clarendon's letter of the 30th of April, said—

"I repeat now, with entire consciousness of its accuracy, what I stated in my letter of the 28th of December last, that at that interview on the 22nd of March—the only one I ever had with Mr. Crampton, as he admits, in which the recruitment business was alluded to—he (Mr. Crampton) had satisfied me that his Government had no connection with it, and was in no way responsible for what was doing in the United States to raise recruits for the British army. But I am quite certain, that on no occasion has he intimated to me that the British Government, or any of its officers, was, or had been, in any way concerned in sending agents into the United States to recruit therein, or to use any inducements for that purpose. Nor did he ever notify to me that he was taking, or intended to take, any part in furthering such proceedings. Such a communication, timely made, would probably have arrested the mischief at its commencement. If he had then apprised me of the system of recruiting which had at that time been already arranged and put into operation within the United States by British agents, and under his superintending direction, he would have been promptly notified, in the most positive terms, that such acts were contrary to the municipal law, incompatible with the neutral policy of the country, a violation of its national sovereignty, and especially exceptionable in the person of the representative of any foreign Government."

Here they came to the introduction into the language employed upon this matter of the word "recruiting," a word used by Mr. Marcy throughout the correspondence in the most general sense, but which was not to be found in the American law. The complaint of Mr. Marcy was, that Mr. Crampton never represented to him that agents had been sent into the United States by the British Government to obtain recruits. But this was begging the very question in dispute. If the word "recruiting" was taken to mean enlisting, hiring, or engaging, where was the evidence that such a thing had taken place? There was not a tittle of proof, save the testimony which the right hon. Gentleman admitted to be unworthy of credit. It was impossible to peruse Mr. Marcy's letter without observing that he took for granted the very point in controversy, and assumed that there had been concealment on Mr. Crampton's part. Having now gone over the principal topics adverted to in the eloquent address of the right hon. Gentleman, the House would perhaps permit him to recall to its recollection the actual issue before it. The House was called upon to pronounce that Her Majesty's Ministers should have been satisfied with the means adopted by the American Government to try the facts of this case. The House was already acquainted with the nature of the evidence adduced before the court of law; but he hoped that he would be excused for asking their earnest attention to the manner in which the American jury who heard the case was sought to be influenced. The real issue to be determined was this:—Ought our Government to have been content with the judicial investigation that took place in the United States, and with the decision in which it resulted? In Mr. Crampton's last despatch an account was given of the way in which the persons composing the grand jury were got together, nominally to find a Bill against Mr. Hertz, but, in reality to find an indictment against our Minister. Hon. Gentlemen had complained that newspaper reports of the trial were relied upon; but the truth was, that we had no other evidence of the proceedings before the Court except that furnished by the American journals. He held in his hand a pamphlet containing a republication of the shorthand report of the trial taken specially for The Pennsylvania newspaper. The impartiality of this report might be judged of from the fact that all the inflammatory harangues of Mr. Van Dyke, the District Attorney of the United States, were given to the letter, whereas the speeches of the counsel for the defence were almost suppressed. The following was the language addressed to the jury by the District Attorney, acting under the immediate direction of Mr. Cushing—

"I have said that the war in the Crimea was conducted by the British, French, and other nations, as allies, against the single Power of Russia. I have said that the consequences of that war had been disastrous to the besieging parties, and that the signs of the times indicated a still more humiliating fate. The English army having met the most serious losses, the Government of Great Britain, in direct violation of her duty towards us, and with a design of misleading those residents of the United States who did not fully comprehend the nature of our laws, devised a plan for the purpose of partially regaining the position and standing which, in the absence of the proper exercise of the advanced military experience of the age, they had lost. A plan for this purpose was adopted and attempted to be carried out by his Excellency John F. Crampton, the Minister Plenipotentiary of Her Majesty, assisted by several agents of the British Government, within the territory and jurisdiction of the United States, and I think you will be satisfied Mr. Crampton thus acted with the knowledge and approbation of his Government."

In a subsequent part of the same address after a very animated appeal to the jury altogether dropping the name of Hertz and levelling the accusation against Mr. Crampton, and alleging that our Minister and his associate representatives "gave directions to Captain Stroebel to repair immediately to all the recruiting offices in the United States and order the persons engaged in those offices to adopt the system which they had prepared for the guidance of the recruiting agents;" the District Attorney exclaimed, "Honourable and generous Great Britain! and oh, most faithful British Ministers!" Referring to the final speech of the District Attorney, on summing up the evidence, the pamphlet stated that Mr. Van Dyke—

"Closed his remarks by a severe commentary upon the baseness and perfidy of the persons engaged as the chief actors in this flagrant attempt to violate and evade the laws and treaty obligations of the United States, and expressed the hope that the result of this case would vindicate the action of the Government in their determination to maintain our national integrity with every nation of the globe, whether it is or is not in accordance with the sinister purposes of Great Britain. By forcing this indictment thus against this defendant the President of the United States has struck as near the Throne of Her Majesty as he is enabled to do in the shape of a criminal prosecution. The extended privileges and peculiar protection given to a foreign Minister prevents, so far as he is concerned, the application of the criminal code of the country, although such foreign Minister may be proved guilty of acts which, if committed by a private individual, would make him a felon."

"You, gentlemen, may rest assured that in due time they will be called upon by our able and faithful officers at Washington to make proper atonement for the gross insult which they have offered to our laws and our people."

These were some of the statements made at a trial the record of which the American Government alleged compelled them to conclude that the acts complained of were done with the knowledge and at the instigation of Mr. Crampton. If language such as that had been used against America by the Attorney General of this country in conducting a prosecution on behalf of our Government, would not offence have been justly taken by the United States? Would anybody have regarded an investigation thus conducted as a satisfactory and impartial trial, the result of which could be accepted as a dispassionate judicial decision? Such, assuredly, would not have been the opinion entertained of it. And yet, how stood the question? The inquiry was simply this:—Ought Her Majesty's Ministers, under such circumstances, at once to have consented to recall their Minister, at the suggestion of the American Government, upon the proofs appealed to by that Government, and in opposition to the assurances of Mr. Crampton, and of all the official personages with whom he acted? He thought the House of Commons would be of opinion that, under the circumstances, Her Majesty's Government had acted rightly. That was the simple question that was at issue between the House and the American Government. The American Government were bound to accept, and they did accept, the assurance—nay, the right hon. Gentleman who had preceded him was one of the first who would claim for that assurance the fullest and most ample credit. That right hon. Gentleman must recollect that all that had been done had been nothing more than what might be called the natural consequences of those proceedings which were commenced while the right hon. Gentleman was a Member of the Government of Lord Aberdeen. The Foreign Enlistment Act must be taken as the law of this country, and one of the bases of those proceedings. We were also bound to accept this, that it was the result of the statutes for the enlistment of soldiers. Was there a place in Europe where we could go in order to enlist soldiers with so much propriety as to the United States? And why? The States contained very many of the subjects of Her Majesty, and they had become a place of refuge to numbers who owed no allegiance to the Government of the United States beyond that due from temporary residents. If, therefore, the Foreign Enlistment Act were part of the law of the land, and it came to be part of the obligation of the Ministry to execute it—and the right hon. Gentleman would not say that it should be suffered to remain a dead letter—he (the Solicitor General) demanded to what part of the globe England could resort with greater reason to carry it into effect than the United States? Not only were we likely to find a greater number of natural-born subjects ready to respond to our invitation in the United States than elsewhere, but it was a country where the municipal law with regard to the allegiance of its citizens was lighter and more easily relaxed than in any other country; and, therefore, in resorting to it we were resorting to a place where the Foreign Enlistment Act could be carried into effect with the least injury to the municipal law. He trusted, then, that the House would feel that the British Government were under no obligation to recall Mr. Crampton on the representations of the American Government. The American representations would be found to be faulty in their basis; and he hoped the House would agree with him that he had been enabled to show that the arguments of the right hon. Gentleman, built on the part of the correspondence which he had selected for reading, were simply a false conclusion—a conclusion not warranted by any justifiable view or interpretation of the municipal law of the United States, or of the exigencies of the international law.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON: I leave it to the House and the country to decide between the arguments of the hon. and learned Gentleman who has just sat down and those of my right hon. Friend the Member for the University of Oxford. The powerful speech of my right hon. Friend has, in my opinion, completely exhausted this subject, and at this late hour I would gladly abstain from trespassing upon the time of the House, were it not that, having used some strong expressions with reference to this subject on a former evening, it may fairly be expected that I should now vindicate that language. I am also desirous of stating frankly my opinion—an opinion in which I am glad to find myself supported by the right hon. Member for Oxford University—that the time has arrived when the House of Commons may fairly and properly address itself to the consideration of this painful subject. Indeed, I conceive that if we were now to shrink from the discussion of this question we should be wanting in duty to our country. The papers before us are now completed, and they tell a most discreditable tale, made worse by the last which have been produced; and I can well understand that Her Majesty's Ministers may desire to avoid a discussion, and hon. Gentlemen on both sides of the House may well have thought that a reasonable request on the part of the Government. I will go further, and will make this admission—I am willing to admit that hon. Members who are prepared to disregard the plausible request made by the Government incur thereby considerable responsibility. But the crisis is one of no ordinary importance. The circumstances of the case are peculiar as well as important, and I think we are bound to ask ourselves—will the discussion of this question at the present moment be prejudicial to the public interests? My firm persuasion is that, instead of being injurious to the public interests, the discussion of this subject now can do nothing but good. My belief is that the settlement of our delicate relations with the United States will be promoted if it be known to the public and to the American citizens that there is a party—an independent party—in this House (and I care little whether, as regards the division in the lobby, I stand in a large or small majority) which will consider the papers before us dispassionately, and raise its protest against the rashness and imprudence by which the peaceful relations between the two countries have been imperilled. Entertaining these views, I feel bound to tender my thanks to the hon. Member for Mayo for the decision and vigour with which he has disregarded the appeals that have been made to him, and has decided to bring the matter before the House of Commons, and to have a discussion of this question upon its merits. The only point, with regard to the Motion of the hon. Member for Mayo, on which I differ from the right hon. Member for Oxford University, is as to the course which my right hon. Friend intends to adopt. Whether or no the hon. Member for Mayo intends to press his Motion to a division I cannot tell. [Cheers from the Ministerial benches.] Hon. Gentlemen opposite cheer; I really know not why. [Renewed cheering.] I have no influence with the hon. Member for Mayo. There is no party connection between that hon. Gentleman and myself. But if he takes a division upon this subject, I, for one, shall undoubtedly go with him into the lobby. I was taken to task the other night for having used strong expressions upon this subject. Those expressions have been repeated during the present debate. I find that my opinion has been fully borne out, and I beg to state that I do not recede from one word I uttered on the occasion to which I refer. The right hon. Secretary for the Home Department asked last night, what was the real object of this Motion, which he said he did not understand. I think possibly the eyes of the right hon. Baronet may have been opened by the speech of the right hon. Member for the University of Oxford to-night; but if that is not the case, I have no hesitation in stating what I consider to be the charges against Her Majesty's Government upon this subject. My opinion is, that no dispassionate man can rise from a careful perusal of the papers upon the table without feeling that the conduct of the Government has been such as to compromise its character, to endanger the peace of the world, and to bring us to the verge of a war with America. The result of this conduct has been that Her Majesty's Government have offered humiliating apologies to the United States, and have been subjected to the indignity of having their Ambassador dismissed;—a most painful state of affairs, to which I am convinced Her Majesty's Government would not have submitted if they had not been conscious that their conduct with regard to the question of enlistment had been indefensible. How is it that the Government have been involved in this dilemma? I maintain that it has been by the most unwise and imprudent disregard of the most obvious requirements both of general international law and of the municipal law of the United States. The Solicitor General has spoken a good deal upon that subject to-night, and I confess I was rather amused at that part of his speech in which he expressed a great desire that any one who wished to understand the question should read the authors upon international law in the original languages. The right hon. Member for Oxford University dwelt in terms of lamentation upon the small portion of mankind, not excluding this House, who were disposed to study Blue-books; but I am inclined to think that the number of persons who will dive into international law in the original languages is still more limited. I was also rather amused at the extreme dexterity and ingenuity with which the Attorney General endeavoured last night to draw us away to the only part of the American law on the subject which has nothing whatever to do with the point at issue. The Home Secretary and the Solicitor General have followed in the same attempt. They have all endeavoured to fix our attention upon that part of the American law under which, no doubt, American citizens are perfectly free to enlist into a foreign service, or to do anything else they please when out of the United States; but that point of law has nothing to do with the question relative to the conduct of Her Majesty's Government; and I think they would have dealt more ingenuously with the House if they had dwelt upon that part of the American law which happily does not require a reference to the "original" language, for nothing could be more plain to the understanding of the most unlearned reader than the municipal law of the United States. Under that law, according to Mr. Crampton himself, it is clearly an offence to hire or detain any person to go beyond the limits or jurisdiction of the United States with intent to be enlisted; and, in my opinion, it has been by an entire disregard of that law that Her Majesty's Government have involved us in the painful difficulty in which we now find ourselves placed. I will here advert to the first despatch of Lord Clarendon, addressed to Mr. Crampton, and in which the latter was desired to communicate with Sir Gaspard le Marchant and the British consuls in the United States on the subject of the recruitment. Before that despatch there was one sent out by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Wilts (Mr. S. Herbert), who was at that time in office, the colleague of the right hon. Member for Oxford University; and here I cannot help expressing my regret that the Government of that day did not abstain altogether from any communication with Mr. Crampton. The Government made a serious mistake in entertaining the idea of drawing recruits from America for our army; but, entertaining it, there was only one mode in which it could be carried out with any degree of prudence, and that was by limiting their efforts to our own colonial possessions. If our Government had opened recruiting offices at Halifax and Quebec—where we know that loyal colonists were anxious to enter into our service—colonists whose assistance was rejected by the Minister of the Crown—and had abstained from any communication either with Mr. Crampton or with the British consuls in the United States, I think they might have added valuable recruits to the army; and if citizens of the United States had chosen voluntarily to engage in our service, they could have been enlisted without furnishing ground of complaint to the American Government. Again, passing on to the next stage of the proceedings, I cannot understand how our Government, after receiving the despatch of Mr. Crampton, dated March 26, giving an account of his first interview with Mr. Marcy, and showing clearly what the feeling of the American Cabinet was, could entertain the idea of persevering for another day in their unwise and imprudent policy of attempting to raise recruits in the United States. They ought to have abandoned their intentions immediately. And here, Sir, I must refer to the conduct of Lord Clarendon in this matter, though, I can assure the House and the Government, without the slightest degree of personal disrespect. If I were to speak of Lord Clarendon in terms of personal disrespect, sure I am that such language would find no response either in this House or in the country; but we must not be induced by feelings of a private nature to compliment away the interests of England, or to abstain from expressing the opinion which, as public men, we entertain upon a question of national importance. It was only the other evening that we heard from the noble Lord the Member for the City of London a rhetorical flourish with respect to the conduct of Lord Clarendon, in which the noble Lord expressed his wish that the same Statesman, whose name was connected with the pacification of the East, should also have the honour of putting an end to the differences with the West. That was a very amusing rhetorical sentence, but I am sorry to say that I cannot subscribe to the justice of the compliment to Lord Clarendon. In the East, I find the name of Lord Clarendon attached to a Resolution which no Minister of England ought to have signed. Last night we were told by the noble Viscount at the head of the Government that the fortifications of Ismail are to be dismantled,—an object with respect to which Lord Clarendon sustained a signal defeat at Paris. Here, again, in the West, the name which is most conspicuous in these unfortunate transactions with the United States is that of Lord Clarendon. I agree with the right hon. Member for Oxford University, that it would be most unjust to separate Lord Clarendon from his colleagues in this matter. No doubt the whole Government is responsible for the acts of one of their body, but, nevertheless, there are certain facts and circumstances involved in these proceedings which we are inevitably driven to connect with the name of Lord Clarendon. That noble Lord, instead of taking the only prudent course which was open to him as soon as he received the first warning of the feeling of the American Government—instead of at once abandoning the idea of raising recruits in the United States, sent out a despatch dated April 12, in which no intimation whatever is conveyed to our agents in America, that they should not proceed any further in the matter. What had happened in the meantime? The American Government had taken alarm; the people of the United States had found out what was going on; and as soon as the papers issued by Mr. Angus M'Donald became known, Mr. Crampton sought an interview with Mr. Marcy, the result of which he communicated in a despatch to Lord Clarendon. What was the language of Mr. Marcy—

“Mr. Marcy observed that he had never doubted that no sort of countenance would be given by Her Majesty's Government to persons who should use their name in any attempt to violate the neutrality laws. He added, however, that the proceeding in question had been brought under his notice, and that orders had already been given to the District Attorney of the United States to institute legal proceedings against Angus M'Donald, or any other persons who should be found to have rendered themselves liable to the penalties of the act of Congress regarding the enlistment of citizens or residents in the United States for the service of a foreign Power.”

(Cries of “Divide!”) I assure the House that if they will favour me with their attention I will be as brief as possible. What followed immediately upon this? Here I touch the ground so powerfully dealt with by my right hon. Friend the Member for the University of Oxford. But I have a new charge to make, and that is that the American Government were deceived—whether intentionally or not—the American Government were deceived by Her Majesty's Ministers. On the pages of the Blue-book there appear to me to be three instances in which the American Government were misled and deceived by Mr. Crampton and the agents of the British Government. The first was in Mr. Crampton's letter to Consul Barclay on the handbill of Angus M'Donald, which was read to Mr. Marcy, and which was as follows—

“I have to state to you that Angus M'Donald has no authority from Her Majesty's Government for the issue of the handbill in question, or for hiring or retaining any person in the United States to go beyond the limits of the same with intent to be enlisted in Her Majesty's service. This would constitute an infraction of the neutrality laws of the United States (Act of Congress, 1818, s. 2); and Her Majesty's Government, however desirous they may be to obtain recruits for the British army, are still more anxious that the laws of States with which Her Majesty is at peace should be respected.”

How could the American Government draw any conclusion from this letter but that the attempt was to be abandoned? The second was in Mr. Crampton's interview with Mr. Marcy; and the third was in that communication between Mr. Lumley and Mr. Marcy, in which Mr. Lumley read Lord Clarendon's letter, and assured Mr. Marcy that Mr. Crampton had determined not only that there should be no violation of the law of the United States, but no evasion of that law. What was the language of Mr. Marcy on hearing Lord Clarendon's letter read? Mr. Marcy was completely misled by the language of Mr. Lumley, which was to the effect that the Government had abandoned the attempt to recruit in the United States. Where was Mr. Crampton at this very moment? Why, he was at Halifax devising those means by which the law of the United States was to be evaded. Mr. Buchanan wrote to Lord Clarendon on the 6th of July, and complained of these deceptive practices. Mr. Buchanan said—

"When intimations were thrown out that British consuls in the United States were encouraging and aiding such enlistments, Mr. Crampton, Her Britannic Majesty's Minister at Washington, exhibited to the Secretary of State a copy of a letter which he had addressed to one of these consuls, disapproving the proceeding, and discountenancing it as a violation of the neutrality laws of the United States. After this very proper conduct on the part of Mr. Crampton, it was confidently believed that these attempts to raise military forces within the territory of a neutral nation, from whatever source they may have originated, would at once have been abandoned. This reasonable expectation has not been realised, and efforts to raise recruits within the United States for the British army are still prosecuted with energy, though chiefly in a somewhat different form."

Mr. Marcy, in his despatch of the 28th of December, again complains of the same fact—that the Government of the United States had been misled. The Solicitor General said to-night, that Mr. Marcy made no such complaint. I think I may say of him what my right hon. Friend (Mr. Gladstone) said of the Attorney General—for I very much suspect that he also has not read these papers. Mr. Marcy, in his despatch of the 28th of December, regrets that the instructions of the British Government to their agents were not made known to the American Government, and complains of the deception thus practised upon him. This despatch was answered by Lord Clarendon in a manner that gave considerable offence to the American Government. Mr. Marcy had expressed in strong but dignified terms, of which no complaint could be made, the feelings of the American Government on finding that officers of the British Government were involved in these transactions; and this despatch was followed by one from Lord Clarendon which, I regret, was not marked by the tone which usually characterises the noble Lord's despatches. Lord Clarendon complained of conspiracy, and used bad reasoning and vituperative language, in which he compares an Irish public meeting at Boston, or some other part of America, with the act of the British Government deliberately adopted and carried out by their agents. Lord Clarendon, in that despatch, fully justifies the conduct of the British officers in America. I will remind the House what the conduct of these officers was, and I will not depend either on the confession of Hertz, or the evidence of Stroebel, but mainly on the admission of the British officers themselves. I will call attention to the instruction given to Mr. Crampton, and then to the interview between Mr. Crampton and Mr. Stroebel, at Halifax, showing the connection between Mr. Crampton and Stroebel. I should like to know whether the Government are prepared to deny these two facts adduced in the trial of Hertz, that a cipher, stated to be in Mr. Crampton's handwriting, was drawn up to carry on a secret communication between Mr. Crampton and Mr. Stroebel when the latter was recruiting in America. The other fact is the allegation that when this Captain Stroebel went to the United States, he adopted the name of Smith for purposes of concealment, and that correspondence was carried on by him under the name of Smith, with a British officer, named Preston, in cipher in order to avoid detection. If this is true, what becomes of the assurances that there had been no evasion of the law of the United States? How can this be reconciled with the openness and want of concealment that are now urged by the Government? Is it true that these men were enjoined to travel as private persons in order to avoid observation? Is it true that they were hired in the American States as railway labourers, and told to go as railway labourers to Halifax? Is it true that Mr. Crampton carried on this cipher correspondence, and that the name of Smith was adopted for disguise? It is only fair to put these inquiries to the Government. If these things are true, the defence set up by the Government vanishes altogether, and I have no hesitation in saying, in the face of Parliament and the country, that, if these facts are true, I, as an English Gentleman, am entirely ashamed of them. At this late hour I will not dwell upon that point. ["Hear, hear!" from the Ministerial side.] I can easily understand the unwillingness of Gentlemen opposite to listen to these things. I think that extremely natural; but I do not understand how they should think, as it seems they do, that they only sit here to interrupt those who perform their duty. I will now touch for a moment—and it shall only be for a moment—upon the question of the conduct of the consuls, because, here again, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University has entirely occupied the ground. I think the consuls have been most unfairly treated. They ought never to have been involved in these transactions. I have been struck, on reading these papers, with the obvious reluctance of Mr. Crampton, Sir Gaspard Le Marchant, and every one of these gentlemen, to be so involved. It really seems that Her Majesty's Government were the only parties unconscious of the danger. Their officers would not touch the matter one bit further than they were obliged, although they had not the moral courage to do what Vattel tells us agents ought to do under such circumstances, namely, disobey the orders received from the Government at home. It is clear that Hertz received money through Mr. Mathews, who sent back the receipt to Mr. Howe; but it is said, "Hertz is a man of bad character." If he had not been a man of bad character he would never have been a party to these transactions. No honourable persons would have undertaken the duties these men discharged, and if Hertz and Stroebe had not been men of bad character they would not have been fit for the task assigned to them by Her Majesty's Government. I cannot refrain from alluding, for a moment, to those last despatches. As I said at the outset, they are most remarkable, and make the case worse than it was before. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General rather boasted of the complete acceptance in these despatches of the apology of the British Government; but it seems to me the language of acceptance contains one of the bitterest sarcasms I ever read. [Cries of "Divide!"] Let me entreat the attention of the House, for the sake of this great question, if not for the sake of the Gentleman putting it before them, to the boasted acceptance of the disclaimer. What is the language of Mr. Marcy? He says—

Sir John Pakington

"The Earl of Clarendon, in behalf of Her Majesty's Government, disclaims all intention to violate the laws, compromise the neutrality, or disregard the sovereignty of the United States, by enlisting troops within their territory. The President unreservedly accepts and is fully satisfied with this disclaimer. Of course the unlawful acts in question were not authorised by the British Government, but the fact is nevertheless well established that they were done, and done in the name, and at the expense, of the British Government."

Is that an acceptance of a disclaimer? Did any one ever read a more palpable sarcasm? It is perfectly clear that the writer of that despatch felt, that in drawing the distinction which he was attempting to draw between the conduct of the Government and the conduct of Mr. Crampton, he was attempting that which was impossible. The Solicitor General has adverted to this distinction, and has said, that in his conduct Mr. Crampton was guilty of indiscretion and inadvertence. [The SOLICITOR GENERAL: I said the charge against Mr. Crampton was one of indiscretion and inadvertence.] Exactly so. I had not in the least misunderstood the hon. and learned Gentleman. He told us that the charge against Mr. Crampton by the American Government contained in this despatch was indiscretion and inadvertence. Will the House allow me to read the passage which refers to Mr. Crampton? Instead of a charge of indiscretion and inadvertence, Mr. Marcy, in his last despatch, thus wrote with regard to Mr. Crampton—

"It is not the least of the causes of complaint against Mr. Crampton that, by his acts of commission in this business, or in failing to advise his Government of the impracticability of the undertaking in which he was embarked, and the series of illegal acts which it involved, and in neglecting to observe the general orders of his Government and to stop the recruiting here the moment its illegality was pronounced by the proper legal authorities of the United States, he was recklessly endangering the harmony and peace of two great nations which, by the character of their commercial relations and by other considerations, have the strongest possible inducements to cultivate reciprocal amity."

Having read that passage, I ask the hon. and learned Gentleman whether he can call that a charge of inadvertence and indiscretion? No, Sir, the charge is of a very different nature. I do not understand how Her Majesty's Government could have consented to accept the distinction which the American Government has drawn, considering that Lord Clarendon, in the very last speech which he made in reply to Lord Elgin, declared that if the Government consented to recall Mr. Crampton, they would be taking a part which was shabby and dishonourable. But this is the dilemma to which Her Majesty's Government has been reduced by the course they have taken. And what is their excuse? The plea they have urged is, that they have made most ample apology for any offence against the United States. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford has expressed a doubt this evening whether any apology was made or not. Whether apology has been made or not, it cannot be denied that the Government have urged the fact of apology in vindication. No doubt in all cases between nations, as between individuals, the wrongdoer is right in offering apology; but, while we respect the moral feelings of the man who makes apology, we are inclined to call in question his judgment, which places him in a position in which apology is necessary. I think the representatives of England in this House and the people of this country have a right to complain that Her Majesty's Government have placed this country in such a position that we have been obliged to make humiliating apologies to the United States. Let me now advert for a moment to the particular time when this attempt was made to raise troops in America. It was made at a moment when it was the duty of any Government to have taken the greatest possible care not to add to the difficulties already existing with regard to the United States. The delicate question of Central America had been long hanging over us. It still remains to be settled. If anything made the conduct of the Government more imprudent than it otherwise would have been, it was embarking in this dangerous attempt to raise soldiers within the United States at a time when it was peculiarly important to give no just cause of offence to that country. Sir, on both sides of the Atlantic every party and every honest man must hope that no indiscretion of any Government, in either country, will lead to the terrible calamity of war between England and America. I can imagine nothing which either country could gain by such a calamity. Either might gain temporary glory, but what compensation would that be for the destruction of commerce, the interruption of social progress, the waste of blood and treasure, which must inevitably result from such a contest? Such, I think and hope, will be the feeling of many thousands on both sides of the Atlantic. If, unhappily, the national honour or the national interests should require the institution of such a struggle, then, no doubt, the people of this country and our fellow-subjects in the American provinces would rally loyally round the Throne. But all must earnestly pray that such a day may be far distant. Upon both sides of the Atlantic there would be an outcry against the Government which should embark upon such a melancholy contest without the justification of a righteous cause.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, notwithstanding the doubt which the right hon. Baronet who addressed us last expressed as to whether the hon. Member who made the Motion would think it necessary to press it to a division, and notwithstanding the effort made by the hon. Gentleman who just now presented himself (Mr. John MacGregor) unfortunately for himself a little too late, I do hope the House will think it necessary to pronounce an opinion upon the Motion which has been submitted to them, and which is no less than a vote of censure upon the Government. I trust the House will feel it a duty not longer to delay pronouncing an opinion upon this question, and not allow to remain in suspense the question whether the Government which hitherto has enjoyed the confidence of the House and of the country is henceforward to rest under the censure of this important body. The hon. Member who made the Motion began by saying that he called upon the House to pronounce an opinion in a judicial capacity, and that the debate should be conducted with judicial calmness. But no sooner had the hon. Member made the exhortation than he began, and continued during the remainder of his speech, to indulge in a perfect tissue of personalities and invective—ripping up everything he could find in the treasures of his memory, putting forth all the calumnies which in former times had been uttered against my noble Friend, Lord Clarendon, and, by dwelling upon the name of my noble Friend in every alternate sentence of his speech, the hon. Member endeavoured to create an impression that there was something in these transactions to separate Lord Clarendon from his colleagues, and that the censure of this House, which he invoked, should fall upon that one Member of the Government, and not equally upon all. The tenour of that speech was as unconstitutional as, I trust, the result of the Motion will be unsuccessful. It has been well said by those who followed the hon. Member that there is no individuality in that Member of the Government who is charged by the office he holds with the conduct of these great transactions, but that all his colleagues are equally responsible as himself. I can assure the House that the whole Government are prepared, in the fullest sense of the word, to adopt the entire responsibility for anything which Lord Clarendon has said or written upon this question. The hon. Member for Inverness-shire (Mr. Baillie) began by referring to the origin of these transactions—namely, that Act authorising the Crown to raise foreign troops for the purposes of the war. He told us how, in 1813, there were I don't know how many thousand men in arms, and that ten years after the war began there was a great increase in the force with which we began, while, one year after the late war had commenced we had not completed the number of men which had been voted by Parliament. I shall not go back to the discussion which took place upon that Bill; but the ground upon which we proposed it to Parliament, and upon which my right hon. Friend the Member for Oxford University (Mr. Gladstone) concurred, was that, in a country whose army was raised by voluntary enlistment, and not by conscription, the means of rapidly increasing the number of soldiers did not exist to such an extent as to render a recourse to other means unnecessary. That Bill having become law, it became the duty of Her Majesty's Government to carry it into effect. We heard that there were a number of persons residing in the United States, some of them British subjects, some Germans, who had removed from their own countries from various causes, who were desirous of joining the ranks of the British army and to take part in a war which they considered to be a rightful and a just war. We determined to endeavour to avail ourselves of the aid of those persons, and my right hon. Friend (Mr. Gladstone) and those who sit near him were parties to that determination. I cannot allow my right hon. Friend, who must admit that he was a party to the establishment of a recruiting system in Nova Scotia, to say that that system was not intended solely for the enlistment of British subjects resident in the British provinces, but it was intended distinctly and avowedly to enlist persons coming from the United States; and I cannot allow my right hon. Friend to own himself a party to that arrangement without having been aware of the results that must flow from it. That system was determined upon; but at the same time the Government determined also that nothing should be done that was at variance with the municipal laws of the United States. A distinction has been attempted to be drawn between national law and municipal law, between the internal regulation and the sovereign rights of a nation; but that sophistry has been blown away by the speech of my hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General, who demonstrated in the clearest manner that municipal law could not be construed beyond its enactments, and therefore it is a fallacy to say you can conform to the municipal law forbidding enlistments, and yet be violating international rights. The question is, was the municipal law of the United States violated? I maintain that it was not. Certainly, it was not violated by order of this Government—it was not violated in consequence of any instructions issued by them, or to their knowledge, by any officers acting under their instruction. It is contended that it was violated by their officers acting indiscreetly and with over zeal. Those officers deny that assertion; and according to their interpretation of the law of the United States it is manifest that they did nothing at variance with that law. Who is to interpret that law? It is said that there was a counsel who gave an opinion; but there was also a Judge who gave an opinion; and if Judge Kane knew then what the law of the United States was, then it is clear that nothing was done by our agents that was a violation of the law. It is said that Judge Kane afterwards altered his opinion; but when was that? In September. He gave his first opinion in May. Our operations ceased in July; and therefore, so far as the conduct of the officers of this Government is concerned, that was borne out by the high authority of a Judge of the United States. It is also said that, notwithstanding, proof was given to the Government of the United States that things were done which were a violation of their laws. No doubt things were done in violation of their laws, but it was by persons not authorised to act by any person commissioned by the British Government, and against them prosecutions were instituted which in some cases succeeded, in others failed. It has been said that no prosecutions could be instituted against Mr. Crampton, because he was protected by his diplomatic character. That argument does not apply to the consuls. If they had, as is contended by the United States Government, violated the law, why were they not prosecuted? The right hon. Member for Manchester (Mr. Gibson) referred to the case of Mr. Curtis in Prussia; but Mr. Curtis was actually prosecuted. We thought, and still believe, that the proceedings upon that trial were not fair and just, and the same opinion seems to have existed in Prussia, for, although Mr. Curtis was condemned, the King immediately ordered his release and granted a full pardon. Why did not the American Government act in the same manner towards our consuls? Of the three consuls who have been dismissed none have been brought to trial. Proceedings against Stanley have also been discontinued by the authority of the United States' Government; and, therefore, I am warranted in saying that the accusations against Mr. Crampton and the three consuls rest upon the testimony of those witnesses who are admitted on all hands to be men of the vilest and basest character, and to be utterly unworthy of credit. Then it is said that we practised deception and concealment upon the United States' Government. Why, Sir, Mr. Crampton, in his conversation of the 27th of March, stated fully and fairly to the American Government that which they must already have known without his statement—namely, that the British Government were taking measures in Halifax to receive those persons coming from the United States who might be willing to engage in our military service. But then it is said that Mr. Crampton did not go afterwards to Mr. Marcy and tell him day by day what he was doing. Why did not Mr. Marcy send for Mr. Crampton if he were informed that proceedings were taking place on the part of British authorities which were at variance with the law of the United States? Why, if any Minister of a foreign Power in this country were supposed to be acting at variance with British law, does any man suppose that our Minister for Foreign Affairs would not send for him the very next day after receiving such information, ask him for explanations, sift the matter to the bottom, and allow no misunderstanding to exist? Is that the conduct of the American Government? No. Month after month they allow these things to go on, never send for Mr. Crampton, never tell him what it was supposed he was guilty of doing; they allow these things to accumulate in order that, when the proper time arrives, they may either take advantage of them, and act upon them, or deal with them as matters which do not deserve consideration. Then I say, Sir, there was an abstinence on the part of the United States' Government from those steps which it was their duty to take if they thought that the agents of foreign nations were violating the laws of the Union. But then when Her Majesty's Government, at a very early period, found that these proceedings were likely to produce embarrassment between the two countries, they suspended—or, rather, they definitively stopped of their own accord—these arrangements. An hon. Gentleman has criticised the dates, and has stated that these instructions were not acted upon till August. Surely, however, a question of weeks or days is immaterial in a matter of this sort, the fact being, that the British Government, when it learned that these proceedings were likely to be embarrassing, of its own accord directed that they should be suspended. Then hon. Gentlemen say there was no apology made. Why, what more full apology, what more complete reparation could one Government make to another, when they found that certain proceedings of theirs might furnish grounds of complaint, than putting an end to those proceedings? Don't tell me of verbal apologies! I say the apology of deeds was one infinitely more valuable—infinitely more satisfactory to the Government of America—a greater proof of the desire of the British Government that nothing should occur to interrupt the friendly relations between the two countries than any verbal apology that could have been offered. I say, then, Sir, there is no question about concealment, there is no question about deception, there is no question about our not having made reparation for the offence, if any offence had been committed. But, it is declared, we ought to have acknowledged that we did wrong. Why, we did not believe we had done wrong; we did not believe we had deliberately violated the laws of the Union; we neither intended this, nor do we believe, in our understanding of those laws, that they have been violated by any authorised British agent. We, however, received complaints from the United States' Government, and intimations that our agents ought to be withdrawn. In reply to that we sent detailed statements from them, proving, as we thought and hoped, to the satisfaction of the United States' Government that their impression was erroneous, and that nothing had been done which justified the dissatisfaction they had expressed. In answer to that the United States' Government said they were satisfied with regard to the conduct of Her Majesty's Government, that all questions between the two Governments had ceased and were settled; but that, nevertheless, they still retained their opinion in respect to the British agents, and that they therefore deemed those agents unacceptable organs of communication between the two Governments. What, then, was the course which we had to pursue? We had to determine whether, in such a state of things, we should give measure for measure, retaliate upon Mr. Dallas the measure adopted with regard to Mr. Crampton, and withdraw the exequaturs from the American consuls in England in return for the withdrawal of their exequaturs from the English consuls in the States. Sir, the Government did not deem it their duty to advise Her Majesty to take those steps; and, notwithstanding what has been said in debate, I am still of opinion that that decision has met, and will continue to meet, the approval and concurrence of the country. Sir, it is indeed a curious circumstance to watch the language of hon. Gentlemen who have taken part in this debate. Both sides are vehement in their declaration of the vast importance of maintaining peace between the two countries. All abound in their assurances that that wish is at the bottom of their hearts, and is the most anxious object of their lives. And yet, here happening to be a case in which a question has arisen between two countries which, as far as the Governments are concerned, has been terminated in a manner deemed satisfactory to both, Gentlemen on the other side of the House are loud in their denunciations that the honour and dignity of England have been insulted through the affront offered to her Government. The intercourse of nations takes place between Governments, and an insult to the Government is an insult to the country. These Gentlemen, then, so anxious for peace, tell you that England has been insulted, treated with contumely, contempt, and indignity. What is the effect likely to be produced? Why, to excite in the people of England a spirit of resentment towards their neighbours and kindred in the United States. Anybody who is acquainted with the character of Englishmen must know, to tell them they have been insulted, treated with contempt, exposed to indignity, will naturally exasperate them—the bulk of the nation, without, perhaps, very much investigating the foundation of such assertions, will take them upon trust, especially when they come from such high authority. They will say, “If the leaders of a great party—the country party—hold that language, we must indeed have been grossly insulted, and let us resent the insult so offered to us.” Then I say that, as far as hon. Gentlemen opposite go, they lay the foundation for animosity between the two countries. After that comes my right hon. Friend the Member for the University of Oxford, and he tells the Americans that their Government has been deluded, has been persuaded to accept an apology which they ought not to have accepted; that their laws have been violated designedly, and intentionally, by the Government of a foreign country; and that, so far from meeting that injury in the manner which becomes the Government of a great and independent nation, their Government have accepted an apology and expressed themselves satisfied, when, on the contrary, they ought to have declared themselves affronted and injured. Why, Sir, is that the way to create good feeling between the two countries? Is that the way to persuade the American people to cultivate the most friendly feelings towards this country? Sir, many Gentlemen told the hon. Member for Mayo that his Motion was calculated to injure the public service, and well did they anticipate the result. Well did they foresee, in endeavouring to dissuade him from proceeding with his Motion, the consequences likely to result from it, when on both sides of the House topics have been started, arguments have been employed, which, instead of leading to the closer union of the two nations, instead of effacing mutual animosity are calculated to excite angry passions, to enlist the feelings of the two countries in the differences which have unhappily arisen to embitter their intercourse, and render it more difficult to bring about a more amicable understanding on the points at issue. I will not at this late hour detain the House with many more observations; it is quite unnecessary to do so. The House is now called upon to determine whether there shall be passed upon the Government a vote of censure. The hon. Member for Mayo began his speech by deprecating all quibbling evasion, as he called it—all words which might be distorted into something beyond what they really expressed. Sir, I think he might have criticised his own Motion. I think it would have been much more manly and straightforward on his part if, instead of contenting himself with a sort of evasive declaration that the Government are not entitled to the approbation of the House, he had at once come forward and expressed the feeling which was no doubt uppermost in his mind, that the Government has made itself deserving of the censure of the House. It would have been much more manly and straightforward to have moved a clear and distinct vote of censure, than to disguise disapprobation under the pretence of refusing approbation which has not been asked for. Sir, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxford University says, that he shall give us the benefit of his vote, and I should be sorry indeed if anything I have said should induce him to alter his determination. I know we must not look a gift horse in the mouth; and I shall not examine the reasons of my right hon. Friend's vote. I only hope the reasons he has given will induce those hon. Members who have not yet made up their minds which way they shall vote, to go into the lobby with him. The reason he gives is that it is impossible at the present moment to form an Administration founded on a successful censure of the existing Government; a reason certainly not highly complimentary to the right hon. Gentlemen opposite. But I think many Gentlemen will be of opinion that that difficulty could easily be got over—that it could very well be solved by half an hour's private conversation between the right hon. Gentlemen who sit there (Sir J. Graham and Mr. Gladstone) and the right hon. and hon. Gentlemen opposite. I would not, therefore, accept from the House a vote founded on so great a political misconception. We stand upon what we think better and higher ground. We are of opinion—although it may be presumptuous to state it—that we have during a difficult period conducted the affairs of the country to the satisfaction of the nation, and with honour and advantage to the public interest; we believe that the confidence which this House has hitherto shown us is shared by the country at large. It is upon that ground that we are prepared to go to a division. We ask for a continuation of the confidence of the House, not upon the ground that there may be a difficulty in finding other persons to fill our places, but because we think we have done nothing to forfeit their good opinion. Trusting to these considerations, trusting to the good opinion which the House has hitherto expressed towards us, trusting to the goodwill which we believe is felt for us by the country, and not to the argument of my right hon. Friend that no other Government can be formed, we challenge the hon. Member for Mayo to come to a division, and we feel confident that the result will be such as we think our conduct deserves.

MR. JOHN MACGREGOR rose to address the House amid considerable confusion and cries for a division. Few sentences could be heard consecutively, but the hon. Gentleman was understood to blame the Government for the course they had taken in reference to recruiting in the United States, which he thought was clearly a violation of their municipal law; and to deprecate any disturbance of the amicable relations between the two countries.

MR. BENTINCK moved the adjournment of the debate. [Cries of "dissent."] He thought he was perfectly justified in taking that course, not from a wish to offer any remarks of his own, although he had frequently risen without being able to catch the Speaker's eye, but to give several Gentlemen on that side of the House an opportunity to express their opinions. ["Oh!"] Certainly, after the determination which some hon. Members had shown not to give a patient hearing to the right hon. Baronet near him (Sir J. Parkington) it was hardly to be expected that they would listen to less influential speakers. If the noble Lord at the head of the Government was sincere in desiring that publicity should be given to this question, any opposition to an adjournment upon his part would at least present an odd appearance.

MR. G. H. MOORE: I hope that the House will allow me to take this opportunity—not to reply, because that I have no right to do, and, if I had, there is nothing for me to reply to—but to answer what, to use the words of the noble Lord at the head of the Government, I may call the calumnious imputations cast upon me by himself and by the Attorney General.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I used the word "calumnious" in reference to statements made by others which the hon. Member made use of, and not to anything which fell from himself.

MR. G. H. MOORE: The noble Lord stated that I adduced calumnious stories against Lord Clarendon, and the Attorney General said that I was actuated by personal ill-feeling towards that noble Lord. Now, Sir, to that imputation I can only say that it is entirely unjust and untrue. I do not believe that any one who has been within the scope of the personal influence of that noble Lord could bear any ill-feeling towards him, and I think that no one is so much indebted as that noble Earl to personal good-feeling — not so much, perhaps, on account of successes achieved as on account of blunders escaped from. The noble Lord says that I have raked up old and calumnious stories from the life of Lord Clarendon, and one of his colleagues has termed them obscure. Now, I have yet to learn that I am not justified in citing the public acts of a public man; and as to the incidents to which I have referred being obscure, they were discussed for two nights in this House, and I certainly am surprised to hear the noble Lord apply the word "calumnious" to that which he knows to be true.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I used the word "calumnious" as referring to those calumnies which were disseminated against my noble Friend Lord Clarendon, with regard to the trial to which the hon. Gentleman has referred.

MR. G. H. MOORE: I have stated nothing which is not strictly true.

Motion made and Question, "That the debate be now adjourned" put and negatived.

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

The House divided: Mr. Hayter, one of the Tellers for the Ayes, acquainted Mr. Speaker, that three Members had not voted; whereupon Mr. Speaker having desired the Members to come to the Table, Sir Benjamin Hall, Mr. Jackson, and Mr. Traill, came to the Table accordingly, and stated that they were in the House when the Question was put, and having declared themselves with the Ayes, Mr. Speaker desired their names to be added to the Ayes:—Whereupon the Tellers announced the numbers: Ayes 274; Noes 80: Majority 194.

 Debate arising.
 Debate adjourned till To-morrow.
 The House adjourned at a quarter after

HOUSE OF COMMONS,

Wednesday, July 2, 1856.

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1° Commons Inclosure (No. 2).
 2° Judgments, Execution, &c.

JUDGMENTS EXECUTION, &c., BILL — ADJOURNED DEBATE (SECOND NIGHT.)

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [22nd May], "That the Bill be now read a second time."

Question again proposed.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read 2°.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That the Bill be committed."

COLONEL DUNNE said, he would recommend the withdrawal of the Bill at the present advanced period of the Session.

MR. NAPIER said, he must complain that the Bill would not work, especially in mercantile cases, where it would disturb all cases in bankruptcy and insolvency, and lead to collusive proceedings between tradesmen in England and Ireland. There would be no longer any safeguard against preferential payment by creditors. He should be better satisfied if the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland would give his assurance that the measure would work, on which he entertained great doubt.

MR. J. D. FITZGERALD said, he could not concur in the right hon. and learned Gentleman's opinion of the Bill, for he had well considered the objections urged against the measure both in the Select Committee and in that House, and his opinion was, that its principle was sound. The principle was, that if judgment was recovered in one country, it might be executed in the other. At present a judgment being given in Ireland, execution could not be enforced in England, and vice versa. That was remedied by the present Bill. There were undoubtedly some safeguards which would be necessary to prevent the abuse of the Bill, but those could be introduced in Committee.

MR. I. BUTT said, he should be glad to see the principle adopted if it could be done safely. When the Bill first came down from the Select Committee it was looked upon with great suspicion by the Government. The Bill placed the judgment in the hands of one Court, and the execution of it in another, a practice which would inevitably lead to great confusion. How was the question to be properly tried? It would be a much wiser plan if the judgment issued by any one Court could be executed by that Court in any part of the United Kingdom. If any measure was passed, it should be a much more extensive one than the present. The process of the Bill was not a sufficient improvement on the present system to be set against the inconvenience it would occasion, and the frauds which it would give rise to. If those powers were given to the Court, the power of changing the venue should be given at the same time. He should therefore move that the Bill be committed that day three months.

Amendment proposed, at the end of the Question, to add the words "for this day three months."

Colonel Dunne

Question proposed, "That those words be there added."

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he had been a Member of the Select Committee on the Bill, and was aware of the apprehension with which it was viewed. But he had never felt any of the fears which had been expressed even by his right hon. and learned friend the Attorney General for Ireland. He thought hon. Members were too timid in respect of new Bills. All laws would be evaded and abused. The principle of the Bill was so good, that abstractedly it would be well if the decision of Courts in all countries could be executed everywhere. That, however, was impossible; but in the three kingdoms, where the Courts were governed by the same principles, it was absurd to have three distinct rules applicable in each of them. As far as regarded Scotland, he was perfectly satisfied with the Bill, and had no fears that its provisions would be abused in that country. The opponents of the measure seemed to be apprehensive against frauds, which could, he was certain, be prevented by the most ordinary care on the part of the Court. He trusted that they would allow the Bill to go to Committee, that such safeguards as might be necessary, if any were necessary, might be adopted.

MR. NAPIER said, that to make the Bill safe they must adopt stringent regulations, which, he apprehended, would create great difficulty. He could not see the way to carry the measure out so as to remedy existing inconveniences. All approved of the principle; but there was no lawyer there who would undertake to work it so as to avoid the perplexities which it involved. If the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland would undertake to reconsider the Bill, he should be satisfied; otherwise he must vote for the Motion of his hon. and learned Friend.

MR. BAINES said, he believed that the principle was not only a valuable one, but might be carried safely into effect. The law officers, both in England and Ireland, approved of the Bill; the Law Society of Ireland, which had once opposed it, now consented to it. Under these circumstances, therefore, he trusted they would let the Bill go to Committee, believing that the difficulties would vanish as they were practically approached.

MR. G. BUTT said, that after giving much consideration to the Bill his opinion was decidedly in favour of its principle.

That principle was, that there should be a reciprocal power of enforcing in one part of the United Kingdom the judgments obtained in any other part, taking care that the proceedings adopted for that purpose should not give facilities for undue preferences or for the commission of fraud; for, undoubtedly, facility of enforcing judgment was a very great boon. What the House, however, had to do was to take care that the machinery was well guarded; and it seemed to him that the machinery of this amended Bill would substantially accomplish the object and principle which they were all desirous of carrying out. Under those circumstances he hoped the Bill would be committed, and rendered as safe and useful a measure as possible.

MR. VANCE said, he had communicated with several of the mercantile classes in Ireland, and that they were unanimously opposed both to the principle and the details of the measure. They represented that Ireland, as the poorer country, was unfortunately the larger debtor, and that the practical effect of the Bill would be this—that the English creditor, instead of taking proceedings against traders in Ireland in the courts of law of that country, would take those proceedings in England, where the debtor had not the ordinary means of defence at his command, and thus inflict great hardship and injustice upon him. In his (Mr. Vance's) opinion, the law, as it at present stood, gave sufficient remedies to the creditor against the debtor.

MR. HADFIELD said, he could not understand the difficulties urged against the Bill. It was high time that the distinction in legal process between the three countries should be abolished. He sincerely wished that hon. Members would take more pains to get over difficulties and less to find them out. He highly approved of the Bill, considering it a most useful one.

MR. CRAUFURD said, he had sought assistance from all quarters for the last two years, in order to put the Bill in a perfect state. He had already made several alterations in the measure which he thought would protect it against abuse; and he had given notice of a further Amendment for that purpose. If there was any difficulty in Ireland it rested with the Irish merchants to take such precautions as would obviate it.

MR. DEASY said, he thought that as much delay would arise under the present measure as under the old practice.

MR. I. BUTT said, he would not press his Amendment, notwithstanding he believed that the measure could not be made safe, but being willing that they should try their hands at it.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

BLEACHING, &c. WORKS (No. 2) BILL— ADJOURNED DEBATE.

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to be made to Question [5th June], "That the Bill be now read a second time;" and which Amendment was to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day six months."

Question again proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

Debate resumed.

MR. BAXTER said, he should be the last person to stand in the way of any enactment which might be considered requisite for the protection of the working classes against sordid capitalists, or for the improvement of their social state. Rightly or wrongly, Parliament appeared to have abandoned the principle of non-interference between masters and their servants, and he was ready to admit that there might be practices in some parts of the country connected with the bleaching and dyeing trade which required the interference of the Legislature, but further he could not go. He deprecated proceeding with a Bill of this importance at such a late period of the Session, as it would inevitably have to go before a Select Committee, and Parliament would probably adjourn in three or four weeks. He did not like the mode in which the evidence was got up in the case. The hon. and learned Member for Youghal (Mr. I. Butt) had said on a former occasion that the masters in Scotland were almost unanimous in favour of the Bill; but the masters on the east coast had generally petitioned against it, and he (Mr. Baxter) had read a letter from a gentleman who was otherwise favourable to factory legislation, deprecating its passing. Moreover, a large section of the operatives in Scotland had petitioned against it. The Bill proposed to deal with all works for bleaching and dyeing in a similar manner; whereas, the circumstances and practice were as different as possible in various parts of the country—at least in Scotland. On the east coast of Scotland the occupation was the most healthy in which the operative could be engaged. The number of hours in which the operatives worked were not more than the Bill proposed. Linen bleaching depended greatly on the state of the weather, part of the processes being carried on in the open air. A long frost or a long drought, or heavy rains, rendered the water turbid, and stopped the operations; therefore, if work was to be stopped at a particular hour, great loss would accrue to all parties. Mr. Tremenhære, partial as his testimony was, bore witness to that fact. The conclusion from these considerations was that, unless the hon. and learned Member (Mr. I. Butt) was to undertake the control of the elements and the action of chemical bodies, he would withdraw the Bill, a Bill which, if it was carried, would inflict very great injury on an important branch of trade. The workpeople would not thank the hon. and learned Member for several provisions in his Bill, especially that which changed the hour of commencing work in the morning from seven o'clock, at which it now stood, to six o'clock. A careful perusal of the Bill caused him (Mr. Baxter) to conclude that its effect would be to substitute male for female labour, and to drive into towns the great bulk of the cottier population. Under those circumstances, and looking at the impossibility of giving the Bill that careful consideration the subject demanded, he hoped it would not be persisted in on this occasion.

COLONEL DUNNE said, that the hon. Member who had just sat down had made the most unwarrantable assertions with respect to the Report of Mr. Tremenhære. What right had he to assume that Mr. Tremenhære had been careless, or actuated by partial motives in drawing up that Report? The real question was, whether they should do anything for the operative classes in the country? No one could depend on the masters to supply the place of legislation. The Legislature had already interfered in the same way with regard to cotton, why should they be precluded from interfering in the case of linen? If the masters objected to the Bill, why did they not propose some measure themselves? If the Bill was drawn up by those not conversant with the trade, why did not they, if they were sincere in their wishes to protect the operatives, make a proposition for that purpose?

MR. DUNCAN said, that if the people in the bleaching works were in a bad position, he should be one of the first to assist them in obtaining a change. These operations were chiefly carried on out of doors, and when in-door operations were necessary, they were always carried on in a well ventilated atmosphere. In the county he represented the people worked in summer from six to six, and as the season advanced, from seven to seven, with time for meals, and in no case did they work more than sixty hours a week. They were well housed, well clothed, and there was, in his opinion, no occasion for legislation on the matter. He should oppose the Bill in every way, as being uncalled for.

MR. MURROUGH said, he hoped the House would allow the Bill to go into Committee. The hon. Gentleman who had spoken in opposition to the Bill had carefully abstained from informing the House as to what was going on in the interior of the bleaching works. He would remind the hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter) that in his works he was bleaching, not linen, but the blood of boys and girls.

SIR JAMES GRAHAM, Sir, having, some time ago, bestowed considerable attention on this subject, perhaps the House will allow me to offer a few remarks upon the Bill now under consideration. I do not see much use, I must confess, in persisting in it at this late period of the Session, for, after what has already passed, and the attention which has been given to the question, it would be very unfortunate if the House were to come to a hasty decision upon it. The question was very fully considered in 1845, when it was introduced with all the advantage and zeal of Lord Shaftesbury, then Lord Ashley, and it was at that time my duty officially to give to it the most anxious consideration. I thought that there was a difference to be drawn between factories and bleaching works. I argued the matter at great length with Lord Shaftesbury, and he yielded to the reasons which I brought forward, and the Legislature did draw a distinction between bleaching works and factories. The Bill we are now discussing does not altogether correspond with the Report of Mr. Tremenhære, but, even if it did, there is on the face of that Report an error so grievous and so palpable that I question whether it should recommend itself to us on that account. In matters of this sort it must be admitted, I think, that the minimum of interference is the maximum of wisdom. Bills of this kind are drawn in two ways—either in ignorance of the particular trade affected, when injuries not contemplated are very often inflicted on the trade, or else craftily by persons interested in the trade, who have some peculiar way of doing business which they seek to favour by the aid of the Legislature, in order to obtain advantages over their competitors. I therefore view all measures of this kind with extreme jealousy. I fully admit the duty which lies upon us of protecting the health, the happiness, the comfort, and the wellbeing of the labouring classes; but if you make a mistake in this kind of legislation—if you should cramp and fetter that branch of trade to which you are directing your attention, you will in the long run inflict evils of the greatest magnitude upon those whom you wish to serve. It is admitted that the bleaching trade is exposed to the most severe competition with foreign rivals, and that it requires all the skill and energy of the British manufacturer successfully to contend against that competition. Just as in a race where two horses of exactly equal powers are to run—if you put 3lb. extra on one of them his defeat is certain, so it is with regard to this trade. Mr. Tremenhoe admits the keenness of this competition, but, while he states most distinctly that if you follow his advice the additional cost of production will be 10 per cent, and the addition to the selling price 1 per cent, he maintains that this is a very trifling matter indeed, and would have no effect. Now, Sir, that is so astounding a proposition in a matter of trade that I, for one, cannot consent blindly to follow Mr. Tremenhoe as guide. If the effect should be as he states—to add 10 per cent to the cost of production—I predict at once that by such hasty, wild, and extravagant legislation you would insure the success of our foreign rivals in this branch of trade. Then we are asked on the 2nd of July, to read this Bill a second time, though the House of Lords will not receive a Bill which has to be read a first time after the 22nd of July; I, therefore, consider that it would be the height of rashness for this House to legislate on this subject, relying only on the Report of Mr. Tremenhoe; and it would neglect its duty if it failed to institute an inquiry of its own. We ought to have a Select Committee upon the subject, and, as it would be a delusion to appoint one this Session, I think it better that the second reading of this Bill should be postponed, on the understanding that a Select Committee shall be appointed at the commencement of next Session to inquire into the whole subject. The peculiarities of this trade are so great that I believe it differs from the cotton, wool, flax, and indeed all other manufactures. The work, when once begun, must be continued; it is not like manufacturing by machinery where you can stop on Monday night and go to work again on Wednesday morning; when once you have begun you must finish your work, unless you wish to lose all the benefits of your labour. The demand, too, is not continuous, it occurs only about three times in the year. It would be a waste of time, however, to pursue this argument any further on the present occasion; I hope, however, that the House will not proceed with the Bill in the present Session, for I am sure that its promoters, sincerely desirous as they are to benefit the working classes, will not be advancing their own object if they persist with it at present.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he should support the Motion for the second reading of the Bill. He held this opinion, that if we looked forward to a good understanding between all classes of this country, they must affirm this principle, that no class of persons should be permitted to sacrifice the health of families and young children in the race of competition. He held strongly that it was the duty of the State to extend the trade and manufactures of this country by all legitimate means; but he maintained at the same time that it was the duty of the State to interfere to save the lives and health of those who could not protect themselves. He did not admit the argument that because it could be pointed out that certain restrictions on the labour of young children might impede the success of trade, the Legislature had a right to deny to families the protection of the State. They might depend upon it, that nothing the Legislature had done had so promoted a good feeling in this country amongst the working classes, as in extending protection to those who could not help themselves. Upon every opportunity that presented itself he was determined to support an inquiry into the applicability of these principles; but, at the same time, he would appeal to the hon. and learned Member who had charge of the present Bill, whether it might not prove the sacrifice of a good measure if he proceeded with it at an improper time. He did not see how it was possible to give it the attention it deserved, or to protect themselves from the charge of hasty legislation. He therefore hoped the measure might be postponed until the next Session.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he had hoped the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. I. Butt) would have stated the course he intended to pursue. Representations were made to him (Sir G. Grey) at the close of last Session, and at the beginning of the present, by persons interested in the trade, that the inquiry conducted by Mr. Tremenhoe was not satisfactory, and urging that another inquiry would be necessary. The hon. and learned Gentleman who had charge of the Bill then proposed a Select Committee, but the lateness of the Session interfered with its appointment. He thought that to go on with the discussion now would be a waste of time, and he trusted the hon. and learned Gentleman would take advantage of the advice which had been tendered to him, and withdraw his Bill for the present. He thought it would be more advantageous to take the advice of the right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir J. Graham) and ask for a Committee next Session. That was certainly the course he ought to take, if he wished his measure to succeed.

MR. I. BUTT said, he should have attached considerable importance to the appeal which had just been made to him by the right hon. Baronet the Home Secretary, if he did not recollect that about the same time last Session a similar appeal was made to him from the same quarter, and in reference to the very same Bill. [Sir G. GREY: Yes, but you did not follow my advice.] The Bill was founded upon the fullest inquiry, and had been most carefully prepared, but from time to time its progress had been obstructed by one party or another. It was then proposed to him that the Bill should be referred to a Select Committee, and thinking that would get rid of the opposition, he assented to the proposition; but the opposition had still been kept up, and it certainly was not he who was responsible for the Bill coming on at that late period of the Session. Now, how stood the case? Why, in 1854, a Bill, nearly identical with the one under consideration, passed the House of Lords and came down to that House, when the Government proposed that it should be withdrawn and the subject inquired into during the autumn by a Royal Commission. That course was taken, the Bill was withdrawn, a Royal Commission was appointed, and last year he brought in a Bill founded upon the Report of that Commission, which Bill was only rejected by a very small majority. Early in the present Session he re-introduced the Bill with some Amendments, and now, at nearly the close of the Session, having been put off day after day, he was for the second time requested to give way in favour of inquiry. The accuracy of the Report made by the Royal Commissioner was impugned by the Government who appointed him; and now it was said the proper tribunal for inquiry was a Select Committee of that House. It should, however, be remembered that in the meanwhile the sufferings of the poor people whom the Bill was intended to relieve were going on; but still he was entirely in the hands of the House, and it was for the House to decide whether he should go on with the Bill forthwith, or withdraw it with a view to the appointment of a Select Committee. He entirely dissented from the opinion taken by the right hon. Baronet (Sir J. Graham), that the House ought to pause before it consented to the measure, as they might be doing mischief, instead of good; previous legislation in the factory direction having, it was believed, produced more mischief than benefit. He had the highest respect for the opinions of the right hon. Baronet, but he could not help recollecting that the right hon. Baronet had been at times completely wrong in some of his strongest predictions as to results of particular Acts of Parliament; and he believed that the right hon. Baronet in the present instance would be found to be in error. He did not believe that the manufacturing superiority of this country depended upon the excessive hours of labour extorted from women and young children, in an atmosphere heated to 130 degrees; and he entirely differed from those calculations which asserted a large increased cost on the manufactured article if some such measure as the Bill before the House was passed. If the House did not consent to read the Bill a second time it would be received as an intimation by the working classes that the suggestion of the right hon. Baronet (Sir J. Graham) was to be acted upon, and that no further legislation was to take place on this or similar questions. However, if he withdrew the Bill, he could promise those poor people that no exertion should be wanted on his part to pass it next Session; and even if he did not succeed then, he would still undertake that, so long as he had a seat in that House, so long would he continue his efforts to obtain justice for them at the hands of the Legislature.

SIR JAMES GRAHAM said, he must beg to explain that he had not said that Mr. Tremenheere was an unsafe guide, because he had said that the course recommended would add 10 per cent to the cost of production and 1 per cent to the price, but because he had said that this addition was a matter of no consequence.

MR. DRUMMOND said, he thought the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. I. Butt) had had sufficient experience as to following the advice of pretended friends. He never would find anything in that House, unless he forced his Bill, except a predominant desire that capital should succeed at the expense of human life. He would remind the hon. and learned Gentleman of this, that when the Bill was before the House on a previous occasion, it was evident to him that there was a desire on the part of many Members of that House to revert to the slave trade, in order to add to capital. The right hon. Baronet (Sir J. Graham) had said that the maximum of wisdom was the minimum of interference. No doubt such was the case as far as money-getting went, but as far as human life went, it was exactly the reverse. By the manufacturing system, as at present carried on, the sense of parental affection was almost annihilated, and all this for the purpose of getting money. Children were expended as cattle were expended upon a farm. Why, on a recent occasion, did we eat so much American dirt? Simply because a fourth of our exports went to America. In order to keep up that trade we submitted to be kicked; and, to keep up the advantages of the bleaching trade, we sacrificed poor children's lives. He would strongly advise the hon. and learned Gentleman to persevere with his Bill. Committees and Commissions would beat him if he relied on them, and he would, therefore, say to him, "go to a division." He believed that the majority of the Members of that House knew nothing of the evils that resulted from the bleaching trade.

LORD ROBERT GROSVENOR said, he understood that a prima facie case for inquiry had been made out, and that then Government took steps for the appointment of a Commission. The Report from that Commission was made last year. That circumstance, however, did not weaken the prima facie case for inquiry. Indeed, it made it so strong, that there was not a Member of that House who would say that they ought not to legislate upon it. The Government told the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Youghal that next Session he must move for a Committee. If he did so they would then tell him he must bring in a Bill in order to show what he wanted to do. Now, all that was a wrong mode of proceeding, for it was imposing delays which ought not to be allowed in such a case. If Government were not satisfied with the Report of the Commission, why not appoint another?

MR. CARDWELL said, that in the amusing hands of the hon. Member for West Surrey everything appeared to become new, and when, therefore, he gave utterance to a fallacy long since exploded, it appeared a new thing that had never been ventured on before. On the present occasion he appeared before the House as a friend of labour, and talked of the antagonism between capital and labour. Now, he thought that the hon. Gentleman should have learned one thing, namely, as to the persons who received the most from the increase of capital. The hon. Gentleman had not hesitated to compare the abominations of the slave trade with that great manufacturing industry which had conferred more upon this country than anything during the last century. Then he said that the House of Commons was influenced by the master manufacturers, and not having the labouring classes represented, took no steps to protect those who lived by labour. Had they passed no Factory Bills during the last ten years? At whose suggestion were they passed? Were they carried in deference to the wishes of the master manufacturers or in opposition to them? No doubt in opposition to them, and Parliament did not, therefore, listen to the master manufacturers on that occasion. Such men as the hon. Member for West Surrey (Mr. Drummond) were, in his opinion, the real enemies of the working classes, because they sowed the seeds of dissension between masters and men, where happily there might have been peace and combination. The question now before the House stood thus. It was agreed that they were to have a full and searching inquiry into the question, and he would ask whether it was according to common sense that they should read the Bill a second time now, when it was admitted that there was no intention of proceeding with it during the course of the present Session. If they read the Bill a second time, and then, after inquiry, did not put the Bill on the Statute-book, they would be deluding and deceiving the working classes. He was certain that they would secure the good feeling of the working classes by instituting a rigid inquiry.

MR. COBBETT said, he had taken much interest in the question under consideration, and had personally made himself acquainted with the feelings and the actual condition of the people employed in bleaching works. After the conclusion of the Session of 1853, he visited the districts of England and Scotland in which principally the bleaching works were situated; and in those works he found that persons were working sixteen, eighteen, and twenty hours a day, in a temperature varying from ninety to 130 degrees. He considered that no one could give attention to a more important question, than one affecting the welfare of the productive classes. The right hon. Baronet (Sir J. Graham) had laid it down to the House that the subject had been long since disposed of when he was Secretary of State for the Home Department. If the subject was disposed of, as the right hon. Baronet asserted, it would be better to resist inquiry altogether than to say, as the right hon. Baronet had said, that he was willing to consent to inquiry next Session. There was an almost unanimous desire in that House that an inquiry should take place at the earliest period next Session; and there was this urgent claim for inquiry, that he personally knew, as he had previously stated, of the sufferings of the bleachers. He was present at some bleaching works, at which he was informed that, owing to the heat in what were called the "roasting shops," three young women had been that morning carried out in a fainting state. A master bleacher had told him that the temperature was frequently so high, that the nails in the floors became heated and blistered, that was, burnt, the feet of those who were employed in those rooms, and who were therefore obliged to wear slippers. It had been said by several hon. Members for Scotch constituencies, that the facts were not so bad as they had been represented to be. All those hon. Members, however, came from one part of Scotland, and it was possible that in their district the evils complained of did not exist. In Glasgow, Paisley, and other places in the same neighbourhood he had himself witnessed the state of things which he had described. At a meeting held at the last-named town, Mr. Baillie Browne, he believed the chief baillie, had said, that for many years the operative bleachers had been regarded as little more than mere machines, and had expressed his desire that there should be passed a general Ten Hours Bill for the whole country. To confirm these general expressions he (Mr. Cobbett) would read to the House a statement of the hours worked by two young persons during two weeks of the year. During the week from September 26 to October 1, they worked 102½ hours, namely, on the several days, 16, 17, 18, 23, 13½, and 15 hours each. During the next week they worked, on the several days, 19, 17, 21½, 16, 17, and 14½ hours, making for the whole week 105 hours. The temperature of the atmosphere in which they worked was 130°. In the year 1843 there was a Commission appointed to inquire into the employment of young persons, called "the Children's Employment Commission," the Report of which the right hon. Baronet (Sir J. Graham) seemed to think had decided against legislative interference in the matter. So far was this from being the case, however, that there was a statement in one of the appendices, that many of the master bleachers would gratefully welcome some legislative restriction as to the hours of work, which would put all upon the same footing, and would enable them to resist the pressure of their customers without giving offence. The fact was, that merchants and manufacturers frequently sent goods to a bleacher to-day, or even in the middle of the night, with an order that they must be finished and returned by twelve o'clock to-morrow. The right hon. Baronet had said, that the process of bleaching, when once commenced, must be continuous, as any interruption of it would spoil the goods. He (Mr. Cobbett) had inquired into this matter, and had been informed that the process might, without damage to the goods, be interrupted at the conclusion of any stage. Very many of the master bleachers were, as he had mentioned, themselves in favour of legislation upon this subject. These masters had written to the Secretary of the Bleachers' Committee at Bolton, distinctly stating that they were in favour of a restriction of the hours of labour in their works, and expressing their opinion that such a restriction would never be carried out without the interference of the Legislature. The question now was, should the hon. and learned Member for Youghal (Mr. I. Butt) take a division now, or would it be more prudent to withdraw the Bill for the present Session. He (Mr. Cobbett) was himself very much in favour of dividing, in order that the House might decide whether bleachers were to be protected by enactments or not. He believed that a large portion of the House was strongly disposed to legislate upon the subject, and such an assurance would be a great comfort to these poor people, who were so anxiously looking for the decision of the House on the question. The withdrawal of the Bill, and the appointment of a Committee next Session, will probably put off legislation until after that Session also, and he should therefore recommend the hon. and learned Gentleman to divide. If, however, he came to a different decision, he (Mr. Cobbett) would suggest that the Committee might be appointed and nominated at once, not that it might proceed to business, but that it might be revived next Session. By the adoption of that course much time would be saved.

MR. BAINES said, he had no hesitation whatever in giving such a pledge. He was sure the Government would throw no obstacle in the way of an early appointment of the Committee, and he did not apprehend, from what had passed in the course of the discussion, that there would be any opposition to it on the part of either the right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir J. Graham) or the hon. Member for Montrose (Mr. Baxter). Under those circumstances, he decidedly thought the best course would be to allow the Bill to drop for the present Session, to withdraw all imputations which had been made either on one side or the other, and then at the very beginning of next Session to go into an inquiry of the whole subject with clean hands. At all events, if the Bill were pressed to a second reading now, it would be the duty of the Government to vote against it.

MR. KIRK said, he wished to correct an error which the hon. and learned Member for Youghal (Mr. I. Butt) had fallen into. He said the Bill was identical with that which came down from the House of Lords in 1854. Now how could that be so, when the Bill of 1854 made no reference whatever to Ireland. The fact, however, was, that the factory proprietors of Ireland were not at all opposed to reasonable legislation, nor were they in the least averse to inquiry; indeed, he had presented repeated petitions from some of them, praying that the Bill should be referred to a Select Committee. In its present shape the measure was highly objectionable; its provisions would retard trade, interrupt the progress of manufactures, and lead to considerable mischief. Now there was no necessity for those restrictive clauses, and he hoped the Bill would be withdrawn with a view to its being considered and amended in a Select Committee.

MR. MUNTZ said, he should support the Bill, because he found that the number of hours specified in it comprised as long a period as any young persons should be obliged to work. No greater mistake, even with a view to their own interests, could be committed by masters than to overwork their people. What was gained in one way by such a system was more than lost in another by the defective manner in which the work was done. There was no getting more out of a human being than his constitution could fairly yield—that was the fact of it. Manufacturers had a right to employ their operatives for as long a period as was consistent with good health and good work, but not for a moment longer. It was manifest that some legislation on the question was imperatively required, and, as no case for further delay had been made out, the House would do well to give its immediate sanction to the present measure.

LORD NAAS said, that no case of hardship had been proved against the master bleachers in the North of Ireland. The operatives in the North of Ireland were not in favour of legislation of this kind; on the contrary, they had petitioned against the Bill of last year. Though the hon. Member for Oldham (Mr. Cobbett) had cited some strong instances of hardship in the bleaching works of other parts of the kingdom, it would be unjust to the masters in the North of Ireland to say that such a state of things existed there as to call for legislation.

MR. WALTER said, that, although he would gladly have been spared the necessity of going to a division on the present occasion—as he thought it not impossible that some good might result from agreeing to refer the question to a Committee—yet if the hon. and learned Member for Youghal should press the Bill to a division, he (Mr. Walter) should certainly go into the same lobby with him. Not having had the good fortune to be present during the early part of the debate, he would not presume to trouble the House with any speech on the subject; but he felt it necessary to make one observation upon a remark which appeared to him to be the foundation of all objections to such measures as that now under consideration. It was often said, with regard to Bills of this description, that they interfered with the manufactures of the country, but there was one species of manufactures which a certain class of economists were too apt to overlook. He alluded to the 1,000,000 children who were every year added to our population. That was by far the most interesting and important of our manufactures; and when we remembered that upon its character and upon the care taken of it in its infancy depended the future strength and greatness of the nation, we could not doubt that the Legislature would be grossly neglectful of its duty if it did not take care that the youth of the country were so brought up that the developement of their powers of mind and body should not be impeded by that excessive strain upon their system which was the inevitable result of overwork.

MR. WILKINSON said, he objected to legislation on the subject altogether, since the only effect of such legislation would be, not to shorten the hours of labour, but to drive the manufacture from our shores. As to the particular manufacture to which the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Walter) had referred, till people learned not to overstock the market with the product of their labour, the House could never hope to improve the condition of the working classes.

ADMIRAL JONES said, he knew, of his own knowledge, that the workpeople in Ireland deprecated all legislation on the subject. Hand-loom weaving in the north of Ireland was carried on to a great extent in the houses of the people themselves, and he should be afraid to state in that House the number of hours those people worked in their own habitations.

MR. NAPIER said, he had anxiously considered the subject, but every day's experience had made him more jealous of legislative interference in the matter. Evils might exist, but the remedy for those evils was not that proposed by the Bill. He could bear testimony to the prosperity of manufacturers in the north of Ireland, and he thought that interference, such as that proposed, would be rash in the extreme. He should vote against the second reading of the Bill, but he hoped his hon. and learned Friend would postpone the measure.

MR. FIELDEN said, he should vote for the second reading, and hoped that the hon. and learned Member for Youghal would not withdraw the Bill.

MR. W. BROWN said, he was apprehensive that if the second reading were agreed to, expectations would thereby be excited among the working population which the evidence to be taken before any inquiry would not support, but, on the contrary, dispel.

SCIENTIFIC AND LITERARY SOCIETIES BILL.

House in Committee.

MR. BOUVERIE said, that a Bill was passed some years ago to exempt from local taxation the premises occupied by societies established for the cultivation of "science, literature, and the fine arts, exclusively." The societies claiming the benefit of that measure had to be certified by Mr. Tidd Pratt, and it so happened that the courts of law had in many instances decided that the certificate of that Gentleman had been given upon insufficient grounds. Under those circumstances, the present Bill had been brought in to declare the finding of the certifying barrister final and without appeal, and also to get rid of the word "exclusively" from the existing Act, which had a restrictive operation. The measure would, therefore, indefinitely extend an exemption which, if not wholly vicious in principle, had already reached its legitimate limit. It would enable the Athenæum Club, or any other institution professing in any degree to promote science, literature, and the fine arts, to escape from the payment of poor rates and other local taxes. Moreover, such an immunity was hardly consistent with the recognised doctrines of political economy, as the advantage it conferred would be swept away by the landlord of the premises in the shape of increased rent. Under the proposed Bill no one could say how far the exemption might extend. Entertaining those objections to the Bill, he should move that the Chairman report progress.

MR. HUTT said, the object of the Bill was to carry out the 6 & 7 Vict., c. 36, which was not properly understood. The word "exclusively" was contained in that Act, and many difficulties had arisen in consequence. He believed that if the law were strictly carried out no institution would be able to avail itself of the advantages of the law. He did not think it was right to act upon this rigid system. The present Bill, which he had introduced at the request of the Society of Arts, and of a vast number of Mechanics' Institutes, merely proposed to carry into effect the original intention of the Act referred to. According to the decision of a court of law the British and Foreign School Society was not an institution within the meaning of the Act, and the Royal Society, which took in newspapers and periodicals for the perusal of the members, was not entitled to derive any benefit from the Act. He did not propose to introduce any new principle or to extend an old one, but merely to restore to the Statute-book an Act which had been practically effaced by the decisions of a court of law. He believed that even those persons who were most opposed to any national system of education would not wish to see the Mechanics' Institutes obstructed in the beneficial progress they had made in this country. Let them just cast their eyes over the country and see what spontaneous efforts had been made by those men for their own advancement and instruction. He felt assured that the House would have a deep sympathy with them; and, he was happy to say, many eminent statesmen had given their valuable personal efforts to promote the prosperity of such institutions. He believed they deserved the patronage and the consideration of the Government; for although they might not be in every respect the very best instruments that might be devised for education, they suited the tastes and prejudices of the people, and had doubtless been productive of very great benefits. Many of them were kept in existence on very slender and precarious funds, and the slightest failure in their receipts would close many of them. He was sure any support Government might give would be beneficially bestowed, and that it would be thankfully received by a very valuable class of the community.

MR. HADFIELD said, he thought it was a pitiable thing that any opposition should be offered to the Bill. Churches and chapels, which were frequently places for the rich, were exempted from these rates, and yet institutions established simply for the poor were not to be allowed the same privilege. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Bouverie) said that the landlords would be the only persons who would benefit by the remission of the rates, but that was not the case, for landlords would be glad to have such tenants at the ordinary rentals. Besides, the founders of Mechanics' Institutes were anxious to have premises of their own, and the exemption from rates was a great incentive to exertion in that respect.

LORD LOVAINE said, that if the Bill confined itself to carrying out the first Act, he should not object to it. The Bill, however, exempted any building devoted in any sort of way to the interests of science, which was so large a provision that it could hardly be allowed without danger. There was no building which might not in some way or other be made subservient to the interests of science.

MR. E. C. EGERTON said, he cordially supported the measure, for he was of opinion that those who objected that the landlord would derive all the benefit of the exemption overlooked the fact that those societies generally aspired to purchase the land and premises which they occupied, and to make them their own freeholds.

MR. G. BUTT said, the Bill would entirely exempt from rates any building though it were only occupied one day in the week for literary purposes, and during the remainder of the week for purposes of business. The landlord, notwithstanding what had been asserted by hon. Members, would in reality get the benefit of the exemption; and he did not think that that was the object of the Bill. The decisions which had been given by the Courts of Law were entirely in accordance with the Act as it stood. It was now proposed to make the certificate of the barrister final; but to that he strongly objected.

MR. BOUVERIE said the question had been argued as though the Bill referred solely to Mechanics' Institutes; now that was not the case, for the Bill would let in all kinds of buildings. At Greenwich it had been decided by the barrister that a building which was let on hire for lectures, and even theatrical purposes, was within the Act; but on appeal to the Court of Queen's Bench, that decision had been reversed. At Manchester, a place used for musical performances had also been certified by the barrister as coming within the Act. He was surprised to find the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Hadfield) supporting a Bill which would have the effect of taxing all the rest of a parish for the benefit of those institutions.

MR. W. EWART said, the old Bill had extended beyond Mechanics' Institutes, including places used for literary and educational purposes. The only objection to the present law was because it contained the word "exclusively." He had presented a petition from ninety-two literary institutions in Yorkshire and Lancashire; from which it appeared that some of those institutions were held to come within the Act, while others were excluded. The Bristol Athenæum paid as much as £100 a year in local rates. Now that he considered a very great hardship, seeing that other similar institutions were exempt. Either the law ought to be repealed or equalised in its operation.

MR. HENLEY said, he would remind the Committee that a charter had been asked for on behalf of Her Majesty's Theatre on the ground that it encouraged music and dancing—and the effect of the present Bill would be to let in kindred places of all descriptions. By passing such a measure they would run the risk of being compelled to make no exemption whatever from local taxation, and thus defeat the very object for which the Bill was brought in. He should be glad to see a measure for exempting schools from rates, but its provisions ought to be well defined. There was no uncertainty about the present law; the difficulty of applying it arose from the difference in the institutions.

MR. STRUTT said, he thought it a great mistake to suppose that the benefit given by the Bill would go into the pocket of the landlords. The exemption attached to the institution, and it was not at all likely that landlords would charge a higher rent because the institution was exempt from rates. All were agreed that it was desirable to exempt literary institutions from rates; and they were equally agreed that the object was not effected by the existing Act. Hence the necessity of new provisions. He hoped to see the Bill passed in the present Session.

MR. TITE said, the Bill did not introduce a new principle, but merely extended one already in operation. Mechanics' Institutes had been denied the benefit of the law because they took in newspapers; and the object of the Bill was to alter the law in that respect. The objections raised to the clause might easily be obviated in Committee.

MR. LIDDELL said, he thought a very little ingenuity would suffice to remove all the objections to the Bill.

MR. MASSEY said, the Bill would extend the exemption far beyond what Parliament had contemplated in passing the original Bill. Any person who was fortunate enough to get the certificate of the officer would be able in this way to avoid the payment of his rates. However desirable they might be to encourage education, they must not throw a burden on the ratepayers by opening the door for a large number of exemptions. The sort of Amendment which was proposed to be made in Committee would only leave the law as it stood. It had been suggested that the word "mainly" or "principally" should be introduced; but the only effect of that would be to increase litigation.

MR. HILDYARD said, he should support the Bill, which he thought most beneficial, and hoped that it would be proceeded with.

MR. JOHN MACGREGOR said, he considered that the Government were to blame for neglecting the working classes and postponing their interests to financial considerations. The Government and the House ought to do all they could to promote and extend education, and Members of the Government might do worse than even patronise the Princess's Theatre. They voted thousands of millions for political objects, but they were chary of hundreds when the advancement of the working classes was the question before the House.

MR. HEADLAM said, he would suggest that they should consider the question in Committee. They were all desirous of promoting education, and they might consider in Committee what words would best carry out that object.

MR. ATHERTON said, it seemed to be apprehended that if they sought to get rid of the objectionable word "exclusively," they might give the measure a wider scope than had ever been intended by its supporters. He could not, however, see any great difficulty in substituting for the objectionable adverb some word or form of words which would, while satisfying the objections urged, carry out the objects proposed by the Bill.

MR. BOUVERIE said, that he retained the opinion he before expressed, but he would withdraw his Motion in deference to what seemed the wish of the Committee.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Clause 2.

LORD LOVAINE said, he thought the clause would lead to litigation.

MR. HUTT said, that if the Committee allowed the clause to pass, he would endeavour to change the wording by the time of bringing up the Report, so as to carry out the object the Legislature had in view when it exempted certain institutions.

MR. HILDYARD said, he thought it would be easy to suggest words which the courts of law would find no difficulty in interpreting.

MR. BARROW moved that the Chairman report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 25; Noes 117: Majority 92.

MR. HENLEY said, he would suggest that the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Hutt) should fix the Bill for to-morrow, pass it through Committee pro forma, and then present it in its amended form.

House resumed; Committee report progress.

HOUSE OF LORDS,

MINUTES.] PUBLIC BILLS.—1^a Labourers' Dwellings Act, 1855, Amendment; Advowsons; Distillation from Rice; Oxford College Estates.

2^a Cambridge University; Small Debts Imprisonment Act Amendment (Scotland).

3^a Reformatory and Industrial Schools; Annuities Redemption; Stock-in-Trade Exemption.

REFORMATORY AND INDUSTRIAL SCHOOLS BILL.

Bill read 3^a, (according to Order), with the Amendments; a further Amendment made.

THE BISHOP OF OXFORD moved the insertion of the following after Clause 5:—

"So much of the said first-recited Act as provides that no youthful offender shall be directed to be sent to any reformatory school by any court, judge, sheriff, or magistrate, until after the expiration of his sentence, nor unless he shall be sentenced to a punishment of imprisonment for fourteen days at the least, shall be and is hereby repealed; and it shall henceforth be lawful for any such court, judge, sheriff, or magistrate, having authority under the said recited Act, or this Act, to direct any such youthful offender to be sent to and detained in any reformatory school, to mitigate or commute any sentence of imprisonment which may be passed on any such offender, so far as relates to the actual confinement of such offender in a common prison or house of correction, if in the exercise of their or his discretion it shall appear expedient so to do; and, in lieu thereof, it shall be lawful for such court, judge, sheriff, or magistrate, to direct such offender to be sent to and detained in a reformatory school according to the provisions of the said recited Act and this Act, as well during all or any part of the term of such sentence as for any further period not less than or exceeding the limits prescribed by the said Act."

The right rev. Prelate said, this clause had been thrown out in another place, but by a thin House. He thought it should be left to the discretion of the committing magistrate, whether imprisonment should be a preliminary to a reformatory, as it was obvious that, of the two classes of juvenile offenders, while a short term of imprisonment might be beneficial to the hardened criminal, it would only do harm to those who had been apprehended probably for a first offence, and would be contaminated by even a temporary contact with older criminals. He, therefore, begged to move the insertion of the clause.

LORD RAVENSWORTH said, the question of reformatories had scarcely been yet settled by the State. When the public sentiment became strong on the subject, the Government took the matter into their hands. Legislation on the subject, however, did not become perfect all at once; it did not spring, like Minerva, from the head of Jove. Accordingly changes had already been made, and others would doubtless yet be called for. He thought the Bill a very good one as it stood, and as the clause had been thrown out in the other House, he was averse to the right rev. Prelate's proposal. He would, however, assent to the proposed clause, with an addendum in the shape of a proviso, "provided that such offenders shall be under the age of twelve years."

After some conversation, the purport of which could not be heard,

On Question, their Lordships divided:—Content 53; Not-Content 17: Majority 36.

Clause agreed to: Bill passed, and sent to the Commons.

DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES BILL.

Amendments reported (according to Order).

THE BISHOP OF OXFORD then moved the Amendments of which he had given notice, and moved the omission from the Bill of Clauses 19, 20, 21, 22, 23, and 24. The right rev. Prelate said there were other matters connected with the Bill to which those Amendments did not refer, but which were well worthy of consideration. He believed that the majority of their Lordships were of opinion that it would be of great advantage that the civil action which was at present maintained for criminal conversation should be done away with. His noble and learned Friend had talked of introducing a measure upon the subject at some future period; but he could have wished that he had addressed his vigorous mind to considering how a clause to that effect could be at once introduced. One argument which had operated on the Committee for retaining this action was, that in certain cases the husband was not only injured by the loss of his wife but by the loss of property to himself and family; but that was a matter which might, he thought, be most properly left to the tribunal which the noble and learned Lord proposed to establish, and he did not see why power might not be given to that tribunal in such cases to inflict a fine upon the adulterer, which would be at once a penalty for the crime, and a compensation to the sufferer for the wrong done him. The whole subject might by some such means have been included in the present Bill, and then the judicature of the country would have been purged of what he believed most of their Lordships would agree with him was a monstrous evil—namely, the civil action for damages for criminal conversation. He would next proceed to say a few words with regard to those points to which the Amendments of which he had given notice referred. As he had stated on a previous occasion, the preponderance of his judgment went to the opinion that the great Lawgiver of the Christian world did exclude from the sentence of condemnation pronounced against persons who put away their wives those persons who put them away on account of adultery. Our blessed Saviour, in introducing a greater degree of strictness into the law of divorce, and in his declarations with regard to it, made the exception of divorce on the ground of adultery. He was bound to admit, as far as the abstract question was concerned, that a Christian State ought, if it could without incurring other and greater evils, to give the same amount of liberty as was permitted by the great legislator of all

The Bishop of Oxford

Christian communities; and, therefore, if the question were whether it was lawful for a Christian State abstractedly to provide means, if it could, by which, with safety to morals, this new relaxation could be introduced, he should be unable himself to vote against such limited relaxation. But the question before their Lordships was of a very different kind. A measure was proposed to them under this profession—that, whereas now only the rich could obtain this relaxation by separate privilegia, justice required that it should be carried down to the lower orders of society. Now, in dealing with the Bill as a practical question, he objected, in the first place, that it would not carry into effect its professed object. It was perfectly impossible that the class for which they were mainly asked to introduce this new relaxation could obtain any relief whatever from the Court which it was proposed to found under the Bill. The funds which would be required for putting the machinery of that Court into action could not be provided by the poor, and the poor were just the class to which he would most desire to give a remedy, if it could be done without incurring greater evils. By altering the law as now proposed their Lordships would give to the comparatively wealthy the power of putting away their wives under certain conditions, while withholding it from the great mass of the population. That, as it appeared to him, was a strange way of fulfilling the profession with which the Bill was introduced; and he believed it would be doing a great wrong to society, inasmuch as it would make the law of the land say that such divorces were lawful, and yet would withhold the application of the law from the great bulk of the people, who stood most in need of such a relaxation. Moreover, he maintained that they should not propose any alteration of the existing law which affected in this way the whole of family life, without showing that in making provision for the relaxation which they were about to introduce they were not doing great evil in other respects; that they were not shaking the very foundations of family life and endangering its purity throughout all classes of the community; because, although the thing itself might be right, he would remind their Lordships that the abstract lawfulness of the proposed relaxation did not foreclose the argument that the way in which they were asked to introduce it would give rise to other certain and great evils which would more than counterbalance the anticipated good. For his own part, he could not for a moment doubt that by introducing this perfectly novel principle they would do more to shake the sanctity of marriage among all classes of the community than by almost any other measure that could be adopted. When it was said that under the law of Christ a man was allowed to put away his wife for adultery, and that therefore a Christian Legislature was bound to give the same degree of relaxation, without any limitation or restriction, he would beg their Lordships to remember that the same law laid down that marriage was honourable for all; and yet a Christian Legislature had never deemed it a wrongful infringement of the liberty of man to marry to enact that no person should be permitted to contract marriage until he was twenty-one years of age without the consent of his parents. Here was at once a restriction upon what appeared to be divine law. In all such matters they had not only to consider the abstract question of whether so and so might be allowed, but likewise whether the mode in which the assertion of the abstract principle of right was to be made would obiter draw on evils so great as ought to restrain them from proceeding in that particular way; and it therefore seemed to him, inasmuch as they could not stop where the present Bill stopped, inasmuch as they were not prepared to give the courts sufficient power and authority to guard against collusion and other evils, inasmuch as the Bill would not extend the proposed relaxation to the great mass of the population, that they should pause before proceeding further in such a line of legislation. There were other grave considerations in this matter. Were they prepared, by passing this Bill, to say that the law of the Church and the law of the State should be in direct opposition to one another; At all events they were bound, if they meant to maintain the Established Church, and not to burden the consciences of its ministers, to give the Church an opportunity of considering the question with the view of having its law altered pari passu with the law of the State. There was yet another point to which he begged the attention of their Lordships. The Bill proposed not only that a husband should be permitted to put away his wife for adultery, but also that a wife should be allowed, under certain conditions, to put away her husband. Now, would any of their Lordships tell him that there was the shadow of a foundation in the Gospel for such an extension of the right of divorce? It was distinctly stated that a husband might put away his wife, but no general principle was asserted in the Gospel which would equally entitle a wife to put away her husband. It seemed to recognise an equality in the sexes; but the truth was, that though the sin might be equal in each—though he denied not that the sin was equal in each—yet the social crime was different in magnitude as committed by the one or the other; and our blessed Master, while allowing a husband to put away his wife for adultery, because all the highest purposes for which marriage was instituted by God would be defeated by the infidelity of the wife, never extended the same right to the other side. He asked their Lordships was it right, in the face of that interpretation of the Holy Word, supported as it was by the greater part of Christendom—in the face of the law of the Church—was it right to put this interpretation upon the Lord's Words? Was it right to extend this licence to the whole population—nay, more, was it right to give to a limited portion only of the community a licence which would be practically withheld from the greater part of it—on grounds so slender and uncertain? Taking the Bill as it stood—a law solely for the rich and not for the poor—he trusted that their Lordships would not pass it another stage without striking out the clauses to which he thus ventured to object. The duty which he was now discharging was a very painful one, especially to one occupying the position which he had the honour to hold in that House. He knew it would subject him to great misrepresentation. Those who were suffering under individual instances of hardship, deeply as he sympathised with them, would think that he was doing everything in his power to prevent their release from a position which they imagined to be an unexampled evil; but, believing that the deep foundations of family life rested upon the sanctity of the marriage contract—believing that many and great evils would arise from that licence which would inevitably follow the adoption of the Bill as it stood—believing that family life, valuable as it was to every one, was most valuable to the poor man, who felt that amid the many hardships of his lot it was the one thing which God had given to him for his strength and comfort—and believing that no good could result from a general relaxation extending to the wife as well as to the husband, he trusted that their Lordships would not pass the Bill without omitting the clauses to which he took objection. The right rev. Prelate concluded by moving the omission of Clauses 19 to 24 both inclusive.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he was sure their Lordships could not have failed to see that his right rev. Friend confused two principles which were perfectly distinct; and he proposed in effect to strike out from the Bill all that formed the foundation on which it was introduced,—viz., the necessity of giving a judicial character to that which was substantially a judicial proceeding. His right rev. Friend had argued as though it was proposed by the Bill to make it obligatory on any one to insist on a divorce; but its object was to give facilities for divorce, which he could not believe was inconsistent with the Scriptures; which, in like manner, did not make divorce compulsory but only permissive. He (the Lord Chancellor) started with the assumption that there was nothing in the Scriptures that forbade a husband from putting away his wife for adultery; and, starting from that point, he would ask, what ought to be the course of sensible legislation on the subject? Surely, it must be to give to a person complaining of adultery such facilities for divorce as the nature of the case permitted and as were not inconsistent with the Divine Law. What had been the course hitherto pursued in this country? On the pretence that divorce à vinculo was unlawful, the law of this country absolutely and entirely forbade it; but nevertheless, in every case where a person had the pecuniary means of coming to their Lordships' House for a private Act of Parliament, it enabled him to obtain redress substantially as a right. Now, this Bill provided that that which had hitherto been obtained by parties as privilegia—but which were invariably claimed as a right—should be in future granted by a regular tribunal as a right. His right rev. Friend complained that there would be inequality in the working of the law, and said that the Bill would be a nullity and a mockery, because persons in the lower class of life would be unable to obtain the redress granted to the rich. But that would be a reason for refusing to legislate on almost every subject. The rich had necessarily a great advantage over the poor in all cases requiring an appeal to a court of law, as such proceedings were, in the nature of things, always more or less costly; but was that any reason why the Legislature should not do as much as it could in the way of giving relief to all? The object of the Bill was to render proceedings for divorce less complicated, less difficult, and less expensive than now; and it was no argument against it that all would not be able to avail themselves of the alteration. To retort an argument used by the right rev. Prelate in the discussion just concluded—if we cannot make the law perfect, that is no reason why we should not make it as perfect as possible. When he first introduced this Bill, he confined the relief to the husband, and to the wife simply to one case—the case of incestuous adultery; but in the Committee it was thought that the relief to the wife might reasonably be extended to certain other cases—such as when a husband had not only committed adultery but deserted his wife for a certain number of years; when he was guilty of cruelty along with adultery; and when he had committed bigamy. The Bill, therefore, had been altered so as to give relief to the wife in those few cases; but it was not deemed prudent to carry the principle further. He did not wish to speak lightly of adultery on the part of a husband, but he quite coincided in the doctrine laid down by the right rev. Prelate as to the difference between adultery on the part of the wife and that of the husband. It would be mere prudery and affectation to say that the evils were socially the same. The committal of adultery on the part of the husband was consistent with a subsequent reconciliation of the wife, and the parties might live together happily afterwards; but the thing was, in ordinary cases, impossible when the same sin was committed on the part of the wife. He believed the Committee had arrived at the best conclusion that could be come to on the subject, when they granted relief to the wife in these few cases. If, however, his right rev. Friend was correct in saying that to grant a divorce in any case at the instance of the wife was to do an act forbidden by the Scriptures, then, of course, it ought not only to induce their Lordships to pause, but at once to reject that part of the Bill. He could not, however, so interpret the passages to which the right rev. prelate alluded. If there was Scriptural authority for saying that it was lawful for a husband to put away his wife for adultery, did it not in the present state of society follow as a corollary that the converse of the position was true, and that it was not unlawful for the wife to put away her husband? He did not say it followed that it might always be done for the same cause; but he could not agree with his right rev. Friend in an interpretation which amounted to entire prohibition. He repeated that the proposal of his right rev. Friend would have the effect of rendering the whole Bill nugatory, because if in no case the relief of a divorce à vinculo was to be granted all the remaining provisions of the Bill fell to the ground. If their Lordships thought there ought to be no divorce under any circumstances whatever, then let them adopt the proposition of his right rev. Friend; but if they did so, he would conjure them to come positively to the determination that none of the petitions for divorce which came before their Lordships' House as privilegia should hereafter be listened to.

LORD REDESDALE said, he thought they ought to treat this question as one affecting the morals and habits of the people at large. Hitherto divorce had been a thing withheld from the people at large, and the consequence was that the marriage law was held more sacred in this country than in any other country in the world. They were now going for the first time to make divorce possible by a legal process, and he cautioned them that if they did so it would not be possible to confine cases to the court constituted by the Bill. They would find themselves compelled to act up to their theory, and to provide a cheaper tribunal for the lower classes than that created by this Bill. But it followed from their thus lowering the character of the tribunal they would lower the character of the inquiry, and they would thus get rid of much of the security which was guaranteed by the constitution of the present court for the stability of the marriage tie. At present, where tempers differed, the parties felt that they must nevertheless remain together and accommodate themselves to each other, and this knowledge, in his belief, had caused the marriage state to be so happy in this country. A Motion had already been proposed to extend divorce to cases of desertion, and, depend upon it, if once the door were opened the example of Germany and other countries would be followed, and divorce would be allowed for incompatibility of temper. Who would be hurt by the rejection of these provisions? There were very few persons who were unfortunately under the apparent necessity of seeking for the dissolution of the marriage tie—and those parties might feel some injury by the rejection of this Bill. But who were affected by this Bill in an injurious manner, although indirectly? Why, every single marriage was touched more or less by the principle of the present change in the law. It was, therefore, expedient for the House to consider how far divorces, when granted, were conducive to the happiness of the parties concerned. If their Lordships were to examine the history of twenty or thirty divorces, they would not find more than two or three instances in which anything like happiness had been enjoyed by the parties who had obtained a divorce. In numberless cases no re-marriage took place, and where there were children the greatest distress and inconvenience were experienced. If Parliament were to determine that divorces à vinculo should be no longer granted, that decision would only prevent three or four divorce bills a year from being brought forward; and would, perhaps, only affect fifty or sixty couples, while the change affected the whole marriage law of the kingdom. He should cordially support the Amendment of the right rev. Prelate.

LORD CAMPBELL said, that the noble Lord (Lord Redesdale) had always been consistent in maintaining that marriage was, by the Divine law, indissoluble. The noble Lord was a member of the Commission over which he (Lord Campbell) presided, and in which the noble Lord (Lord Redesdale) stood alone. That Commission was composed of men of all parties, and the noble Baron was the only member who contended that divorces for the adultery of the wife ought never to be granted. The noble Lord now said, that if their Lordships rejected these provisions they ought never to allow petitions for divorce Bills to be presented to them. But were their Lordships prepared to come to such a determination? For 200 years the husband had had this remedy as a matter of course. If he had not been guilty of misconduct, if there had been no collusion and no blame on his part, and if he proved adultery on the part of the wife, the marriage was dissolved. Although this divorce took the form of a legislative act, it was, in fact, a judicial process. That had been the practice for two centuries, and it had continued without any remonstrance from the right rev. Prelates or from any other members of their Lordships' House. Were they now prepared to say that, however immaculate and exemplary the conduct of the husband might have been, if his wife were seduced he was to have no redress? Did the noble Lord mean that he was to live with her again—that there was to be condonation, as in that scene in the German play of The Stranger—and that the parties should shake hands and return to the marriage state? But, then, if there could be no condonation for the adultery of the wife, ought there not to be separation? The Divine Founder of our religion certainly permitted divorce for the adultery of the wife, and he trusted that their Lordships would not be prepared to change that law, which had substantially existed for so many years, and under which so much domestic purity had existed. The right rev. Prelate (the Bishop of Oxford) did not consider the marriage tie indissoluble—nor, indeed, could he, for he was not a Roman Catholic, and did not regard marriage as a sacrament. The right rev. Prelate would allow marriage accordingly to be dissolved for the adultery of the wife. But was the right rev. Prelate content with the present state of things? He said that he wished all persons to be placed on the same footing in regard to the administration of the law. At present, however, the man of moderate means was absolutely cut off from the application of the law as it stood. Did the right rev. Prelate, however, wish the law to remain as it now stood? Upon that point his right rev. Friend was obscure. He (Lord Campbell), however, believed that by passing the present measure their Lordships would effect a great improvement and would remove a great reproach from our judicial procedure. The Commission appointed by Her Majesty to consider this subject had, with the exception of the noble Friend, unanimously recommended this Bill. As some years had now elapsed he might mention that the Report of the Commissioners was drawn up by the present right hon. Member for the University of Cambridge (Mr. Walpole), no rash reformer, it must be admitted, and a man not likely to disregard the cause of religion and morality. Instead of an Act of Parliament being preceded by an action for criminal conversation, and a suit in the Ecclesiastical Court for a divorce à mensâ et thoro, and then canvassed in both Houses of Parliament, a judicial tribunal would be established by which on proof of the offence a remedy was given. He agreed with the right

rev. Prelate that the remedy ought to be afforded to the poor as well as to the rich—to all husbands who could prove themselves free from any imputation of misconduct in the marriage state, and who had had the calamity of having an unfaithful wife. In one instance their Lordships had allowed a husband, so situated, to sue in that House in formâ pauperis, and he knew no objection why husbands should not be allowed to sue in formâ pauperis before this new tribunal, and have the means supplied to them, if they could make out that they had no means of calling witnesses and meeting the necessary expenses of having their complaints heard. He did not see why the privilege should not be converted into a right of general application. He knew that the Ecclesiastical Courts would not dissolve marriage, because they were not empowered by law to do so; but he knew nothing in the law which declared marriage to be indissoluble. Archbishop Cranmer was of opinion that a remedy should be given to all those who could prove the infidelity of their wives; and the Commission to which Cranmer belonged reported, that there ought to be a legal tribunal, whereby, on proof of adultery by the wife, marriage might be dissolved. He was not aware that it required any act of Convocation to allow their Lordships to proceed with this Bill; and, with all the respect which he felt for the Church, he considered marriage a civil contract on which Parliament had an undoubted right to legislate. He had heard a right rev. Prelate say it was exceedingly wrong for their Lordships to pass the Bill allowing marriage without going to church, because it was a purely spiritual proceeding, over which the Church, and the Church alone, had jurisdiction; but, with all his respect for the Church, he protested against that doctrine. He believed that if their Lordships should reject this Bill they would commit a great error, by continuing a state of the law that was a disgrace to this country.

THE BISHOP OF ST. DAVID'S thought the noble and learned Lord who had just spoken had not done justice to the argument of the noble Lord the Chairman of Committees (Lord Redesdale), and had done palpable injustice to the argument of his right rev. Friend (the Bishop of Oxford). He did not observe that any part of the able argument of the noble Lord (Lord Redesdale) turned, in the slightest degree, upon the peculiar opinion which he held, as to the absolute indissolubility of the marriage tie. The noble Lord appeared to him to have carefully avoided any reference to that opinion, and although he (the Bishop of St. David's) did not share in that opinion, nevertheless he could, with perfect consistency, concur in every part of the argument of the noble Lord. It might be true that, entertaining that opinion, the noble Lord would not view with dissatisfaction the abolition of the remedy now provided as privilegia; but, whether that remedy was abolished or not, his argument, being entirely irrelevant to it, would remain precisely the same. He (the Bishop of St. David's) himself was not very greatly alarmed at the prospect of the abolition of that remedy, because, as it clearly applied to a very small class of cases, whether it remained or was abolished was of very slight importance. But the ground of his objection to the present measure was, not that he was not content that that remedy should remain—the only question being, whether it should or should not be extended. With regard to his right rev. Friend, he did not observe that he objected to the continuance of those privilegia, provided the remedy was purified of some of the preliminary abuses, which were the strongest, if not the only objections against it. Whether the remedy was provided in its present or in another form was a question of no importance, compared with that which the noble and learned Lord (Lord Campbell), to his great surprise, had overlooked, and to which the main arguments of the noble Lord (Lord Redesdale) and his right rev. Friend were addressed—namely, the effect which might be expected to ensue, in all relations of society, from opening to all classes the prospect of the dissolution of the marriage tie. The real question was, whether there were any such grievances for which this Bill provided a remedy as would counterbalance the evident evil which had been pointed out as resulting from this great change—a change, the operation of which was clearly to lower the sanctity of the marriage tie. He should not have troubled their Lordships except for the single purpose of recalling attention to what, he apprehended, was the main point of the question.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE said, that as he took part in the discussion in the Select Committee, he wished to offer a few words in explanation of the judgment which he had formed upon this subject. The right rev. Prelate (the Bishop of Oxford) admitted that divorce for adultery of the wife should be permitted; but he went on to say there were various reasons of policy which should prevent their giving relief to the husband, except by the circuitous mode of a private Act of Parliament; and the right rev. Prelate said, that if they passed this Bill they would place the law of the State in direct contradiction to the law of the Church. As far, at all events, as permitting divorce for adultery of the wife, the law of the State, according to the right rev. Prelate, had the authority of Holy Scripture in its favour; but the law of the Church was against it. What was the law of the Church? It was a remnant of old Roman Catholic times—a remnant of those laws which were made by the priesthood for the purpose of obtaining complete control over the people, and an invention to raise quibbles with the object of levying taxes for dispensations on the marriages of the whole population of Europe. It was confessedly by mere accident that this part of the ecclesiastical law was retained in our jurisprudence. As had been stated by his noble and learned Friend (Lord Lyndhurst), a commission of learned persons, ecclesiastics and laymen, was appointed by King Henry VIII. to consider what changes should be made in the law in consequence of the complete disruption of our Church from the authority of the See of Rome, and the result was a book, written by Archbishop Cranmer, which laid down the principle that divorce for adultery of the wife should be permitted. In the latter part of his speech, the right rev. Prelate said there was no express authority in Scripture for divorce for adultery of the husband; but he seemed to forget what was the condition of women relative to their husbands in those times. Women were slaves; they were not the equals of the men; they had none, or scarcely any, civil rights; and it was impossible to conceive a case in which women would or could appeal to any tribunal for redress against their husbands. One of the great efforts of the Divine law was to raise the condition of women, and to place them upon a footing upon which they had never previously stood, and in a position in which they were not now placed in any country which did not enjoy the blessings of Christianity. All that was intended to be bestowed upon man by that law was also intended to be conferred upon woman. Thus, fair reasoning could lead to no other conclusion than that the liberty given to man to put away his wife on account of adultery extended equally to the wife in similar cases. Any argument based upon a strict literal interpretation of Scripture would lead to dangerous results. The name which the right rev. Prelate (the Bishop of Oxford) bore was associated with an act of justice and mercy, one which had conferred honour upon that name and upon the country which had acted upon the advice of his illustrious relative, and declared the absolute equality of men, and that no man could lawfully be a slave to another. But if in those days the Holy Scriptures had been interpreted in the rigid sense which the right rev. Prelate wished now to be adopted, it might then have been said with great force that slavery was approved of and spoken of in Scripture as an institution; that a slave was sent back to his master by St. Paul; and that therefore it would be acting against the law of our Saviour to abolish slavery. That argument would have been equally convincing as that now used to induce the Legislature to withhold from a wife the power to separate from her husband, which the latter already enjoyed in respect of his wife. The noble Lord (Lord Redesdale) had objected to the Bill, that it might be made to go even further than was at present intended. He (the Earl of Donoughmore) trusted that it would go further. He hoped the day was not far distant when Parliament would adopt a general law dealing with this subject in the plain common-sense view which had prevailed in Scotland for years without having inflicted any injury to the morals of the people—that we should recognise the fact that a wife had the same rights of divorce as the husband. Great stress had been laid by the noble Baron and by both right rev. Prelates upon the danger likely to ensue from the liberty of divorce which the Bill would give; but in reply to that apprehension, he would refer to the case of Scotland, where the liberty had existed for years, and without producing any deteriorating effect upon the morals of its people.

THE EARL OF DESART observed, that at present divorce was not legal, but in extreme cases the aggrieved parties had an appeal to that House. By the Bill, however, it was proposed to make what was now an exceptional act a legal habit, and if that were done, it must descend below the point at which it was now intended to stop. Although the Bill proposed an unexceptionable tribunal to administer the law, when the public found that divorce was a legal habit, they would not be content with that arrangement, and he feared that the result would be the establishment of some kind of petty sessions' divorce tribunals, which would degrade marriage from its present character to one of connubial concubinage. He thanked the right rev. Prelate (the Bishop of Oxford) for stating his views so clearly as he had done, and hoped they would be adopted by the House.

THE BISHOP OF SALISBURY said, that as the noble and learned Lord (the Lord Chief Justice) had spoken of the noble Baron's (Lord Redesdale's) opinions as very peculiar ones, he felt bound to avow before their Lordships that his own convictions were clear that the noble Baron was right, and that the Bill before their Lordships' House was founded on wrong principles. He did not rise to justify this conclusion by any reference to the canons of the Church or ecclesiastical law, but he rested his argument simply and solely on the Word of God. He felt the great difficulty of entering upon such an argument in that House, but he also felt that one holding his office and having his convictions was bound to state to their Lordships, and try to vindicate in their hearing what he believed to be the truth of God's most Holy Word; and he was sure that their Lordships would patiently listen to such a statement of his opinions. To come to a right understanding of our blessed Lord's teaching on this momentous question, their Lordships must remember the provisions of "the writing of divorcement" to which reference was made in the Gospel of St. Mark, and, what was of more importance, in those two passages of St. Matthew's Gospel which were constantly referred to as sanctioning a relaxation of the present law of our Church and nation. The writing of divorcement, the libellum repudii, allowed by Moses, provided both for separation and re-marriage. The husband said, "accipe libellum repudii et esto à me abjecta et cuicunque viro permissa." But our Lord cancelled these provisions, and made separation and re-marriage impossible. Thus it is recorded of Him by St. Mark that He said, "If a woman put away her husband and be married to another, she committeth adultery; and in St. Matthew we find the same judgment of our Lord recorded, though in a different way. Our Lord's words in the 5th chapter of St. Matthew are "Whosoever shall marry her that is divorced committeth adultery;" and His words as recorded in the 19th chapter are almost the same: and in both these passages it is observable that in speaking of the woman divorced the article is omitted—that it is not τὴν ἀπολελυμένην, but ἀπολελυμένην, which would include every divorced woman, whatever was the reason of her divorce. From these passages it seemed to him (the Bishop of Salisbury) plain what our Lord's mind was with regard to the woman—that separation so as to re-marry was impossible. Nor was it less clear with regard to the man. Thus He said, according to St. Mark, "Whosoever shall put away his wife and marry another, committeth adultery against her;" and again, according to St. Luke, "Whosoever putteth away his wife and marrieth another, committeth adultery. He (the Bishop of Salisbury) thought that no teaching could be more plain than this, and he could come to only one conclusion—viz., that our Lord had annulled the provisions of the libellum repudi, and that divorce and re-marriage were, according to the law of Christ, impossible. He, however, admitted that there was one exception allowed for divorce—not for divorce and re-marriage, but for separation without the power of re-marrying—and that was in the case of adultery. This one relaxation of the law of our Lord is recorded both in the 5th and 19th chapters of St. Matthew. In the former the words are "Whosoever putteth away his wife, saving for the cause of fornication, causeth her to commit adultery." In the latter passage the words are, "Whosoever shall put away his wife, except it be for fornication, and shall marry another, committeth adultery." Nor was this relaxation confined to one sex. Our Lord made man and woman entirely equal in this matter. The case of exception included the woman as well as the man. The words of St. Paul, in the 7th chapter of his First Epistle to the Corinthians, "If she depart," imply that it was possible for the woman in some case—viz., in that one case declared by our Lord—to get a divorce from her husband; not such a divorce as to be re-married, but only such as would enable her to act upon the revelation of God's mind given by the same Apostle, "let her remain unmarried, or be reconciled to her husband." And even this one relaxation was still further guarded; though they who availed themselves of it would not incur the sin of adultery, they would be doing that from which our Lord, through His Apostle, would dissuade them. The higher standard to which he would bring them He set before them in these words of his Apostle—"Let not the wife depart from her husband. Let not the husband put away his wife." He (the Bishop of Salisbury) had thus laid before their Lordships what he believed to be the mind of God, in the new dispensation, with regard to the subject on which their Lordships proposed to legislate. His conclusion was that it was contrary to the teaching of our blessed Lord for a husband to put away his wife, or a wife to put away her husband, and marry again. He entreated their Lordships to weigh well what they were doing, because it was his most solemn conviction that they would, if they passed this Bill, not sweep away (as it had been said in the debate) only the relics of the Roman Catholic religion, but pass enactments contrary to the plain letter of Holy Scripture. He entreated them to pause before they arrayed all those who read Holy Scripture as he did against any decree which man might make on the subject—he entreated them not to give their verdict against what he could not indeed say was a perfect consensus of all interpreters of Holy Scripture, but which had been the law of our country for ages, and which he in his conscience believed was the true interpretation of Holy Writ, and the only one which could keep the law of marriage, and the administration of that law, at the level of those high sanctions with which our Lord has Himself shown us marriage was surrounded before the Fall. He would only add, that one thing had at any rate been gained by this discussion. It had been admitted on all hands that, if the present law, which made marriage indissoluble, was right, wealth and station ought not to purchase exemption from its sanctions; and that if it was wrong, and that some relaxation of it was conformable to the mind of our Lord, the poor should, as Christians, enjoy the same privileges as the rich.

VISCOUNT DUNGANNON said, that though defects might exist in the present system, he could not but fear that the remedy proposed was far worse than the disease, and that if you once made divorce a part of the law of the land it would be the means of introducing great confusion into society and causing vast unhappiness.

to the community. He could not help concurring with what had fallen from the noble Lord the Chairman of Committees, and hoped the House would support the Amendments of the right rev. Prelate. He believed that the difficulty which had hitherto existed in obtaining a divorce was in a great degree the cause of the morality which existed in this country with regard to the observance of the marriage state. The morality would be shaken to its very foundations by the present measure, and he could not therefore give his sanction to a Bill which, to say the least of it, was fraught with danger to the morality, the well-being, the order of society, and the happiness of the community at large.

THE EARL OF DERBY: My Lords, I am not going to prolong this discussion, or to enter into the very elaborate arguments we have heard adduced in support of the views entertained with regard to the dissolubility or the indissolubility of the marriage tie. I cannot help observing, however, that, even among those who agree with the proposed Amendments of the right rev. Prelate, there is a very considerable difference of opinion on this subject. Undoubtedly the right rev. Prelate (the Bishop of Oxford) did not contend for the indissolubility of the marriage tie, and admitted that there existed high authority for asserting that in certain cases, and under certain conditions, the marriage tie is dissoluble. The right rev. Prelate, who has since addressed the House (the Bishop of Salisbury), appears also to consider that the marriage tie is, to a certain extent, dissoluble as regards the man; yet, if I understood him rightly, the man is, under no circumstances, entitled to marry again. My noble Friend (Lord Redesdale) again contends that, under no circumstances, either by the law or the Gospel, is the marriage tie dissoluble. I did not understand the right rev. Prelate (the Bishop of Salisbury) to contend that the marriage tie was indissoluble. [The Bishop of SALISBURY: Yes, I did; but I said that the woman might be "put away."] Well, that is a nice distinction, which I cannot very well understand; but I will not enter into that point. I rose, my Lords, mainly for the purpose of putting to the noble Lord on the woolsack, or to my noble and learned Friend (Lord Lyndhurst), a question which, to my mind, is of considerable importance, and which may, to a certain extent, influence the vote which I am called upon to give on this question. I cannot concur with my noble Friend at the table (Lord Redesdale) in the indissolubility, however much I may respect the sanctity of marriage. I do believe there are cases in which it is competent for human authority to give its sanction to the dissolution of the marriage tie. I cannot feel satisfied with the existing state of the law, because it says one thing while the Legislature says another, and because, too, under it, there is a great disadvantage, a great inequality, as regards the condition of the rich and the poor. Assuming that marriage may be dissolved in certain cases, the question then arises, by what agency shall that process be effected? My noble Friend (Lord Redesdale) says very consistently, "By no means at all; the Legislature should admit of no exceptions." But I say, not admitting that doctrine of indissolubility, if the marriage tie is to be dissolved at all, let the law of the land have an equal operation, and do not accomplish this object by exceptional legislation, setting aside the law. I am, therefore, altogether favourable to the principle of this Bill, and I confess I have been unable to hear from the authorities quoted to-night anything in Scripture or anything in reason which should prevent the Legislature from dealing with this question. When, however, I look to the probable consequences of passing this law, to the consequences of facilitating the dissolution of this, the most sacred of ties, I confess I think we are bound to regard those consequences—we are bound to ask whether by this legislation we are not sanctioning great laxity with regard to marriage, and giving facilities for the dissolution of that tie, which, except under certain circumstances, ought never to be dissolved. Are you not by this Bill offering great temptations to collusive divorces—to adultery practised by the connivance of the husband or the wife for the purpose of obtaining a divorce? If you are, then I say you are entering upon a most dangerous course of legislation, and one against which it will be exceedingly necessary to guard. Now I cannot but own that if you give facilities for obtaining divorces to the middle and lower classes—classes by whom at present the idea of a divorce is not to be entertained—I fear it may tend to collusive adultery; I fear that convenient arrangements may be made between the parties for the purpose of procuring a divorce; that where persons have become mutually disagreeable, acts will be committed for the very purpose of gratifying their mutual inclination and of entering into a separate marriage. This would be a serious evil, and one against which it is right we should take some precautions. Now, my right rev. Friend (the Bishop of Oxford), if I may be permitted to call him so, has given notice of an Amendment which appears to me to introduce a sufficient, or, at all events, a very considerable check upon what I fear may be the consequence of the legislation we are now contemplating. He has given notice of his intention to introduce, after the 24th clause, a proviso which, in the case of a divorce, prohibits the party who has been guilty of the adultery from obtaining, perhaps, the very object he had in view—namely, a marriage with the person with whom that adultery had been committed. Such a provision, I say, would in my opinion meet, to a great extent, the precise danger we apprehend. I know not if it be possible for this Bill to pass during the present Session of Parliament; but, at all events, it deserves the gravest consideration, and my vote as to the Amendment of my right rev. Friend—the effect of which I no not deny will be to put an end to this Bill altogether—will be very considerably influenced by the answer which will be given by my noble and learned Friend (Lord Lyndhurst), or by the noble Lord on the woolsack, to the question I am about to put. I am disposed to vote in favour of the Bill and against the Amendment; but what I want to know is, whether, in the event of the rejection of this Amendment, the noble and learned Lords are prepared to adopt the proviso to which I have alluded?

THE EARL OF ABERDEEN wished to remind their Lordships that, by the law of Scotland, the very check which it was now proposed to introduce into this Bill was enacted. The persons who were proved to have indulged in adulterous intercourse with each other were prohibited from marrying; and he entirely concurred with the right rev. Prelate in thinking that it was matter for grave consideration whether it would not be of advantage to introduce some such prohibition into the law of this country.

LORD LYNDBURST did not rise with any intention of entering into the discussion of the question. He wished, however, to inform their Lordships that such a provision was discussed in Committee, and was only lost because the numbers were equal. For his own part, as he had supported the introduction of such a provision when the Bill was before the Committee, he should be prepared to support it in the event of it being again proposed.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he did not consider that the Bill would be improved by the introduction of such a provision, because there was experience to show that such a provision contained something radically wrong. It was one of the standing orders of their Lordships' House that no Bill for a divorce should be introduced which did not contain a clause prohibiting the marriage of the persons who had been guilty of the adultery complained of; but there was no one instance in which that clause had not been struck out, because such a clause did not prevent collusion. There were many instances in which such a restriction had been avoided by gross misconduct, for care had been taken that the act of adultery which had been committed should not be discovered to have taken place between the persons who wished to marry. Such a clause, therefore, was most objectionable, and the same objections would apply to the provision now proposed.

LORD CAMPBELL said, he entirely approved of the restriction under consideration, and believed its adoption would prove a very salutary check. He regarded the existence of such a safeguard in Scotland as the principal reason why the facilities for divorce in that country had been found consistent with the preservation of the purity of morals; and he thought it would be dangerous to pass the Bill without such a restriction.

THE BISHOP OF OXFORD said, he did not rise with the intention of addressing their Lordships upon the original question, but he was anxious to say a few words in reference to what had fallen from the noble Lord opposite. He thought that it would be in the recollection of the House that he had never alleged that any canon of the Church laid down the law upon the matter, nor had he denied that marriage in its essence was other than a civil contract. The noble and learned Lord opposite had quoted what he himself looked upon as a great authority—the opinion of the Reformers of the English Church—and he had pointed out that Cranmer was in favour of divorce on account of adultery, as also was the Reformatio Legum. Now, the Reformatio Legum proposed to allow divorce on account of adultery, but at the same time, it proposed to allow it for many other causes. If a man were absent from his wife for two years, the Reformatio Legum proposed that the wife should be allowed to marry again, and if the husband subsequently returned without being able to give any valid reason for not having communicated with the wife, the second marriage was held to be valid and binding. There was, however, a strong check against collusion, for in such a case the first husband was condemned to banishment or perpetual imprisonment. [The Earl of DERBY—"He would not be so foolish as to come back."] He did not mean to apply an argumentum ad hominem to the noble Lord opposite, but what he wished to point out was, that although it was perfectly true that the Reformatio Legum proposed to allow divorce in cases of adultery, that provision was, at the same time, accompanied by most stringent provisions against adulterers—namely, the penalty of perpetual imprisonment, and that provision entirely removed the moral objection which he entertained towards the present course of legislation. There was one point which had been advanced with which he could not agree, and that was, that the present law was more unfair to the poor than the altered law would be. By the present system divorce was placed out of the reach of all with very few exceptions, while by the altered law it would be placed within the reach of all who were able to afford it, and it was better, he believed, to allow an opportunity for showing particular exemptions from a universal law than to make a universal law the benefits of which could only be enjoyed by the rich. He believed upon his conscience that the Bill would give no real relief to the poor, but that, on the contrary, it would tend to set class against class, and to relax in English society those stringent rules which had hitherto proved so advantageous.

Content 43; Not Content 10: Majority 33.

THE BISHOP OF OXFORD then moved, to insert at the end of Clause 24 the following words:—

"Provided always that it shall not be lawful for a husband or wife who shall have been found guilty of adultery to intermarry with any woman or man with whom the adultery has been proved to have been committed."

LORD DENMAN, who spoke from the Opposition benches, proposed to insert, between the 15th and 16th Clauses, the following:—

"And further, the said Court may order such divorce in case of desertion, if not assured by evidence that the husband was not at the time of such desertion, or has not since been, cohabiting with another woman."

THE LORD CHANCELLOR could not accede to the Amendment, which he thought would only embarrass the Bill.

POOR LAW AMENDMENT (No. 2) BILL.

Order for second reading read.

Motion made and Question proposed.

"That the Bill be now read a second time."

SIR GEORGE PECHELL said, in rising to move that the Bill be read a second time that day three months, he had to express his regret on private grounds, that he should be obliged to appear before the House on the present occasion, living, as he did, in the heart of a society in which peace had prevailed for many years, but which was about to be disturbed by the enactment of the measure for which a second reading was asked. In the first place he had to complain of the manner in which the Bill had been brought forward. Bill No. 1 was introduced on the 3rd of April, without any previous intimation being given to those who took a great interest in the question during the years 1844 and 1845. On the 19th of May an attempt was made to read that Bill a second time, the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Bouverie) saying that as no principle was involved in it, the Bill might be read a second time without discussion. That, however, was objected to, and on the 23rd of May that Bill was discharged, and leave was given to substitute the present Bill for it. After several postponements, the second reading of the present Bill was finally fixed for that day. He knew not whether the present, like the first Bill, was without any principle, but up to the present moment the House had not heard any statement from the Poor-Law authorities as to the provisions of the measure. The great defect of the Bill, in his opinion, was those clauses which repealed the 22nd of Geo. III., and also that portion of the Poor-Law Act which authorised single parishes to become incorporated under the wise and beneficent Statute called the Gilbert Act. There was also a provision restricting the publicity of the rules, orders, and regulations of the Poor-Law Board to the Clerk of the Peace, whereas the present law required copies of such rules to be furnished to the clerks of the petty sessions. So long as there presided at the head of the Poor-Law Board a person in whom the country could place confidence, it did not much signify whether those rules were promulgated or not; but it was matter of great importance as to the description of person who should so preside over that Board. Great inconvenience would, however, arise from dispensing with the copies of the rules which were at present sent to the clerks of the petty sessions. Again, the chairman and vice-chairman of the Board of Guardians at present appointed the auditor of the district; but by the Bill now before the House the power of appointing the auditor would be transferred to the Poor-Law Board; and the auditor, in addition to his present duties, would also have to undertake all the accounts of those places which had adopted the provisions of the Statute of the 4 & 5 Will. IV., including watching and lighting. What watching and lighting had to do with the Poor-Law Amendment Act he was at a loss to conceive. On the other hand, however, the appointment of registrars, which was now exercised by the Poor-Law Commissioners, was to be transferred to the Board of Guardians. If that were considered an equivalent for taking the appointment of auditor from the Board of Guardians, he certainly did not think it to be an adequate one. It was most important that the appointment of the auditor should rest with the Board of Guardians. But, after all, the great objection to this Bill was its compulsory clauses, by which it was proposed to repeal the Act commonly called the Gilbert Union Act—a wise and beneficent law, and one which had operated most advantageously both for the ratepayers and for the poor in all those places where its provisions had been adopted. Now, he wished to inquire why those incorporated parishes should be dissolved? No abuses had been shown to exist in them, nor any inconvenience to have arisen from them. He, therefore, hoped the House would pause before it sanctioned the measure of the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Poor-Law Board. When the Poor-Law Bill was first introduced in 1834, it was proved that the only parishes in England which were quiet were those which had been incorporated under the Gilbert Act. The population of those places then amounted to about 500,000; and Lord Althorp wisely inserted in the Act of 1834 a clause excepting from its operation those Gilbert incorporations, and also those parishes and towns which were governed by local acts. The Gilbert Act was passed in 1782. It empowered parishes to unite for the purpose, among other things, of administering relief to the poor. A great many parishes adopted the provisions of the Act. It was true that on the passing of the Bill of 1834 many of those incorporations were scattered and broken up; but that, he believed, was in consequence of the statements made to the different Gilbert Unions by the emissaries of those who advocated the Poor-Law Bill of 1834. He knew that many of those parishes which were then deluded by those representations were anxious to return and be again placed under the provisions of the 22 Geo. III. They had ever since regretted having yielded to the pressure then put upon them, and having listened to the misrepresentations then made to them in order to induce them to place themselves in the hands of the Poor-Law Commissioners. Great disgust was at the time created throughout the country at the manner in which the Poor-Law Commissioners proceeded to form their Unions, and especially at the course they adopted in 1835 and 1836 in endeavouring to persuade the remaining Gilbert incorporations to surrender. The inspectors who were sent into the different parts of the country resorted to the most unjustifiable means to effect their object, and they from time to time reported that everything was working well in the Poor-Law Unions; but that the Gilbert incorporations were mischievous examples and ought to be dissolved. If the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Bouverie) believed there was any defect in the Gilbert Act, why did he not propose to amend it, instead of repealing the Act altogether. The objection brought against the Gilbert Unions by the Commissioners had, in almost every instance, been overruled by the evidence taken before a Committee of the House of Commons; and that Committee had decided that it was not expedient that the Gilbert Unions should be abolished, but it was, upon the Report of that Committee, adopted by the casting vote of the Chairman, that the present Bill was founded. If the charges brought against the Gilbert Unions were persisted in, he would fortify himself with his strong box, containing every case that had occurred since the year 1844, in order to show the blame that ought to be attached to the proceedings of the Commissioners. As regarded the feeling out of doors on the subject, there had been ten petitions for the Bill and 381 against it—while the number of petitioners in the first case was 448, and in the second 2,471. After reading several passages from these petitions, the hon. and gallant Member concluded by moving that the Bill be read a second time that day three months.

VISCOUNT GALWAY said, that he did not entirely dissent to the Bill, yet he entertained some serious objections to it, and for more reasons than one he would second the Amendment. He would appeal to the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Poor-Law Board as to whether he did not think it advisable, considering the lateness of the Session, to withdraw the Bill. It must be recollected that the right hon. Gentleman had not even made a statement in favour of the measure; and it should also be borne in mind that it was not the fault of the House that the Bill was not more advanced. The right hon. Gentleman had partly to blame himself for the delay. It was not the first Bill he had introduced on the subject. If it was a matter of urgent necessity, the clauses being of such importance, they ought to have been well considered in the first instance, and have been brought forward in a state fit to pass the House. His great objection, however, to the Bill was, it proposed doing away with the Gilbert Unions. No misconduct whatever had been alleged against them; no proof of any want of out-door relief, or of an insufficiency of in-door relief had been adduced, while it certainly was the fact that nine-tenths of the ratepayers of those Unions were adverse to the proposed Bill. If the right hon. Gentleman had the power of doing away with the Gilbert Unions, he could not see any reason why he should not equally do away with the Unions under local Acts. He must confess he was utterly at a loss to know—and the right hon. Gentleman had not as yet made any statement to inform him on the subject—why it was considered necessary to bring the parishes comprising the Gilbert Unions under the operation of the Poor-Law Board. So far as the ratepayers residing in those Unions were concerned, they had the strongest objection to the step, on the ground of the large expenditure that would have to be incurred for erecting workhouses and organising and establishing a new parochial system. With regard to transferring the appointment of auditor from the chairman and vice-chairman of the Boards of Guardians to the Poor-Law Board, he thought the former were as capable of making a good appointment as the latter. In reference to extra-parochial places, it was no more than fair that they should be made to provide for their own poor, and that the burden of doing so should not be cast upon the adjacent parishes; but he did not think the best course would be to attach those extra-parochial places to the parishes adjoining. That was, however, the least objectionable feature of the Bill; but, taken as a whole, the measure seemed to him to be so unnecessary, whilst at the same time it went to extend the principle of centralisation, that he had no hesitation in seconding the Amendment that the Bill be read a second time that day three months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months."

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

MR. BOUVERIE said, he would not follow the example which had been set by his hon. and gallant Friend (Sir G. Pechell), for he must say that never since he had a seat in that House had he heard a speech in which so much was said that was so little to the purpose. The fact was, there was nothing in the speech of his hon. and gallant Friend that required an answer; he would therefore at once address a few remarks to the House in support of the Bill. The noble Lord opposite (Lord Galway) had alluded to the appointment of auditors, and its transfer to the Poor-Law Board. The House must understand that at present the auditor was appointed by the chairmen and vice-chairmen of the Boards of Guardians of the district to be the auditor of that district. That was an arrangement made in substitution of the one by which the Board of Guardians of each Union appointed their own auditor and paid him out of their own funds. Subsequently it was arranged that the auditors should be paid entirely by the public out of the general funds of the country, and a vote was annually taken for that purpose. He could not understand upon what principle it could be contended that the chairman and vice-chairman of the Board of Guardians should have the appointment of the auditors. In 1838 it was a distinct recommendation of a Committee of that House that the auditors should be appointed by the Poor-Law Board. Subsequently to that the Commissioners appointed by the Treasury to examine the state of the public offices investigated the subject and afterwards recommended that the auditors should be appointed in the way proposed by the Bill now under consideration. It was important that the auditors should be absolutely independent of the parties whose accounts they audited, that their whole time should be devoted to the discharge of their duties, and that their districts should be enlarged. In point of fact, they were officers subject to the control of the central authorities, and appointed merely for the purpose of checking and controlling the expenditure of the local rates. If they ought to be appointed locally at all, the appointment ought not to be by the Boards of Guardians, but by the ratepayers. It was preposterous that the Board of Guardians should appoint an auditor to audit their own accounts. The auditor's duty was to act on the part of the ratepayers as a check on the Guardians, and to see that the rates were properly applied. Besides these general objections, he did not think the result of the present system of auditing the accounts was of a satisfactory nature. Many of those officers were efficient, but many were not. As an instance of the necessity which existed for altering the system of appointing auditors, he might mention that not very long since a chairman of a Board of Guardians had actually become a candidate for the office of auditor of the accounts of his own Board, and had voted for himself. The auditors should be much fewer in number, their whole time should be devoted to their duties, and their appointment should be left in the hands of the Poor-Law Board. The animosity of the hon. and gallant Member for Brighton against the Bill was excited by the clauses which would effect the abolition of the Gilbert Unions. The question the House had to consider was this:—As the system of the Poor-Law administration was carried on in ninety-nine instances out of every hundred by Boards of Guardians administering relief under the provisions of the Poor-Law Amendment Act, was it on the whole a sound and beneficial system for the ratepayers, and also for the poor themselves, or was the administration adopted by the Gilbert Unions to be preferred, where the parties acted without any system or any law, and did just as they pleased? It was on the part of the poor who were the proper objects of relief that he urged it was time those Unions should be dissolved. There were only fourteen Gilbert Unions throughout the kingdom, the total population of which was 174,000, while the total population under the ordinary Poor-Law administration was 17,000,000. He should be indifferent about those small local administrations if they were carried on properly, but his complaint against the Gilbert Unions was that as far as the benefit of the poor was concerned they were not properly conducted. As regarded the education of the children of the poor, to care for which was a very important part of the duty of those who managed the poor in these Unions, it was entirely neglected in almost every one of them; and where education was attempted to be given, it was next to nothing in amount, and what there was of it was miserably bad. In fact, in every material respect in which the law for the relief of the poor ought to be efficiently administered, the Gilbert Unions were greatly defective, and he thought it was high time to get rid of them. Next, with regard to the provisions of the Bill respecting extra-parochial places. There were nearly 500 of those places in England and Wales—some small in extent, some with no population, some of considerable extent, and some with a considerable population. The population of those 500 extra-parochial places amounted to more than 30,000. In the whole of them there was absolutely no mode of relieving the poor. The poor had no resource when in a state of destitution, and they were in those places as much without relief—as much without a poor-law as if the statute of Elizabeth had never been passed. It was a disgrace to the country that such a state of things should continue a day longer than was necessary. He had found many hon. Members labouring under the impression that those persons could be relieved from the rates of the adjoining parishes. Now that certainly was not the fact. The rates of the adjoining parishes could not be legally so applied. He had numerous applications from parishes near extra-parochial places, containing accounts of the greatest hardships and suffering endured by the poor of those extra-parochial places, and asking whether there were any means of relieving those people besides by private charity. [The right hon. Gentleman here read a letter which had been addressed by a bench of Magistrates to the Poor-Law Board, in which they stated that they had little doubt the death of a certain pauper, living in an extra-parochial place, had been accelerated, if not caused, by a want of nourishment during her confinement, which she would have received in case the relieving officer of the Union had been at liberty to give it.] With reference to the case of pauper lunatics in such places there was no means of providing for them. The Lunacy Acts applied to parishes only, and the relieving officer had no power to deal with a lunatic belonging to an extra-parochial place, unless the lunatic was first removed into some parish. He confidently appealed to the House as to whether that was a state of things which ought to continue. For his own part, he did not like to take upon himself the responsibility of allowing cases like the one to which he had referred to be continually occurring without endeavouring to provide a remedy. He would therefore ask the House to allow so much of the Bill, at least, to pass as related to these extra-parochial places. He would admit that as regarded some of the other provisions of the Bill, they perhaps were open to objection; and if any opposition should be made to them, he was prepared, considering that the period of the Session was not favourable to him, to postpone those portions of the Bill. But as the hon. and gallant Gentleman (Sir G. Pechell) as well as every other hon. Member, must be friendly to some provision being made to give relief to the destitute poor, he did hope that they would not oppose that part of the measure which applied to extra-parochial places. Therefore, if the House would assent to the second reading of the

Bill, he would undertake, when the Bill went into Committee, to strike out everything except that which related to the relief of poor in extra-parochial places.

SIR JOHN TROLLOPE said, that the gentleman to whom the right hon. President of the Poor-Law Board (Mr. Bouverie) had referred, as having nominated himself for the office of auditor of a poor-law union, had certainly been the chairman of a board of guardians for several years; but he should have thought that that would have constituted a qualification rather than the reverse. [Mr. BOUVERIE: He was the chairman, and he voted for himself.] So most other gentlemen did under similar circumstances. At all events, in the instance referred to, the gentleman was well prepared for the discharge of the duties of his office, for, in addition to being chairman of the board of guardians he was a barrister of considerable practice on the Midland Circuit. He might further state that he had resigned his chairmanship, and was now no longer in connection with the Board. With regard to that portion of the Bill which related to extra-parochial places, the peculiar hardships of the present system, both as to the occupiers of property and the poor themselves, were matters which had come under his own personal observation, and in his county advantage had recently been taken of a private Bill for the purpose of parochialising upwards of 14,000 acres of extra-parochial property rather than wait for any general measure on the subject. The district lay between two Unions, but paid no rates to either; it afforded, however, a large amount of industrial occupation to the poor residents within the Unions, who, when they became sick or required relief, were chargeable, not to the places where they were employed, but to the Union, which derived no benefit from their labour. He thought, therefore, that the right hon. Gentleman, finding that he could not carry the whole of his Bill, had wisely determined on endeavouring to carry that portion of it which the House would agree to. With respect to the Gilbert Unions, it was his opinion that they had failed in their object, and become effete. The Bill, in its present shape, referred to a great many subjects. He (Sir J. Trollope) should be excused, therefore, if he drew the right hon. Gentleman's attention to another question of a kindred nature—he meant that of medical relief. Than the present mode of granting medical relief through out the country nothing, he apprehended, could be more unsatisfactory. It was his opinion, however, that medical men had themselves to blame for this to a great extent; for under the pressure of excessive competition they had been induced, at the outset of the administration of the present poor law to enter into contracts upon an inadequate scale. Indeed, from his own personal knowledge, he could take upon himself to say that the cost of bare medicines, where given in sufficient quantities, would more than absorb the whole salary, and leave the medical man no remuneration whatever for his time, the exercise of his skill, the expense of travelling, and other charges incidental to his profession. The amount these gentlemen asked for in their petitions was 5s. for attendance, 1s. a mile for travelling expenses; and in his (Sir J. Trollope's) opinion that would be by no means an exorbitant allowance. There was besides the greatest discrepancy in the payment of their officers. Pauper cases were always cases of extremity, and the pauper did not call in a medical man till he was forced. In consequence, the medicines he required were such as could not, as he had just stated, be given under the poor-law contracts. He hoped that the right hon. Gentleman would give his attention to the subject. They were doing much in other ways to improve the sanitary condition of the great towns. It was of as much importance to the public health to attend thus to the health of the poor as to drain the towns. It might, perhaps, cost £500,000 to put the present system into proper force, and would be at least as useful as would be the expenditure of £3,000,000 in draining our towns. One-half of the expense would be borne by the State, and the ratepayers throughout the country surely would not grudge their part for a purpose so necessary for the health of the community. He approved of the Bill, and only regretted that so much would be struck out of it as had been promised by the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. CARDWELL said, he wished to say one word with respect to extra-parochial places. The Bill would make those extra-parochial places parishes within themselves. That might be done, and yet no great result attained. It would be, he apprehended, no remedy. They would continue to employ, as they did at present, persons living in the adjoining parishes. In the city of Oxford, Christ Church would by the Bill remain a parish by itself, and yet the property it contained, representing a value of £4,000 a year, would not be called upon to contribute one penny towards a poor rate by reason of there being no poor. By the first Bill of the right hon. Gentleman that would not have been the case. The first clause of that Bill enacted that such extra-parochial place should, for the purposes of the assessment of the poor rate, be deemed to be a part of the parish by which it was surrounded, or of one of the adjoining parishes. He understood, however, that that clause would have given rise to considerable opposition. The present Bill altered that clause to a much greater extent than was necessary, in his opinion, to meet the justice of the case, because Clause 4 still left it optional to an extra-parochial place whether it should be joined to any parish or not. What, however, he wished to suggest was, whether it might not be possible so to arrange the fourth clause as not to leave it optional with the residents, but to make it, as a general rule, compulsory, and then afterwards to adapt that rule to the circumstances of each particular case. It would be almost futile to pass a Bill which was to contain nothing but the clauses relating to extra-parochial places, unless they made the measure in that respect perfect.

MR. HENLEY said, he understood that all the provisions of the Bill were to go overboard, except the extra-parochial clauses. That being so, he confessed that, even in regard to that part of the Bill, he was not disposed to vote for the second reading; and he would shortly state the reason. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Bouverie) said that those clauses related to 500 places, and to a population of 30,000. Now, it would be very difficult to say how great was the variety of circumstances existing in those places; and it would be equally difficult to devise any general measure that should do equal justice to all. He had not any evidence before him to enable him to come to any conclusion on the subject; and it was impossible that a matter of such importance, and at that late period of the Session, could fairly be gone into. Another subject closely analogous to this had been postponed—he meant the rating of mines. He would suggest to the right hon. Gentleman whether it would not be a wiser course for him not to go into the matter now, but in the beginning of another Session to have a Committee to inquire into all these subjects, and obtain the fullest information upon them. The right hon. Gentleman would then be able to legislate in a manner much more satisfactory to the country, and would also be able to do more justice both to the parties to be relieved and to the people whose property would be most materially affected by it. He congratulated the hon. and gallant Admiral (Sir G. Pechell) on the successful effect of his very heavy broadside on the right hon. Gentleman. He did not like the change in the mode of electing the auditors, and he did not approve giving the Government patronage over to the civil power in that way. He should, therefore, oppose the second reading of the Bill.

MR. BARROW said, he very much objected to the House proceeding with a measure of legislation which must necessarily be altered next Session. He did not think the present Bill would answer the object it was intended to effect. The time had arrived when it was impossible to avoid a revision and an alteration of the original Poor Law Act; what was called the common fund had become an enormous charge upon many parishes. There were large districts of land in his own union which did not contribute a single farthing: and there were whole parishes that had entirely dropped out of the contribution.

MR. WALTER said, he merely rose for the purpose of joining his appeal with that of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Henley) to the President of the Poor-Law Commission, in the hope that the right hon. Gentleman would be induced to complete the act of grace which he had begun, in withdrawing the clauses relating to the Gilbert Unions, by putting a good face on the matter and withdrawing the whole measure. It was from no spirit of opposition to the object which the right hon. Gentleman had at heart—namely, the rating of extra-parochial places—that he made this suggestion. It was, undoubtedly, an anomaly that such places should exist, and he should have great pleasure at any future time in assisting the right hon. Gentleman in his endeavours to attain the object he was anxious to accomplish. But there was great force in the objection which had been made by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the City of Oxford (Mr. Cardwell) that there were many places where there were no poor, and, therefore, to give a power of raising rates in those places was a mere mockery and of no substantial advantage.

Mr. Henley

[The hon. Member was proceeding with his observations, when he was reminded by Mr. SPEAKER that the time for the adjournment of the House had arrived.]

THE EAST INDIA COMPANY—FRENCH SUFFERERS BY THE INUNDATIONS—QUESTION.

MR. OTWAY said, he would beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Control whether the sum of £500, which had been subscribed by the Chairman of the East India Company for the relief of the sufferers by the inundations in France, was to be charged on the revenues of India; and whether the subscription of the East India Company, or the sums expended by them in public entertainments, were limited by any fixed regulation, and were subject to the control of Parliament?

MR. VERNON SMITH said, the charge must be made on the revenues of the Company, for there was no other source whence to take it; but it was not true to say the Chairman subscribed the amount—it should be the Chairman on behalf of the Company. The Company had been in the habit of granting various charitable donations to different objects ever since their foundation, but by the Act 55 Geo. III., they could not go beyond £600 without its being first submitted to Parliament. In this instance the grant was within that sum, and, consequently, there was no necessity for submitting it to Parliament; but it was submitted to the Board of Control, and it had the sanction of that Board. With regard to the other question, the hon. Member was probably aware that the Company gave entertainments to the Governors General and other public officers, and though the sums expended were not subject to any fixed regulation, yet they were submitted to the Board of Control, and the yearly expenditure for that purpose was pretty nearly the same. No Estimates were submitted to Parliament, and, consequently, no Votes were taken.

CROWN LANDS AND CHURCH EXTENSION—QUESTION.

MR. THORNELY said, he wished to ask whether the Vote of £10,000, proposed to be paid out of the Crown land revenues for new churches, would be taken this Session?

MR. WILSON said, it would be deferred until next Session.

RETURN OF THE TROOPS FROM THE CRIMEA—QUESTION.

COLONEL FRENCH said, he wished to ask a question of the First Lord of the Admiralty, who stated, some time ago, that all the troops would have left the Crimea by the 30th of June. He wanted to know if that was likely to be the case?

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, the third battalion of the Grenadier Guards were coming home by the Princess Royal. Before he left the Admiralty a telegraphic despatch was received that she had made her signal. The whole of the forces had not yet left the Crimea, but a portion of them were engaged in taking up the railway. Every other man was brought away. Ample transport was there long before the 30th June, and was now waiting till the troops were ready to come away.

ENTRY OF THE GUARDS INTO LONDON—QUESTION.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, he should be glad if the noble Lord at the head of the Government would afford some information to the House as to the manner in which the Guards would enter London. It had been stated in the papers that the route had been determined upon—namely, that the Guards would alight at Nine Elms, that they were to pass through some of the Pimlico Squares, along Victoria Street, up Constitution Hill, and into the Park. He trusted that the noble Lord would afford the inhabitants of London the opportunity of giving the Guards a cordial welcome. He thought it would be well if the same route were followed as was taken on the occasion of the visit of the Emperor of the French to this country—namely, over Westminster Bridge, along Parliament Street, Whitehall, Pall Mall, Piccadilly, and thus into the Park.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he believed the precise route the Guards were to take was not yet fixed upon. They would come from Aldershot to the South-Western Railway, and, of course, alight at the station. They would pass under review by Her Majesty at Buckingham Palace, and then proceed to the Park. The immediate route, however, had not yet been determined upon.

SIR JOHN SHELLEY said, that as the inhabitants of London were very anxious about the matter, perhaps his Lordship would have no objection to name the actual day.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, that part of the Guards had only just arrived at Gosport. They would go to Aldershot, in the first instance, and thence would proceed to London. It was impossible at present to say on what day they would arrive in London, but due notice would be given.

OUR RELATIONS WITH THE UNITED STATES—QUESTION.

MR. H. BAILLIE said, he wished to ask whether Mr. Dallas had represented to Her Majesty's Government that he had full powers to settle the Central American dispute, or had he only the same powers that were entrusted to Mr. Buchanan?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I understand that Mr. Dallas has full powers to discuss with Her Majesty's Government all the questions which have arisen with respect to the affairs of Central America, and that he has powers which Mr. Buchanan had not; as I understood from Mr. Buchanan that he had no instructions upon these questions.

WILLS AND ADMINISTRATIONS BILL—
QUESTION.

MR. MALINS said, he wished to ask his hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General whether it was his intention to proceed with the Bill that night? In conversation with his hon. and learned Friend, he (Mr. Malins) had asked the question, and the reply was that it would not come on that night, and that also was understood by his hon. and learned Friend the Member for East Suffolk (Sir F. Kelly), who had left London to attend a cattle show—[Laughter.]—or agricultural meeting. Hon. Members must be aware that his hon. and learned Friend had agricultural duties to attend to, he being a county Member. He (Mr. Malins) had relied upon the answer given him, and had taken for granted the Bill would not come on that night, but to his great surprise he found, on entering the House, that it was the intention of his hon. and learned Friend opposite to proceed with it. He (Mr. Malins) had come down to the House without his papers, and the facts which he had prepared, and he begged, therefore, to ask his hon. and learned Friend whether he intended to persevere?

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, he was exceedingly sorry that any communication made by him to his hon. and learned Friend should have caused what he would not call a slanderous imputation to be made upon the hon. and learned Member for East Suffolk, who, it appeared, was absent at a cattle show instead of being present in that House. What he (the Solicitor General) had said to his hon. and learned Friend on Tuesday was, that if the debate in which the House was then engaged terminated that evening, the Wills and Administrations Bill would undoubtedly be taken that night. He regretted that some misapprehension had arisen as to what he did say, but his hon. and learned Friend could not say that he was unprepared to discuss the provisions of the Bill when he was generally so well informed on every question before the House.

MR. MALINS said, if his hon. and learned Friend persisted in going on that night, he should move that the Bill be committed that day three months.

On the question that the House resolve itself into a Committee of Supply, CROWN LANDS AND CHURCH EXTENSION.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, the hon. Gentleman the Secretary of the Treasury had stated in answer to a question put to him by the hon. Member for Wolverhampton (Mr. Thornely) that the vote of £10,000 out of the Crown lands for the purposes of Church extension was to be left over for the present Session. He (Mr. Williams) had never before known such an attempt made to get £10,000 by misrepresentation. It was to be granted out of the Crown lands for the purpose of building churches. Now, all the Crown property had been surrendered to the public, and there was now no Crown property available for churches, or any such purposes. He thought it would be monstrous to bring forward a Vote of this kind to build churches in connection with the Establishment, when the Church enjoyed property amounting to millions per annum. They should take example from the Dissenters, and provide for the building of their own churches out of their own pockets. In the district he resided in they had built three or four new churches at their own expense, and had taxed themselves not only to pay for them but also to keep them up. He was certain that there was no other source than the public taxes from which the Vote could be made, and it was nothing short of a misrepresentation to say that it was to come out of the Church property.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, it was not the intention of Her Majesty's Government to propose that Vote this Session, and he should, therefore, be wasting the time of the House if, under such circumstances, he entered upon its discussion. The hon. Member for Lambeth was quite mistaken as to the circumstances of the Vote. When the proper time arrived, the circumstances would be laid fully before the House.

MR. HADFIELD said, that he suspected, notwithstanding the short notice that had been given, that this Vote would have been persevered in, had it not been for the question of his hon. Friend (Mr. W. Williams), and he cautioned the House not to be taken by surprise at a future day. £1,500,000 had already been expended on this subject; for the last thirty-eight years a sum of £40,000 had been devoted to it per annum. The Government should avow what their intentions really were. Let the House, however, beware how it commenced a series of grants for church-building, which would lead to disputes of which no man could see the result.

EDUCATION AT SANDHURST—QUESTION.

MR. RICH said, he would beg to ask the hon. Under Secretary for War if it was the intention of the Government to continue the present charge of £125 a year for the education of the sons of civilians at the Royal Military College, when, as appeared by the Supplementary Army Estimate, the total cost of a cadet did not exceed £75 a year. The Military College was constituted under a Royal Warrant which specially provided a gratuitous education for orphans of the officers of the army, and education at about half cost for sons of officers on service, whilst a third-rate was provided for the sons of civilians, nobility, and gentry, who were to pay such a sum for the expenses of their education, board, and clothing, as should be from time to time determined by a Board of Commissioners acting under that warrant. Before the Committee which sat last year, it was stated in evidence that the Commissioners who had power to modify the rate of educational charges had no power to set aside the provisions of the warrant in the above respect. The warrant had been strictly adhered to during the war, in the course of which there had been educated 156 orphan sons of officers, 100 sons of officers, and 156 sons of civilians receiving their education at the expense of their parents. Under this system the college had prospered, and had sent out many young men who had distinguished themselves. But since peace had been established, the Commissioners, disregarding the warrant under which they were acting, thought fit nearly to double the sum for the sons of civilians, by charging them £125 a year, or, in many cases, with extras, a sum nearly amounting to £150 a year. The price for the sons of officers had been raised by degrees to £80, and the orphans of officers had to pay, first £20, then £30, and afterwards £40 a year. The excuse for this was, that it was desirable to make the school self-supporting; but the result was that the surplus, amounting to more than £7,000 a year, was misapplied, contrary to the spirit of the Royal Warrant under which the school had been founded, in the first place to the payment of nearly £2,000 a year in money and advantages to a governor, a general officer, who had no influence whatever upon the education of the pupils; in the second place, to the expenditure of £5,300 a year upon the education of senior officers who had been in the army, to fit them for the staff, to which probably they might never be appointed. That, with a balance on four years of £5,000, or nearly £1,300 a year, made a sum of £8,000 or £9,000 a year—about one-half the cost of the whole establishment, which came out of the pockets of the civilians who sent their sons to the school to qualify them for the army. The result was, that the great bulk of the officers of the line were deprived of the advantages of a preliminary military education; the increased cost at this school, £150 a year, being beyond the means of their parents. He therefore wished to call the attention of the Government to the subject, and hoped it would be considered with a view to its amendment. He would also observe, that it would be very convenient if the holidays at the Military College could be made in some degree coincident with those at the public schools, in order that brothers who might happen to be at both might have opportunities of meeting.

ARMY PRIZE MONEY—QUESTION.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he wished to inquire the intentions of the Government as to advising Her Majesty to grant compensation to the army engaged in the siege, for stores, &c., taken in Sebastopol. He understood that, after previous wars in which this country had been engaged, it had been the custom for the then Chancellor of the Exchequer to propose that a sum should be granted to the army by way of compensation for prize-money; and at the end of the last war, two sums of £500,000 and £800,000 had been voted for that purpose. In India, also, almost every army had received prize-money. It had not always been very wisely distributed, as, for instance, in the case of the Deccan prize-money, but, at all events, it had been voted; and, among other instances, a sum of £150,000 was granted for the troops who were present at the capture of Java, where a considerable quantity of stores was taken. Now, at the taking of Sebastopol, an Anglo-French Committee was formed for the purpose of dividing the stores found in the town, and this into two sub-committees, one of which took the eastern and the other the western half of the place. In the western town, or Karabelnaia quarter alone, he (Colonel Dunne) believed he was right in stating, they found 2,089 guns, 1,770 of which were serviceable, and among them were several brass guns. Of course, iron guns would not be so useful to us, as the calibre of our guns was different; but brass guns were always valuable. They found also 257,000 solid shot, 60,000 shells, 30,000 grapeshot, and 1,200,000 or 1,500,000 live shells. There were also 417,000 lb. of powder, and 434,000 rounds of small-arm ammunition. A large stock of provisions was also found; but, although they were condemned as food by the English and French Commission, they were sent to Eupatoria, and there made use of. He thought the army had some right to prize-money for the ships which would have been taken if the war had continued. He would also observe that the troops had been put to extraordinary expenses during the late war—from the loss of horses in the passage from Varna to the Crimea, and other causes; he, therefore, hoped the Government would give some equivalent for the stores that had been taken by the army. He was aware that there was a theory abroad that prize-money belonged to the Crown. He did not know how far that might be legal. In the times when the general and his troops divided their spoils at the drum-head they had not to go to the office of some prize-master, who generally robbed them of what they had won. That was the course pursued in the case of the celebrated Koh-i-noor, and some other recent instances; he would, therefore, ask whether the Government intended to advise the Crown to give an equivalent? He had stated the account of the Karabelnaia suburb, but the French prize was even larger than the English. He might add, that he was far from grudging any honour done to the household troops—they had fought bravely at Inkerman; but, as the destination of the line would probably be the West Indies instead of London, he thought some reward might be bestowed on them.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON; Sir, there is no doubt that, in former wars, when property of great value was taken from the enemy, which belonged to the Crown, an equivalent in money was distributed to the troops engaged in its capture. But the property taken in this instance is so extremely small, that if divided among the troops it will not amount to more than 2s. 6d. for each officer and 6d. for each man. These sums are so small, that I fear they would be considered rather a mockery than a reward;—and we are, therefore, not prepared to advise the Crown to make a grant of so small a sum of money.

PROMOTION IN THE ENGINEERS— QUESTION.

CAPTAIN LEICESTER VERNON said, he rose to ask the hon. Under-Secretary for War whether it was intended as a rule of promotion in the Scientific Corps of the army, that no subaltern officer, however he might have distinguished himself in that rank, could be advanced to a brevet majority until he should have again subsequently distinguished himself in the rank of captain? and to call attention to the inexpediency of such a regulation. No such rule as that prevailed in the line, in which branch of the service a lieutenant or ensign who distinguished himself might at once be promoted to substantive rank, either in his own or in some other regiment. The operation of the rule would prevent the Engineer officers who had distinguished themselves before Sebastopol from receiving that promotion to which they were fairly entitled.

MR. FREDERICK PEEL said, in reply to the question respecting Sandhurst College, which had been put by the hon. Member for Richmond (Mr. Rich), he must state that the Estimate laid on the table only covered nine months of the year, and favoured the inference that the cost of each cadet was £100, and not £75 a year, as the hon. Member for Richmond seemed to suppose. It was possible that £125 per annum was in excess of the sum actually incurred in the education of a cadet, and he was not aware that there was any intention to lessen the charge; but, if it could be shown that the receipts of the college were in excess of the expenditure, it might be well to consider the propriety of effecting a proportionate reduction in the sums payable by the pupils. In answer to the question of the hon. and gallant Member for Chatham (Captain L. Vernon), it should be stated that in no branch of the service was there a rule preventing an officer who had distinguished himself as a subaltern from receiving, after he had been made a captain, a step of military rank in recognition of services rendered before he had been promoted to his captaincy. He had himself known a case where a subaltern of artillery had, on becoming a captain, been rewarded with brevet rank for his services while a subaltern. It was not desirable, however, that there should be any positive regulation on the subject, for, if there were, services rendered many years previously might be thought to constitute a claim to brevet promotion. It was his belief that the scientific corps was in no worse position as regarded the matter than any other branch of the service.

MR. H. BAILLIE said, he thought the answer of the hon. Under Secretary for War, with regard to Sandhurst College, was very unsatisfactory. It was a notorious fact that the sons of civilians were charged double the amount necessary for educating them, for they could not be maintained at the college for less than £200 a year. That large sum practically excluded the sons of men who were not in very affluent circumstances; and if additional charges were necessary to maintain the college, they should be borne by the State, and not charged to the sons of civilians, in order that the sons of officers might be educated almost gratuitously. He hoped the subject would be taken into consideration by the Government, as it was one of great importance, and he was sure it would not be satisfactory to the public if the college were maintained on its present footing.

SUPPLY—MISCELLANEOUS ESTIMATES.

House in Committee.

(1). £6,912, British Embassy Houses abroad.

MR. WISE observed, that though the Vote had been assented to by the Committee to which it had been referred, and of which he was a member, he still regarded it as an unsatisfactory one. Fortunately there was little likelihood that the circumstances which had given rise to it would occur again. There had been for a long series of years a profligate expenditure on account of the Embassy House at Paris, but the matter had been thoroughly sifted by the Committee up stairs, and there was reason to hope that the President of the Board of Works would exercise such control and supervision as would prevent the recurrence of similar evils for the future. The Committee had, therefore, looked more to the future than the past, and in their investigation sought to prevent abuses, rather than inculcate the agents of the past. The amount claimed by Mr. Albano, £3,217, for superintending the expenditure of £11,763, was very large; but his presence being required to counteract the systematic imposition which had previously prevailed, the charges were such as he was fairly and professionally entitled to make, and had been sanctioned by Lord Cowley, Lord Clarendon, and by the Board of Works. Mr. Albano had to contend with many difficulties, and with the greatest opposition from the previous Clerk of the Works, and even from the Ambassador's own establishment, one of whom had been permitted to contract for the fuel used at the Embassy, but whose account was reduced from 1,942 francs to 1,458. The valuable plate, which cost several thousand pounds, had been allowed to fall into a neglected state, and upwards of £200 was required to replace what was missing or useless. Mr. Albano, by his supervision, reduced accounts amounting to £8,513 to £6,858, and put a stop to the system of overcharging. Whilst he did justice to Mr. Albano, he must condemn the system which had been pursued by the Board of Works. No proper estimate had been made, money had been paid on account to the architect, and when the expenses had been incurred, Parliament was applied to. He hoped, however, that such irregularities would not occur again. What had taken place with reference to this Embassy, appeared a mystery. In 1815 the Government purchased the house, gardens, stables, and furniture for £36,000. In 1825-6, Messrs. Wyatt and Smirke superintended an outlay of £25,000. In 1843, £8,320 were voted; in 1844, £3,892; in 1853-4, £9,213; and this year £5,078, was required. Besides these sums, an average amount of £1,000 had been expended every year, making a total of £127,503. In 1850, Mr. Burton visited the house, and was of opinion that dilapidation did not exist, and that the premises appeared in a state not unworthy the character of the country; and yet in 1852, Mr. Albano called for £11,763, which, in addition to £3,217 claimed by the architect, makes £14,980 expended within the last three years. And yet, after this outlay, what was the statement made up stairs a few days ago. In reply to questions put to Mr. Albano, he stated that the structure was in such a state that £20,000 would not suffice to put it in proper order; that the timber work was of a most rotten and defective construction; that the doors and windows were rotten, and that there was not a floor upon which he could reckon. This condition of affairs was hardly to be wondered at, when it was considered how little care was bestowed upon the preservation of this species of public property. A striking example of this was presented in the fact, that after the departure of the last Ambassador, the private property of that nobleman was sold at a public auction, which was allowed to be held in the State apartments of the Embassy House, while the costly carpets and satin sofas and chairs were left wholly unprotected from the damage consequent upon an influx of the populace of Paris. The architect found the rooms dirty, the carpets extremely damaged, and stated that he had reported upon the auction as one of the causes of the mischief that ought not to have been allowed. He (Mr. Wise) thought what had occurred in this respect ought to be a lesson to the Government not to purchase Embassy Houses on the Continent. It would be better to make an allowance to the Ambassador of even £2,000 a year extra for a house, than to continue such wasteful expenditure and to incur such uncertain expenses. A portion of this Vote was for the decoration of the dining-room as a chapel. During the last three years £1,600 had been paid for moving the chapel from room to room. He thought it was inconvenient and undesirable to have the service at the Embassy, and he regretted that the offer of the late Bishop Lascombe to sell his chapel in the Rue d'Aguesseau had not been accepted. For one year's annuity of £1,000, the Government would have obtained a chapel that had cost £10,000. The charges incurred for the Embassy House at Madrid offered another instance of the glaring defect of the system that had been pursued at the Board of Works. In 1848 the Government took a lease of an old house for twenty years, and spent £3,000 upon repairs. The rent was £400 a year, but charges were perpetually arising, and Mr. Albano had been twice to Madrid, so that no less a sum than £756 had been paid to that gentleman for travelling expenses and professional allowances, incidental to the superintendence of an expenditure of £574 upon a house that was designated as half-built with mud, with sunken foundations, and in such a state that it might come down any day. He really trusted that this system would be reformed, and that an architect receiving four guineas a day would not be sent to Madrid to superintend such works as had been described.

MR. STAFFORD said, he rose to protest against an insinuation attempted to be cast upon the late Sir William Molesworth, when the present estimate was last before the Committee. Although he had differed in politics from the right hon. Baronet, he could not be silent while an injustice was apparently done to his memory. No doubt a vicious system had hitherto been pursued in the Public Works Department; but a careful examination of the matter had convinced him that no blame whatever for that state of things fairly attached to the late Sir William Molesworth.

SIR BENJAMIN HALL said, that on a former occasion he had certainly alluded to the bad system which prevailed in the office, with which he was connected, for years before he held his present situation, and expressed his determination to put an end to that system; but nothing could have been further from his thoughts than the intention to cast any reflection upon the right hon. Baronet who had preceded him in his department. He was now endeavouring to correct the undoubted defects of the system, and hoped to be able next year to present these estimates in a form that would prove satisfactory to the House.

SIR WILLIAM JOLLIFFE was glad to find that the old system was amended.

MR. HENLEY said, that while it was clear from the Report of the Committee that the business of the office under consideration had been conducted in a very unsatisfactory manner, nothing very definite had been indicated to the Committee which held out a prospect of the future amendment of the system. It appeared that nobody was responsible for whatever happened to the property at the Embassy Houses; and if the whole of their contents were walked away some fine morning, no person, he apprehended, could be held answerable for the loss. It was somewhat extraordinary that private individuals could have buildings erected in Paris without any of the difficulties encountered by those who acted for our Government; and, indeed, the allegations made on that head implied the prevalence, in that gay capital, of an almost universal system of villany where the expenditure of public money was concerned. He hoped to hear from the right hon. Gentleman the First Commissioner of Works what arrangements were contemplated for the future. He certainly thought it quite unnecessary that an architect of eminence should be sent over to Paris merely to superintend the repair of floors and matters of that kind, which might be effected under the direction of a person of very inferior ability.

SIR BENJAMIN HALL said, that as soon as the Session of Parliament closed, he intended to send to Paris one of the officers attached to his department, who would report to him what repairs were required in the structure of the Ambassador's house, and the only expense with which the country would be saddled would be the travelling expenses of that individual. He also intended to appoint a practical man as resident Clerk of the Works at Paris, who would be able to keep the house in repair with the assistance of tradesmen on the spot, and who would not receive a high salary.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he felt sufficient confidence in the right hon. Baronet to believe that under his control an end would be put to the discreditable state of things which had hitherto existed.

ADMIRAL WALCOTT said, he thought the Committee did not look at the architect's expenses fairly. He believed they had been the means of saving money instead of incurring a loss.

Vote agreed to.

(2.) £827, British Protestant Cemetery, Madrid.

MR. WISE observed that this Vote had also been referred to the Select Committee. In 1854, £1,400 had been voted for the purpose of a cemetery, and Mr. Albano had been sent over to Madrid to superintend the building of a small lodge and a wall round the cemetery, on the understanding that he should receive £300 as full compensation for his services and travelling expenses. A few days after Mr. Albano arrived at Madrid the revolution broke out, and he was detained there six weeks. The Government, in consideration of the loss that gentleman sustained in his own business in consequence of his prolonged absence from this country, granted him an additional sum of £470; and although, under the circumstances, he (Mr. Wise) did not complain of that arrangement, he thought works of such insignificance might have been effected under the superintendence of some of the attachés of the embassy, or of the Consul at Madrid. We had at Madrid a Minister, a Secretary of Legation, several Attachés, and a Consul, who had little to do; and surely, if we employed our Minister and consuls in the United States in recruiting, it would not be unreasonable to ask our representative at Madrid to employ some local architect and inspect the building of a wall round the cemetery. The Committee upstairs had assented to this Vote as a fair compensation, but whilst they thought the charges reasonable, they thought it most unreasonable to send a person like Mr. Albano all the way to Madrid, merely to superintend the building of a wall round an acre of ground and of a lodge at the entrance to the cemetery.

COLONEL NORTH said, it appeared from the Vote now before the Committee that the pay of the permanent staff of the militia was to be considerably reduced, and that the non-commissioned officers who had for the last two or three years been occupying very responsible positions were, as a reward for their services, to receive diminished pay. The pay of these non-commissioned officers had been—for a sergeant-major, 3s. a day; quartermaster sergeant, 2s. 6d.; colour sergeant, 2s. 5d.; sergeant, 1s. 10d. It appeared that, in future, the sergeant-majors were to receive only 1s. 10d., the quartermaster sergeants 1s. 8d., the colour sergeants and sergeants 1s. 6d. Now, if that plan were carried out the country would be in the same position in which it was at the time the militia were embodied two years ago, when there was not a militia staff throughout the kingdom worthy of the name of soldiers. The members of that staff received such trifling pay, that most of them had been compelled to become petty dealers, and trafficked almost as hucksters. Now, the non-commissioned officers, during the last two years, had in the discharge of their duties given the utmost satisfaction to their commanding officers. Hon. Gentlemen were aware that they could not get what were called "hedge carpenters or hedge masons" to work on their estates for less than 3s. or 3s. 6d. a day, and yet it was proposed to give men who were persons of education, and who had filled most responsible situations, the miserable pittance of 1s. 10d. a day for performing duties of a most important and responsible nature. If that plan were carried out, could they expect, when the services of the militia were again required, to find in its ranks men worthy to fill the position of non-commissioned officers? He thought that every man who wore the uniform of the army ought to be placed under the orders of the Commander in Chief; but when the militia were embodied two years ago the officers who applied for instructions to the Home Secretary were referred by that right hon. Gentleman to the Horse Guards; they were sent by the Commander in Chief to the War Department, and months passed before they were able to obtain any instructions. At length a most able officer, Colonel Pierrepont, was appointed assistant adjutant general of the militia force. That officer had given universal satisfaction, but now, having filled the position for two years, and having become fully conversant with all the details of the office, he had received notice that the appointment was to be discontinued. In the case of the permanent staff of the militia no one but the full colonel could interfere with the adjutant; and the lieutenant colonel who had commanded a regiment for five years might, the day after it was disembodied, be refused admission to the barracks by the adjutant. He would ask hon. Members whether that was a state of things which should be longer allowed to exist? The next point to which he would call the attention of the Government was the position of the quartermasters. In some regiments quartermasters had been appointed, but in others the duty had been done by subalterns, who received an extra allowance, and only those men who had been commissioned as quartermasters were now to be placed on the permanent staff. There were some cases in which quartermasters had resigned and done the duty as subalterns, in order to receive double pay, and those men must of course be satisfied with the arrangement; but surely men who had refused the appointment of quartermaster because their commanding officers wished to have the benefit of their services as subalterns ought to be placed on the permanent staff. He understood that in future there were to be two sergeants to a company, but he would suggest that the number should be increased to three, or that there should be one sergeant and two corporals. If that extension of the permanent staff was not approved of there ought at all events to be an orderly clerk, an armourer, a sergeant-major, and a drum or bugle major to every regiment. The counties at present were obliged to find quarters for half the staff, and he wanted to know what was to become of the other half if they were to be allowed no billet-money. The militia ought to have the same advantages with regard to the price of rations as the line. He would next call the attention of the Government to some of the regulations respecting non-commissioned officers in the army. A corporal who had obtained three or four good service badges lost his 1*d.* a day for each of those badges directly he became a sergeant. In consequence of that rule, a corporal had refused his offer to be appointed sergeant, because his responsibility would be increased and his remuneration diminished. A sergeant's pay in the infantry was £2 17*s.* 6*d.* a month, a corporal's £2 2*s.* 6*d.* The deductions from the corporal's pay were £1, leaving him £1 2*s.* 6*d.*; and the deductions from the sergeants were £1 7*s.* 9*d.*, leaving him £1 9*s.* 9*d.* But if the corporal had four good-conduct badges, he received, in addition to his pay, 10*s.*, in all £1 12*s.* 6*d.*, while the sergeant only received £1 9*s.* 9*d.* In the case of a sergeant in the cavalry the injustice was still greater, for, while a corporal with four badges received £1 18*s.* 9*d.* per month, a sergeant received only £1 3*s.* 3*d.* There was not a more worthy class of men in Her Majesty's dominions than the non-commissioned officers of the army, and they ought not to be treated in that manner. He therefore hoped the Under Secretary of War would be able to give some satisfactory explanation with respect to this gross injustice.

MR. PELLATT said, he was glad the subject had been fairly brought before the Committee for the injustice was so great as to call for immediate redress. No class of men were so ill paid as the officers that had been referred to. Out of their small pay the sergeants had to pay 5*d.* a day for clothing, against 2*d.* a day paid by a corporal. Some of the latter, in consequence of good-conduct marks, as has been stated, get more daily pay than sergeants.

MR. FREDERICK PEELE said, his hon. and gallant Friend (Colonel North) seemed not to be aware that the rate of pay of the disembodied militia was different from that of the embodied militia. When embodied, all ranks received the same rate of pay as the army; but when disembodied, the pay of the various ranks was not the same, and if we were to pay the staff of the disembodied militia the same as the embodied, it would follow as a necessary consequence that all ranks of the militia would claim to be paid the same. [Colonel NORTH: So they are.] No, that was a mistake. If it were so, the disembodied militia would cost a much greater sum than they now did. They had other sources of income besides their disembodied pay. Most of them received pay in the line, or pensions for their services in the line; and he saw no objection to a non-commissioned officer pursuing a trade in those intervals of time which were not required for military duty. An objection had been made as to the department by whom authority should be exercised over the militia when disembodied. When embodied it was under the authority of the Horse Guards; but when disembodied it was considered to be a sort of Parliamentary or constitutional force, and not a portion of the army. He did not see what advantage would arise from transferring it to the authority of the Horse Guards. The advantage of inspection had been referred to; but if the colonel of a militia regiment thought it necessary he could apply to the Horse Guards for an officer to make a periodical inspection; and he (Mr. Peel) should be very glad if, by that or any other means, the military spirit of the country could be kept alive. He had already stated the course which the Government intended to take as to quartermasters. Where they found a commissioned officer in the actual performance of duties, he would be placed upon the permanent staff. Had not that been done, those officers would have been left without any provision at all. It was very easy to say that they ought to increase the number of the permanent staff of the militia; but unless very cogent reasons were assigned for that recommendation it would be impossible for the Government to agree to it. He did not believe that, under the present system, the duties to be performed by the permanent staff were more than would occupy the time of those already on the staff. Complaint was made by the hon. Member for Oxfordshire (Colonel North) that, under the present law, counties were compelled to provide quarters for half the permanent staff; but that was perfectly optional with the magistrates, for they might decline to provide anything beyond a secure store-house. But the permanent staff were, however, entitled to be billeted just the same as if the regiment were in an embodied state. He should be glad if the billet-money could be collected and applied to the supply of permanent quarters. It was said that there ought to be a drum or bugle-major on the permanent staff. He did not know exactly what would be the duties of drum-major in a disembodied regiment; but if it were merely to instruct the drummers, they might take the most expert of those and let him instruct the others, and with respect to the appointment of a sergeant-armourer there was at present a weekly sum allowed for the repair of arms. As to the subject referred to by the hon. Member for Southwark (Mr. Pellatt), he thought it quite impossible that a corporal should receive more than a sergeant. The pay of the one was 1s. 10d., of the other 1s. 4d. a day; and if a private served for thirty years, he would only then get on a level in pay with the sergeant. The regulation as to clothing had nothing whatever to do with the question. A sergeant was allowed, on retiring from the army, to add to his pension any additional pay which he might have earned as a private or corporal for good conduct, and in addition, to count his sergeant's services for extra pay. Supposing that a sergeant had served ten years as a private or a corporal, and received 2d. a day additional, and that he had served ten years as a sergeant, when he retired he would be entitled to add more pence to his pension on that account. It did seem a hardship to mulct the man in respect to his clothing; and he would certainly take that subject into consideration.

COLONEL NORTH said, he wished to know whether those members of the militia staff, to whom it seemed it would be open to sell and huckster, would be allowed to do so in uniform or not?

MR. FREDERICK PEEL was understood to say that in accordance with the regulations which had hitherto existed, those soldiers to whom the hon. and gallant Member referred were required to appear in uniform only upon certain days.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON said, he considered that it was absolutely impossible to maintain a body of men in a state of military efficiency upon an amount of pay which was less than that which the humblest labourers received. Many of those men who were to be retained upon the militia staff had, owing to their good conduct, risen from the rank of privates; and it was certainly no adequate return for that good conduct to place them upon a footing which would preclude them from being able to keep up even a military appearance. It was, however, said that those men might add to their resources by pursuing some trade; but he for one thought it a matter well worthy of consideration, whether in acting upon that principle they would be taking the best course to secure the services of an efficient body of soldiers, and whether it would not be better rather to diminish the number of the militia staff, and maintain their military appearance and discipline, than to keep up a larger number and lose sight in a great degree of considerations so important. There was another matter which he thought was well deserving of the attention of the Committee, it was, whether it was not desirable to place upon an equality, upon the score of pay, the sergeant who happened to have entered the militia as a private, and who, by his good conduct, had gained for himself his present position, and the man who happened, in consequence of his having been in the army before, to have entered as a sergeant, and who was entitled to a pension for his former services? He did not wish for a moment that the latter should be deprived of one penny of that pension. All he desired was, that the inequality which must necessarily now exist between the two classes of men with respect to pay should be removed, and that the merit of the former in rising by their good conduct to the same rank as their fellow sergeants should be duly recognised. He also was of opinion that the Government ought to supply provisions to the soldiers of the militia staff at contract price.

COLONEL BUCK said, he was extremely gratified to find that the services of the militia had met with the warm approbation both of that House and of the country. They were, he thought, deserving of that approbation; and not the less so because while during the last war the men had been balloted for, the present militia force had been composed entirely of volunteers. That circumstance had entailed upon the officers a much greater amount of anxiety and of labour than they had under the old system been subjected to; but notwithstanding all the difficulties with which they had had to contend, the militia regiments had not only been filled, but in many cases—and in that of his own regiment among the number—the complement of men had been doubled, the places of those who had volunteered into the line having been filled up as soon as they had been vacated. Having said thus much of the readiness with which volunteers had come forward, he would now beg to call the attention of the Committee to the disadvantages of making the Lord Lieutenant of the county colonel of a regiment in the case in which there happened to be two or three regiments of militia as in his (Colonel Buck's) own county. The interests of the regiment of which the Lord Lieutenant was colonel might be distinct from those of another regiment belonging to the same county, and the consequence would be that the interests of the one might in some instances be postponed to those of the other. The Lord Lieutenant should not, therefore, in his opinion, be placed in a position in which favour or bias should be supposed to actuate his decisions with respect to that arm of the service over which, when in a disembodied state, he exercised so extensive a control. In illustration of the disadvantages of that policy he might observe, that while the South Devon militia was No. 25 on the list of militia regiments, the East Devon being No. 41, the Lord Lieutenant of the county having been colonel of the latter regiment, had authority conferred upon him to give to it that precedence to which, in accordance with military regulations, the former was entitled. By some jugglery the latter regiment was now called the 1st Devon, and the former, which by age and position on the list had the precedence, the 2nd Devon. Now that, he must contend, was a system of jobbing which must operate very injuriously upon the efficiency of the service, and which should not be resorted to out of considerations of deference to any individual, however high might be his position. Such considerations, however, were but too frequently found to prevail, and that such was the case had upon more than one occasion come within the scope of his own experience. Lord Mount Edgcumbe, for instance, had been permitted to interfere very materially with the efficiency of the militia artillery practice at Devonport—a subject in connection with which he (Colonel Buck) had moved for certain Returns, which had formed the topic of a conversation at an interview which he had had with the right hon. Gentleman the Clerk of the Ordnance. One of the papers in question was a letter which had been written by Lord Mount Edgcumbe, complaining of the artillery practice which had been carried on within two miles of his house, greatly to his annoyance, and at a spot adjacent to some property upon which it was his intention to build. Such was the usual mode in which a contemplated job was introduced to the notice of the Government. In the instance to which he referred it had emanated from a great man—Lord Mount Edgcumbe, and had been backed by the influence of a still greater man—Lord Lansdowne. While calling the attention of the Committee to that circumstance he might be permitted to congratulate those with whom he had the honour to act, that it was not a nobleman of the Tory party whose assistance had either been solicited or obtained in the matter, but an experienced Whig nobleman whom the Tory nobleman selected to assist him. But to proceed, the letter of Lord Mount Edgcumbe had been submitted to Lord Panmure and to the colonel of the Royal Artillery at Devonport, and the result had been that the acquiescence of both those distinguished individuals having been obtained, the artillery practice, at the spot at which Lord Mount Edgcumbe had objected to its being held, had been put an end to. He (Colonel Buck) having complained to the Clerk of the Ordnance of the injury which had thus been done to the public service, had had his objections to it laid, in the first place, before the colonel of Artillery at Devonport, and, in the next place, before Lord Panmure, both of whom had previously acquiesced in the representations of Lord Mount Edgcumbe, and the consequence had been, as might very naturally have been anticipated, that they had adhered to their original views in the matter. Indeed, he hardly knew of an instance in which objections such as he had advanced had been so dealt with before, except, perhaps, in the case of the proceedings of the other House of Parliament, in which the Lord Chancellor was at present sitting to try an appeal from his own decision. The result of that success of Lord Mount Edgcumbe's representations had been, that the militia artillery had been driven to practice at Drake's Island, which was three-quarters of a mile from the shore; and from that island had been obliged to go to the citadel, which was at a still more considerable distance. Now, there were many objections to prosecuting artillery practice at the citadel, one of the most important being that the range for firing was across the harbour of Devonport, thus causing the practice to be attended with considerable danger and delay, owing to the constant sailing of vessels into and out of that harbour. That view of the case was fully borne out by the major of the regiment to which he had the honour to belong—a man who had served under the Duke of Wellington, and whose testimony was entitled to the utmost consideration; and the consequence of the whole transaction had been that much valuable time for practice was lost to the militia artillery, and of course the efficiency of the service so far impaired. Another subject which he deemed to be well worthy of the consideration of the Committee was the state of our fortifications, which at Devonport, as well as elsewhere, he believed to be in a very imperfect condition. The Government authorities were at present engaged in completing, at an enormous cost, what were called the lines at Devonport. Now, it appeared that the late Duke of Wellington had given it as his opinion that those lines would be wholly useless, and the works had in consequence been discontinued until within the last two or three years, when they had been resumed. But a general impression still prevailed that they could be of no use to keep any people out of Devonport except the inhabitants of Plymouth. He hoped that a Committee would as soon as possible be appointed to inquire into the state of the defences of this country, and that the commission would not consist exclusively of engineers, but would also embrace officers in the marine artillery, captains in the navy, and scientific men, such as Mr. Fergusson. Before resuming his seat he should allude to the condition of Fort Biddlecombe. He had every reason to believe that that fort would be useless for defensive purposes. It was exactly such a work as one might expect to see on the stage of a theatre, and it was said that the reason why it had been so constructed was that Lord Mount Edgcumbe, on whose property it was built, required that it should be of an ornamental character. He would not trespass any further on the time of the Committee, but he would venture to express a hope that the noble Lord at the head of the Government would give the best consideration in his power to the observations he (Colonel Buck) had felt it his duty to make upon that occasion.

MR. MONSELL said, it was the opinion of Sir John Burgoyne that the fort at Biddlecombe, which the hon. and gallant Member had so severely criticised, was one very admirably adapted for the purpose for which it had been constructed; and it was impossible for the agents of the Government not to act upon the opinion of Sir John Burgoyne in preference to that of the hon. and gallant Gentleman in such a matter. It was true that there was some ornamental work on it, in consequence of Lord Mount Edgcumbe, who had given permission to have it built in his park, having required that it should wear a more or less ornamental aspect; but it was by no means unreasonable that the noble Lord should have insisted on such a condition. With regard to the lines at Devonport, he had to observe that the hon. and gallant Gentleman was in that case also directly at variance with the high authority of Sir John Burgoyne, who had decidedly recommended that the works should be proceeded with. In reference to the removal of the artillery practice from one point to another, he readily admitted that in such a case the convenience of a Peer ought no more to be consulted than that of anybody else, and that no distinction ought to be made between one class of Her Majesty's subjects and another. When a complaint had been made by Lord Mount Edgcumbe of the inconvenience which he and his family suffered from the practice of firing at a particular spot, that complaint had been referred to the Director General of Artillery, who, in his turn, had referred it to the consideration of the commanding officer of artillery at Devonport; and the latter officer, after having carefully inquired into the matter, had given it as his opinion that no injury would arise to the public service from the removal of the practice to another spot. Of course, the commanding officer of artillery was not infallible any more than any one else. The views of the hon. and gallant Member on this subject certainly had not been adopted; but that circumstance gave him no right to talk as he had done of gross jobs, or to make the most unfounded charges against a department which, in this instance, had only followed its usual course of seeking the best advice, and then acting upon it. If the hon. and gallant Officer could suggest a better plan than the one that had been pursued, the department would feel extremely obliged to him; but he ought to remember that a bad case could never be mended by the flinging about of random and unjust imputations.

COLONEL GILPIN said, he had to complain that the paymasters were about to be treated in what he considered a very unfair manner on the occasion of the disembodiment of the militia. The subalterns, generally, were to be dismissed with a gratuity of six months' pay; but the paymasters, who had imposed upon them peculiar responsibilities, and who had to incur a peculiar expenditure, would be employed three months longer than other officers, and would then be dismissed with a gratuity of only three months' pay. It seemed to him to be manifest that the fact that they had extra duty to discharge, with the usual pay during the period they were fulfilling that duty, ought not to disqualify them from receiving the six months' gratuity on the occasion of the cessation of their labours.

MR. FREDERICK PEEL said, that the treatment of the paymasters and of the subalterns was only different in terms. The paymasters, from the special nature of their engagements, would be employed three months after the disembodiment of the militia, for the adjustment of their accounts, and would then receive a gratuity of three months' pay. They would thus receive as large an amount as the subaltern from the moment the disembodiment took place.

COLONEL GILPIN said, it was not the less true that the paymasters would receive only a gratuity of three months' pay from the period at which their work was to cease.

COLONEL NORTH said, he thought the position of captains of militia was one of peculiar hardship. [A laugh.] Hon. Gentlemen might laugh, but it was no laughing matter for the officers themselves. The regulation respecting the property qualification of militia officers had been relaxed, and the Government had availed themselves in that force of the experience of officers who had been for five years in Her Majesty's service. Those officers had toiled incessantly for the last two years to bring the militia into an efficient state, and, he believed, in consequence of the expenses they had incurred from the injury done to arms by recruits, and from other circumstances, there was hardly a captain of militia who would not retire from the service with a pecuniary loss of at least £50.

MR. COWAN said, he thought the adjutants in the militia had special grievances to complain of. They were the only officers whose families were entitled to no pensions, and they had no allowance made to them for their outfits. But he had risen principally for the purpose of referring to another topic. Some three months ago he had brought forward a Motion against the system of billeting in Scotland, on which the Government had been defeated. He hoped they would immediately proceed to adopt measures for carrying out the Resolution of the House upon that subject, and that they would relieve the people of Scotland from what was felt to be a very great grievance.

SIR WILLIAM JOLLIFFE said, he believed it was generally admitted that the militia had during the last eighteen months rendered very important service to the country, and he thought that the present time was a very favourable one for making a liberal recognition of their merits. He regretted to hear it stated on the part of the Government that the members of the militia staff, which was still to be maintained, should depend mainly for their subsistence on what they could earn in addition to their pay. It appeared to him that it would be both wise and becoming on the part of the State to place them in a more independent position. There was another point to which he also wished to direct the attention of the Committee. It had been stated by the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for War that it was the duty of the Lords Lieutenant of counties to order the training of the militia. But the Act required, as he understood it, that the training of the militia should be undertaken under an Order in Council, and that the Lords Lieutenant should merely determine what were to be the precise time and district at which it was to take place. No Order in Council had been issued upon the subject last year, and he found that only thirteen regiments had been trained in the course of that year, and that at an expense of £10,379, which was about £4 8s. per man.

MR. FREDERICK PEEL said, the Act required that the Lords Lieutenant should appoint, with the approbation of the Crown, the time and place at which the exercise of the militia should take place.

SIR WILLIAM JOLLIFFE said, that the Lords Lieutenant had the power of fixing the time and place at which the training was to be undertaken, but the order for the training ought to issue from the Queen in Council.

MR. FREDERICK PEEL said, he was aware of that. Each regiment should be trained once a year, and he imagined that the object of the Act was to leave it to the Lords Lieutenant to decide what were to be the time and the locality at which the trainings were to take place, because they were naturally the best judges of what would suit the convenience of the men in reference to those points. Of course, if the Lord Lieutenant did not order any training within the year, it would be the duty of the Government to see that the provisions of the Act were enforced.

SIR JOHN BULLER said, the discussion on the present Vote had been of a very diversified character, and on some of the points alluded to he had a remark or two to offer. In the first place, he felt bound to express his opinion that the works on the lines at Devonport touched on by his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Barnstaple (Colonel Buck), notwithstanding the authority of the name of Sir John Burgoyne, were the greatest absurdity ever witnessed. There was a story at Plymouth that the Duke of Wellington saw the lines in operation, that he spoke to the people employed there on the subject, that he then went to luncheon, that the people went to their dinners, and that they never returned, and the work was never resumed. To re-open them, therefore, would be to throw away money. Then, of all the miserable arrangements ever heard of, those at Fort Biddlecombe, for the supply of water, were the most miserable. There was a small tank to catch the rain water, but it would not catch enough for 200 men, and when the pump was used, the liquid came up unfit for use. Besides which, he understood that the guns could not be sufficiently depressed to be serviceable. He wished, before resuming his seat, to call the attention of the Government to the system of billeting. He did not see how to get rid of it on the march; but unquestionably, where possible, the system should be dispensed with, and the men relieved from the disagreeable position in which they were now placed. Nothing could be worse than placing very young men—drummers, for instance, and very young sergeants—in common public-houses when up for their twenty-eight days' training, or when called out for service; and if the Government could allow the young men to have lodgings, or to provide for themselves, instead of being placed in the public-houses, they would do that for which the men and boys would be thankful. In their disembodied state there were no officers to look after them except the adjutant, who, at the utmost, could muster them only once or twice a day; and the rest of the time they were under no restraint. He would not venture to describe the state of things to which he himself had been an eye-witness at Plymouth. He quite concurred in the opinion of hon. Members who had preceded him, that the paymasters would be treated unfairly if they were to receive a gratuity of only three months' pay after the termination of their labours. The adjutant was a permanent officer of the staff, always with his regiment, and if he were active and looked after the interests of the militia and recruiting, he would have quite enough to occupy his time. He (Sir J. Buller) therefore thought that his claim for an additional rate of pay was worthy of being taken into consideration by the Government. He had no doubt the subject would be well considered by the Secretary for War, but inasmuch as the office of adjutant was permanent, his claims might be brought under notice on a future occasion. Attention had been called to the captains of the militia. As that force was constituted, generally the captains were gentlemen of landed property, possessing ample qualification, and who did not, therefore, he thought, have a very powerful claim for additional remuneration on the Government. There was a contingent fund, and if they did their duty there was hardly any case in which that fund was not able to cover the demand. But there was another class of militia captains, young men holding commissions in the line who had come forward to assist in training the militia, in the hope that by doing that essential service to the country they might push their own fortunes. That class, he thought, had a claim upon the Government, because, on many occasions, they were forced into an expenditure beyond their means; and having come at the request, at least, of the Government to help in drilling the militia, they were certainly entitled to some consideration on the part of the Government, which he hoped would be shown to them.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON said, he wished to call the attention of the noble Lord at the head of the Government to the fact, that in consequence of the accounts having to pass the War Office it was not always possible for the paymaster to settle the matter within three months, and it would be very hard that they should be deprived of the month's bonus, because it might very well happen that they would have to work very hard after they had sent in all their accounts in checking and making the disallowances ordered. They had also to find securities, which in some cases could not be obtained without money, so that, in addition to the loss of their pay, they would lose the interest of the money expended by them.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he could assure the Committee that the Government were fully sensible of the great public utility and value of the militia, and were most desirous that the militia should be kept in such a condition as to fully meet the purpose for which it was established. Any fair liberality to the officers on being disembodied would be entirely in accordance with the wishes of the Government. With regard to the paymasters, if their accounts were properly kept, the duty of settling those accounts would not be a very hard one, and they could correspond with the War Office, as well from one place as another, so that they could select their residence where they pleased. The Government were quite sensible of the great value of the artillery branch of the militia. Indeed, he might take some credit to himself on that account, because as it was his duty as Home Secretary to arrange the distribution of the corps, when the militia was formed, he, for the first time, established a large number of artillery regiments, amounting, for the whole of the United Kingdom, to, he believed, between 16,000 and 18,000 men. No doubt they were a most valuable corps, and, having had access to the returns of practice, he was aware that the regiment alluded to by the hon. and gallant Member for Barnstaple (Colonel Buck) had shown great efficiency; indeed, he believed no part of the regular artillery had displayed greater efficiency. With regard to the forts and lines at Plymouth, he thought gentlemen were mistaken in the opinion they entertained as to the difficulty of completing those lines. The matter had received great attention, not only from Sir John Burgoyne, but from Her Majesty's Government in consultation with him, and the Government came to the conclusion that the whole extent of those defences should be completed, and that, with a view to defence from a particular quarter, they would form a very valuable addition. As to the fort to the seaward of Mount Edgcumbe, Fort Biddlecombe, he had been within it, and he could not imagine upon what ground it could be pretended that guns could not be fired from it. The engineers who constructed it, so far from thinking there was anything to prevent it being usefully employed, believed that, from the manner the guns were placed near the line of water, and from other circumstances, it would be a very valuable addition to the defences which commanded the entrance to the Sound on that side of the Breakwater. With regard to billeting in Scotland, alluded to by the hon. Member for Edinburgh (Mr. Cowan), he wished to state that, in consequence of the vote of the House, the Government contemplated introducing a provision into the Mutiny Act of next year, placing Scotland on the same footing as England—namely, that it should no longer be in the power of the Government to billet troops on private houses, and that billeting should apply to public-houses only. The hon. Baronet the Member for South Devonshire (Sir J. Buller) wished to carry that exemption further. He quite agreed with the hon. Baronet, that, consistently with a due regard to the public service, it was impossible altogether to exempt public-houses from the liability to receive billets, and that the military service of the country could not be carried on without recourse to billets. But it was unquestionably true that it was very undesirable to billet troops, and more especially militia and young troops in public-houses if it could be avoided. When he was at the Home Office he received great complaints from the keepers of public-houses in one part of Yorkshire on the conduct of the militia quartered on them. They said that in former times they made a very good profit out of the drinking of militiamen, but that the present militiamen were so very sober that they made nothing out of them, and were losers by the sum allowed as compensation by the Government. That showed, however, that the conduct of the militia was not affected in Yorkshire by the temptation of billets, as seemed to be the case in Plymouth. The Committee would see that there were only two methods of providing for troops—either in barracks, or by encampment. The construction of barracks he considered to be a most important object to which the attention of the House of Commons ought to be directed, and the assistance of Parliament ought to be afforded. But, at the same time, the object could not be accomplished without a very large expense, when it was remembered how desirable it was to raise the character and condition of the soldier by the construction of barracks on improved principles, which would give means for classification and healthful exercise. That would increase the expense; but he could assure the Committee as far as the means of putting troops, whether militia or regulars, in barracks existed, the Government would avail themselves of those means, because it was desirable, in the first place, for the sake of the discipline of the army, and, in the next, for the sake of relieving innkeepers from the burden of which they complained. He need scarcely say that the various suggestions which had been thrown out in the course of the discussion would receive the attention of Her Majesty's Government. With regard to the permanent staff of the militia, the great object was to retain that number of non-commissioned officers which was necessary to take charge of the arms and clothing during the period the regiments were not assembled for training, and not to go beyond that, because whatever attention was paid by the adjutant, he had not the same means of keeping a small number of sergeants up to the military point which existed with regard to regiments embodied or assembled for training. It was important that sergeants should not lose their efficiency, and it appeared to him the better course would be to have no larger permanent staff than was absolutely necessary; and that, when the militia regiments were called out for training, they should have the advantage of drill sergeants from the regiments of the line, who would bring with them the latest improvements and the full spirit of military smartness, and if at any future time it should become necessary to embody the militia, sergeants could be taken by promotion from the smartest and best men in the line. With respect to armourer-sergeants he was inclined to believe that respectable gunmakers could be found to keep the arms in better repair than any armourer-sergeant. The Government had, he conceived, shown that they were disposed to treat the subject with as much liberality as was consistent with a due regard to economy, and he could assure the Committee that the Government was deeply sensible of the great value of the services of the militia, and of the devotion to the public interests displayed by its officers in sacrificing convenience and comfort for service at home and abroad for the benefit of the country. With regard to the question of training, it was true that it rested with the Lords Lieutenant to fix the time and place of assembly, but undoubtedly it was for the Secretary of State to intimate to the Lords Lieutenant that their particular regiments were to be called out for training during a certain period. Last year, however, the greater part of the militia was embodied, and it was quite possible that with respect to some of those regiments that were not embodied there might have been doubts between the Lord Lieutenant and the public department as to the period for calling them out, and that some of the regiments might have been overlooked.

SIR JOHN BULLER said that, with regard to paymasters, they were required to send in their accounts signed by the commanding officer and the adjutant, and accompanied by a declaration before a magistrate that they had been examined in the presence of all three parties.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, the paymaster was to send in his accounts as soon as possible after they were made up, and the only duty remaining after that was corresponding with the Departments in respect to any disallowances of sums charged in those accounts.

SIR JOHN BULLER said, that the paymaster could not leave head-quarters until he had prepared the accounts, and had them signed by the commanding officer and the adjutant.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, there had been a former Vote of £1,010,000, and he assumed that that amount could not possibly be expended on the embodied militia, for some 40,000 men, or thereabouts, for a period not exceeding four months. There was an item of £18,500 for enrolling and attesting 20,000 men.

Surely they did not expect to raise 20,000 militiamen in the course of the present year. Then, again, there was a large sum for half-pay or retired allowances for no less than 2,999 lieutenants and sixty-six ensigns. He wished to know if that was to be a permanent charge, or a charge for the current year only.

MR. FREDERICK PEEL said, the amount voted for the army was not applicable to the disembodied militia. More than half of that sum of £288,000, namely, £180,000 was to provide for the pay and allowances of the permanent staff of the disembodied militia. Every regiment of militia ought, as a matter of rule, to be trained and exercised once in every year, but they intended during the present year only to call out these that had not been embodied, and it was provided in the estimate that they should be trained for a period of forty-two days. With regard to the bounty for raising 20,000 men, as the militia men were only enlisted for a period of five years, of course a number were continually receiving their discharge, and it was calculated that for the present year it would be requisite to raise 20,000 men in order to supply the deficiency. With regard to the half pay, it was for old allowances, and those lieutenants and ensigns were those who were in the late war.

COLONEL DUNNE said, that with respect to the observation that the officers of the militia would be satisfied with the liberality of the Government, he must say that he was far from contented with the lavish expenditure of the Government. The noble Lord (the First Minister of the Crown) had told them that they were to have a staff who were to do nothing but take care of the arms. It was monstrous that the sum of £288,000 should be thrown away for that purpose. Forty years' experience had proved the inutility of that staff, and what was required was a new organisation. In thirty years £8,000,000, and in forty years £11,000,000 had been spent on those useless staffs of militia. It was, he considered, so much money thrown away. He thought the training of the twenty regiments alluded to would be also money thrown away. In the meanwhile there was a large force of foreign legions doing nothing, though they cost £58 per man. Those troops were brought to Aldershot, whereas they ought to have been disbanded; or if not, they ought to be kept on the edge of the country, according to the promise of the Government when the foreign legion was raised. He would give every assistance to any financial reformer who would seek to rectify those abuses.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he must explain that he did not say the militia staff had nothing to do, but that it was not desirable to retain a larger number of sergeants than necessary, and that when they were embodied it was better to make up the number by soldiers from the line.

House resumed.

WILLS AND ADMINISTRATIONS (STAMPS).

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Question [2nd July]—

"That the Resolution 'That it is expedient to authorise the collection, by means of Stamps, of the Fees to be payable in Her Majesty's Court of Probate and Administration, and the Testamentary and District Offices to be established by any Act of the present Session relating to Wills and Administrations,' be now read a second time."

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

Question put, and agreed to.

Resolution read 2°, and agreed to.

WILLS AND ADMINISTRATIONS BILL.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair."

MR. HENLEY said, he wished to make a few observations on the position in which the Bill now stood. He had been unable, through indisposition, to be present when the subject was last discussed, on which occasion the House, he thought, took a somewhat unusual course. A Bill was then read a second time which nobody intended to proceed with, and which was so read on the clear understanding, that as soon as that operation should be duly performed, the measure was to vanish, and another to accomplish the same end, but differing wholly in its details, was forthwith to be substituted. Accordingly the Bill now before the House was as different as chalk from cheese from that originally introduced by the hon. and learned Solicitor General. He should say that the transmogrification was the result of what he might almost call a sort of illicit intercourse between the hon. and learned Member for East Suffolk (Sir F. Kelly) and the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (the Solicitor General). When the hon. and learned Gentleman brought in the Bill it did not contain the name of the Court of Chancery, because, as the hon. and learned Gentleman was well aware, that name had no very good repute in the House of Commons. The hon. and learned Gentleman, therefore, with considerable adroitness, originally proposed to constitute a Court with all the powers and without the name of the Court of Chancery; but his (Mr. Henley's) hon. and learned Friend the Member for East Suffolk (Sir F. Kelly), who had a great dislike to the Court of Chancery, refused to have anything to do with the Bill, unless some other sort of Court were substituted for that Court. The clause by which the Court was constituted now conferred upon it all the powers at first proposed by the hon. and learned Gentleman, and the powers of a Court of Common Law besides. The powers now to be given to it were sufficiently large to make it a tribunal of any sort or size, and they were left entirely in the dark as to what was to be its practice or procedure. Rules for its regulation were to be framed by the Judge, subject to the approbation of the Lord Chancellor, the Lords Justices, the Master of the Rolls, and the Chief Justices of the Common Law Courts; and whether it would turn out to be a Court of Common Law, as his hon. and learned Friend the Member for East Suffolk said, or a Court of Chancery, according to the wish of the hon. and learned Gentleman (the Solicitor General) no one could tell. The present Bill, too, dealt a great deal more with the subject of real property than the original Bill of the hon. and learned Gentleman; it went even further, he apprehended, than the recommendations of the Commissioners; but remembering that not many years ago a measure had been shipwrecked in another place upon that very ground, he doubted whether that part of it would facilitate its progress through Parliament. He was willing and anxious that the law should be so altered that, when probate had been granted to any instrument dealing with either real or personal property, everything within the four corners of that instrument should be concluded by the judgment of the Court which granted probate; double litigation upon the same instrument ought not to be necessary, but he did not think it would be prudent to go further and to risk the loss of a good measure by dealing with real property to a greater extent than was required, in order to get rid of the evils of the present system. Another great and very beneficial change in the Bill was that which extended the jurisdiction to country districts. No measure which did not enable people to get their own business done in their own neighbourhood would have a chance of, or even deserved, success. But he felt a difficulty as to going into Committee that evening, and, from some observations of the right hon. Baronet opposite (Sir J. Graham) the other night, he thought the proposal he was about to make to obviate that difficulty, would probably meet with the right hon. Gentleman's sanction. It would be quite impossible at that hour (a quarter to eleven) to make any great progress with the Bill, and they certainly could not discuss it with any advantage until the question of the constitution of the House of Lords, as a Court of Appeal, had been in some way or other settled. It was proposed to give suitors in the new Court the option of a double appeal; they would be able either to go, in the first instance, to the Lords Justices, and then to the House of Lords, or to go direct to the House of Lords, if they so wished it. Surely that proposition could not be properly considered; no sound decision upon it could be arrived at, unless they knew how the Appellate Court of the House of Lords was for the future to be constituted, and whether it would be constituted in a manner that would give confidence to the public, and enable them to resort to it without being put to a ruinous expense. If the Court of ultimate Appeal could be reached at a moderate expense, it might, perhaps, be desirable to have no intermediate Court of Appeal. He would, therefore, ask the House, to postpone going into Committee until after Monday, when the Appellate Jurisdiction Bill would be brought under their consideration. Another reason for postponement was, that he had learned, through those indirect channels from which they sometimes obtained information, that the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General intended to propose still further alterations. For these reasons he earnestly hoped that the House would agree to his Motion not to go into Committee until after they had considered the Appellate Jurisdiction Bill.

MR. SPEAKER: I must inform the right hon. Gentleman that the Motion can not be put in that form.

MR. HENLEY said, he would then move that the House resolve itself in Committee on Tuesday next.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House will, upon Tuesday next, resolve itself into the said Committee," instead thereof.

MR. COLLIER said, he hoped that the Committee on the Bill would not be postponed; the question, as to whether the appeal should be given to the House of Lords or to the Privy Council was one which might easily be discussed at a subsequent stage of the measure, and, reserving that question, it would be very desirable to proceed at once with the measure.

MR. MONTAGU CHAMBERS said, he thought that the House was wasting a great deal of time, inasmuch as there was not the slightest prospect of carrying the measure, which was one of the greatest importance, to a satisfactory conclusion during the present Session. The Bill was one formed from the combination of three other Bills, and, if the Committee upon it were postponed until Tuesday next, Gentlemen who were interested in those three Bills would be able to determine whether it would be possible to proceed with it during the present Session, and he hoped, therefore, that the proposal of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Henley) would be acceded to.

MR. ATHERTON said, he sincerely hoped that the House would consent to go at once into Committee upon the Bill. Considerable delay had already taken place, and much mischief had thereby resulted in dealing with this important subject, and he did not consider it advisable that further delay should be allowed, and further mischief consequently submitted to. He did not imagine that any great progress would be made in the Bill that evening, if the House went at once into Committee; but still the fact of going into Committee was progress in itself; and if the Bill could be carried to a conclusion during the present Session a very great advantage would be obtained. It ought to be remembered that before another week, probably before next Tuesday, hon. Members of that House who belonged to the legal profession would have gone circuit, and he ventured to think that on a subject of that description, the study, and still more the experience of Members of the legal profession, might be useful in enabling the House to arrive at a satisfactory result.

MR. KEATING said that, if he were assured that it was the bonâ fide intention of the Government to proceed with the Bill during the present Session of Parliament, he would have no objection to go at once into Committee, but upon that subject he entertained grave doubts. The hon. and learned Solicitor General had obtained the second reading of the Bill, by promising to introduce into it certain provisions contained in the Bill of the hon. and learned Member for Plymouth (Mr. Collier) and in that of the hon. and learned Member for East Suffolk (Sir F. Kelly). That part of the Bill of the hon. and learned Member for Plymouth which was to have been incorporated in the present Bill gave a jurisdiction to County Courts, and that part of the Bill of the hon. and learned Member for East Suffolk, which ought to have been introduced, related to a simplification of the mode of procedure. Now, looking at the present Bill, it was his firm conviction that the drawer of it never intended to give effect to the views of the hon. and learned Member for Plymouth, or of the hon. and learned Member for Suffolk. One clause, it was true, gave a contentious jurisdiction to the County Court, but then the rest of the machinery of the Bill rendered it impossible that a contentious cause could ever be settled in those Courts; and in the same way the views of the hon. and learned Member for Plymouth were not carried into effect. Probably the hon. and learned Solicitor General had not had time to look very carefully to the construction of the Bill, but he hoped that, if it was his intention to carry out the views of the two hon. and learned Gentlemen to whom he had referred, he would before Tuesday next carefully consider the clauses of the Bill.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL: Sir, I have never experienced in so practical a way the wisdom of the old adage,— "Heaven preserve one from one's friends,"—for the attack which has just proceeded from what I imagined to be a friendly quarter is even more unwarranted and more unjust than any which has proceeded from any other quarter of the House. I cannot think that the hon. and learned Member for Plymouth can concur in that attack, nor do I think that the hon. and learned Member for East Suffolk will be ready to defend it; for the clauses in the present Bill which refer to the mode of procedure are so similar to those in the Bill of the hon. and learned Gentleman (Sir F. Kelly) that they might have been cut out of that Bill with the scissors, perhaps even by the hand of the hon. and learned Gentleman himself, and pasted upon the draught of the present measure. So much for the attack which has been made upon the Bill because it departs from the understanding I had with the hon. and learned Gentlemen the Members for Plymouth and East Suffolk. I admit, Sir, that I have fallen into a great error in attempting to please all the world. Another mistake has been this, that I imagined there was some agreement, some concert, some mutual understanding, some harmony between right hon. and hon. Gentlemen who sit on the opposite side of the House. Yet the fault was not wholly mine, for the hon. and learned Member for East Suffolk professed to be the exponent of their combined wishes and desires, and my error lay in innocently, but as it appears most erroneously, confiding in his representation that he spoke their sentiments. My hon. and learned Friend claimed to act on their behalf; but now I find that upon this subject, as recently the House has seen upon many others, there is no agreement between any two Gentlemen on the opposite side. What to do under such circumstances I really am at a loss to conjecture. But I have not yet told the House all; for, assailed in front and in rear, I have still another enemy to encounter. I had imagined until now that it was one of the fondest wishes of the right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle (Sir J. Graham) that he might live to see the day when these Ecclesiastical Courts should be abolished. On former occasions I have imbibed from him a great number of correct principles, and received from him most valuable advice with respect to the accomplishment of this great undertaking. Yet, if I may judge from a speech which I had the misfortune to hear the other night, the right hon. Baronet has changed all his opinions, and, by some wonderful process which I have not the wit to understand, he has arrived at a conclusion exactly the opposite of that which he has entertained for the last twenty years. Now, in this predicament, what to do, as I have just said, is exceedingly difficult to determine. With regard to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire (Mr. Henley), if I do not violate any confidence in referring to a conversation which I had with him some time ago, I may state that I was so much impressed with a desire he appeared to entertain to provide for the country districts that I introduced his suggestions upon that point into the Bill. I have, therefore, sincerely endeavoured—and, perhaps, this will be accepted as a proof of my want of Parliamentary experience—to make the Bill a measure that would be acceptable to all. With reference to the debate the other night, the House will do me the justice to recollect that I did not ask them to take the Bill upon trust, because I was careful to point out that there were three Bills at the present time before the House, describing what I intended to borrow from one, and for what I meant to be indebted to another. I hope, therefore, the House will acquit me of having in any manner desired to lead them into the second reading, without giving them an opportunity of considering all the provisions of which my Bill would ultimately be composed, especially when I recall to their recollection that I stated at the time that I would have no objection to any hon. Gentleman discussing the principle of the measure again upon going into Committee. Now, unfortunately, Sir, I have another antagonist to which I have not yet referred, though it is, perhaps, the most formidable of all—I mean time. Under these circumstances, and surrounded by enemies on all hands, I can do nothing but yield to the proposition of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxfordshire, and defer the consideration of the Bill in Committee till Tuesday next, trusting that on that occasion I shall have his concurrence, and, I hope, the concurrence of at least some Gentlemen who may be pleased to act with him on the other side, in endeavouring to advance a measure which I firmly believe calculated to confer great benefits upon all classes in the country.

SIR JAMES GRAHAM: Sir, I think the hon. and learned Gentleman has given us practical proof that the advice which the noble Lord at the head of the Government tendered to a right hon. Friend of mind the other night, cannot in all cases be followed with success, and that half an hour's conversation with Gentlemen who sit on the opposite side does not always lead to satisfactory results. I also think I may infer from the discussion which has taken place, that what a very great lawyer—Lord Clarendon—calls the “impossible faculty of pleasing everybody,” does not help the hon. and learned Gentleman the Solicitor General in his endeavours to pass his Wills and Administration Bill through the House. Now, Sir, I would like to ask the hon. and learned Gentleman, since he compels me to speak, whether the House is yet in possession of his own ultimate views? To be more pointed in my question, I will ask him whether it be true or not that it is his intention to propose that a district probate shall be granted where the sum does not exceed £1,500 or £2,000. Unless I am misinformed, it is the intention of the hon. and learned Gentleman, in fulfilment of a pledge which he has already given out of doors, to propose such a provision, which, I need hardly say, would be a great alteration of the Bill before the House. The hon. and learned Gentleman has thought fit to charge me with a change of opinion on this subject. Let me illustrate to the House what is the position of the hon. and learned Gentleman himself with respect to change of opinion from the Report of the Chancery Commission. I served with him on that Commission, and, led by him, I joined in some of his recommendations, though with much doubt and hesitation, but influenced by the confidence which I then reposed in his judgment. The Report of the Chancery Commission recommended distinctly that the new Court should be connected with the Court of Chancery. That was the advice of the hon. and learned Solicitor General. I followed his lead to the extent that with him and the Master of the Rolls I joined in protesting against the recommendation of a majority of the Commission, that there should be a separation in the jurisdiction between probate and administration, and construction and administration. The hon. and learned Gentleman talks of change of opinion, and yet he proposes in his Bill, that up to £200 and £300 respectively jurisdiction should be given to County Courts in matters testamentary! Let me, however, read to the House what is the opinion of the Chancery Commission upon this point from a Report signed by the Solicitor General.

"We have considered," say the Commissioners, "the expediency of transferring the testamentary jurisdiction to the Courts of Common Law, but it appears to us that the machinery of those Courts is not adapted for the transaction of such business."

And there is a separate paragraph with respect to the County Courts. Now, after what I have said, I think the hon. and learned Gentleman need not have compelled me to speak in defence of myself with respect to a change of opinion. He proposes to sever the testamentary jurisdiction from the Court of Chancery. He proposes to transfer up to a limited amount a contentious jurisdiction in matters testamentary to the County Courts. Yet in the Chancery Commission he opposed both measures, and, relying on his judgment, I was induced to join in that opposition.

Mr. MALINS said, he was opposed to the principle of the Bill, which he was determined to resist by every means in his power. He was both sorry and surprised that the hon. and learned Solicitor General should still cling to the vain hope of passing the Bill during the present Session. The Bill had not been circulated through the country, and those affected by it had not had an opportunity of considering its provisions. During the short time that he had been in that House, the present was the fourth Bill introduced on testamentary jurisdiction, each one differing from its predecessor; and, now, as the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite had tried to please everybody he had, as might have been expected, ended in pleasing no one. The hon. and learned Gentleman said that no two Members on the Opposition side of the House appeared to agree on anything; but assuredly there did not appear to be much unanimity on the other side. In 1854, the hon. and learned Gentleman put his hand to a Report declaring that the machinery of the Common Law Courts was not adapted to the purpose of testamentary jurisdiction, and stating that it was not expedient to confer any testamentary jurisdiction on the County Courts. Now, he (Mr. Malins) unlike the hon. and learned Gentleman, adhered to the opinion that no part of this business should be transferred to the County Courts. He was no party to any arrangement which had been come to with the hon. and learned Member for East Suffolk (Sir F. Kelly), and should continue to oppose the further progress of the Bill at the present period of the Session. For it was absurd to suppose that a Bill containing 157 clauses could, under such circumstances, be carried that Session. He would therefore suggest that the Bill should be now abandoned, and that the matter should be referred to a Select Committee next Session.

SIR ERSKINE PERRY said, he hoped the House would not agree to the suggestion of his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Wallingford (Mr. Malins), though he feared they would not get the Bill through Committee that Session. He (Sir E. Perry) was in favour of the local jurisdiction provided by the measure, and thought that the County Courts had given great satisfaction. He would, therefore, support the proposition to give them jurisdiction in testamentary matters.

MR. HADFIELD said, that not one great measure for the good of the general public had been passed during the Session. The expenses of the Ecclesiastical Courts fell upon the bereaved classes of the community—they fell upon the weak. He called on the noble Lord at the head of Her Majesty's Government to say would he give the measure a real support by making it take precedence of all other Government business on Tuesday. The proposed measure was the greatest reform that ever the country produced in the law, and it was a shame that it should receive such obstruction.

CHURCH-BUILDING COMMISSION BILL.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair."

MR. HADFIELD said, he should move that the Committee be deferred for three months. The Acts of Parliament on the subject amounted to nineteen in number; and so complicated and confused were they, that consolidation was out of the question. It was impossible, therefore, that at that hour of the night (half-past eleven o'clock) the House could give the matter the consideration it required; but there was, in his opinion, quite enough on the face of the present Bill to show that it was not calculated to effect the object that he, and those who thought with him, desired. The Commission had now been in existence thirty-eight years, and the legislation connected with it had, as he had just mentioned, got into such inextricable confusion that it was perfectly impossible to reduce it to any order or system. He had the strongest possible objection to the continuance of the Commission, which cost the country annually a large sum of money, without producing any adequate advantage.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House will, upon this day three months, resolve itself into the said Committee," instead thereof.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he thought that some misapprehension was entertained with respect to the Bill. Its object was to give effect to the Church-Building Acts, and to enable the Church-Building Commission to carry out its powers. It was intended originally that the Commission should be continued for ten years; but, in deference to the wishes that had been expressed on the subject, the Government had consented to a shorter period. The object of the Bill was with a view to the execution of powers and the performance of duties which were necessary to be performed under the Church-Building Acts. The hon. Gentleman seemed to think that there was only a very small sum in the hands of the Commission; but the funds remaining to be distributed amounted to £18,000, part of which was conditionally granted, it was true. Then there were sums repayable to the Commission, and there were many powers vested in the Commission. It was a question whether it would not be desirable to consolidate the Church-Building with the Ecclesiastical Commission, in order to avoid the continuance of the Church-Building Commission under existing Acts, and thus do away with a multiplicity of Commissions.

LEGISLATIVE COUNCIL OF INDIA.

THE EARL OF ALBEMARLE presented a petition from the Landholders, Planters, Merchants, and others interested in the agriculture, commerce, and trade of the lower Provinces of Bengal, praying for an enlargement of the Legislative Council by the admission into it of persons selected from the Indian communities without distinction of race or creed; and to call the attention of the House to the exclusive and unsatisfactory constitution of the existing Legislative Council. The noble Earl said that the Legislative Council was composed entirely of the servants of the Crown and of the East India Company, thus excluding all the Natives and 10,000 resident Europeans. He doubted whether in the annals of the whole world a precedent could be found of a set of officials engrossing in this way the whole political and legislative functions of a vast empire. It was not too much to say that this Council was as remarkable for its ignorance and inefficiency as for its exclusiveness. Composed of a few officers of revenue and justice, it had to legislate for eight nations without any assistance from the Native Powers. A few weeks ago he had called their Lordships' attention to the legislation of this Council with regard to the people of Singapore. He had shown that their legislation had thrown the whole of the monetary system of the thriving settlements in the Straits of Malacca into a state of the utmost confusion. It was impossible, indeed, to conceive the absurdities and follies perpetrated by this Council. He had received a letter within the last few days from a gentleman in India, stating that no act promulgated by the Council had given satisfaction, and that their proceedings had excited dismay, disgust, and opposition from all parties. He had on a former occasion implored Her Majesty's Government to extend to India the privileges which had been successfully intrusted to Ceylon, Trinidad, and other Crown colonies—far inferior in numbers, wealth, and intelligence. The Act of 1853 was passed at a time when they did not know the East India Company as well as they did now, and he hoped Her Majesty's Government would see the necessity of introducing a measure at an early period for extinguishing the monopolising character of legislation for India, and making their measures more popular, more practical, and more useful.

THE CHIMNEY SWEEPERS' ACT.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY presented a petition from Edward Shipley Ellis, of Leicester, worsted spinner, praying for an amendment of the Chimney Sweepers' Act. The noble Earl said, there could be no doubt the Act was very grossly evaded in all parts of the country, although in the metropolis, containing a population of 2,500,000, it was duly observed. There was no reason whatever why the Act should not be observed in every part of the kingdom, and its non-observance entailed upon children great cruelty and suffering. He would not detain their Lordships by a long narrative of cases of disease and mutilation; it was sufficient to say that many children were crippled in early life and rendered wholly incapable of earning a livelihood. It was manifest that while these children were handed over to absolute and unqualified slavery, it was impossible they could receive the first rudiments of education, and that treatment of a most disgusting and cruel character must have a depressing influence on their moral feelings. He hoped the Government would pay attention to the prayer of the petition, and take into consideration the inefficiency of the Act.

The Earl of Albemarle

Petition to lie on the table.

DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES BILL.

Bill read 3^a (according to Order).

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he did not rise for the purpose of dividing their Lordships; but merely to move the omission of a proviso inserted in this Bill last evening, for the purpose of giving himself an opportunity of recording his opinion against that proviso. The proviso to which he alluded was the one providing that the party divorced should not marry the party with whom he or she had committed adultery. Now he thought that this clause was a mistake, and would encourage rather than discountenance adultery. It would be a great infliction on the guilty woman, but it would be very favourable to the guilty man. There had been in that House a standing order to the same effect as that proviso; but their Lordships seeing that its insertion in divorce Bills might lead to very injurious consequences to women, it had invariably been struck out. Such a clause would either encourage the adulterer to abandon the woman, marry some one else, and enter society, when probably he would be forgiven, and suffer nothing for his culpability; or it would lead to the guilty parties living together, not in a state of marriage. Guilty men might, in many instances, be glad of such a clause, as it would prevent them from doing that which, but for the legal enactment, feelings of honour might compel them to do. Under these circumstances he looked upon the proviso in question as calculated to work much mischief; but as their Lordships had already expressed their opinions upon it, he would not divide the House on his Motion to omit it.

Amendment negatived; an Amendment made; Bill passed, and sent to the Commons.

CAMBRIDGE UNIVERSITY BILL.

House in Committee (according to Order).

On Clause 6,

LORD LYTTELTON rose to move two Amendments, the first that the limit requiring the Members of the Council of the Senate should be elected from the electoral roll should be removed; and the object of this Amendment was to assimilate this Bill to the Oxford Act. The electoral roll in the Cambridge Bill corresponded with the Congregation in the Act relating to the sister University, and in that Act there was no limitation requiring that the Hebdomadal Council should be members of Congregation, but simply that they should be members of the Senate. It had further been suggested to him that there was a safeguard against the non-residence of the members of the Senate in the Oxford Act, which it might be well to adopt in the present case, and if he carried his Amendment in reference to the electoral body, he should move to add the proviso from the Oxford Act, which enacted that if any member of the Senate other than the Chancellor should reside at the University for a less period than fourteen weeks in any one year, his seat should be declared void and become vacant.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR opposed the Amendment, thinking it would involve unnecessary complications in the working of the Bill.

Amendment negatived; Clause agreed to.

Clauses 7 to 30 agreed to.

On Clause 31, providing that the Commissioners may frame University statutes,

LORD LYTTELTON said, he could not at all see why Cambridge should be treated so differently from Oxford in respect to the legislative powers given to the Commissioners. In the Oxford Act no such general powers were given, but by the Cambridge Bill the Commissioners might, for a period of two years, frame statutes for any of the purposes mentioned in the preceding clauses. In case the University itself should not have done so. Now, he did not propose to take away that power, but the clause provided that only statutes passed by the Commissioners affecting certain gifts or endowments should be laid before the Council of the Senate. He thought this limitation ought not to exist, and that all the statutes framed by the Commissioners should be laid before this body. He therefore proposed the omission from the clause of the words which restricted the statutes to be so submitted to the Council of the Senate to such "as shall be for the altering or modifying any of the said trusts, statutes, or directions affecting any gifts or endowment held or enjoyed by the University, or by any professor, lecturer, reader, preacher, or scholar therein, or the said endowments of Lady Sadler, or of the offices of Christain Preacher and Christian Advocate, or of William Worts."

THE LORD CHANCELLOR opposed the Amendment.

After a few words from the Earl of Powis,

On Question, that the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question, their Lordships divided:—Content, 26; Not Content, 51: Majority, 25.

Clause, as amended, agreed to.

On Clause 44 (That it shall not be necessary to make a declaration or take an oath on matriculating or taking a degree).

LORD LYNTHURST said, it was his intention to move an Amendment for restoring the clause to the state in which it was originally proposed to the House of Commons, by reinserting the words which had been struck out in Committee, excluding Dissenters from seats in the Senate of the University. He would remind their Lordships that the alteration was carried by a very small majority in a very small House. Their Lordships would understand the effect of the alteration. It was to admit Dissenters from the Church of England to the Senate—that was, to the governing body of the University. That body passed the laws of the University; it elected the Council of the University; it elected the officers of the University, and among other officers those connected with religion and with religious education. The question, therefore, was one of very great importance. They all understood the close connection that existed between the Universities and the Church of England. The whole ministration of the Church proceeded from the Universities. It was a most important thing, therefore, to take care that those who governed the University should be members of the Church of England. If their Lordships adopted this change, they would be adopting a most important alteration; and they might depend upon it, it would have a decided influence upon the religion of the country. He would, therefore, earnestly recommend their Lordships to reinsert the words which had been struck out of the clause. He would repeat that the alteration was made in a comparatively small House, and was carried by a small majority, and carried by surprise. He thought it impossible that the Government, in the other House of Parliament, could sanction this change. His belief was, that the Government was on that occasion also taken by surprise. But with respect to the nature of the Amendment itself, he did not wish to rely upon his own opinion. He had been much struck with certain observations which he had understood to have been used in another place with regard to the Amendment which was there carried. An hon. Member had said that—

“The effect of the Amendment would be to confer upon Dissenters who took the higher degrees a right of interference in the affairs of the University and a vote for Members of Parliament. He feared that it would mar the usefulness of the Bill by exciting a feeling of hostility and alarm in the minds of those whose co-operation was necessary for the efficient working of the measure. It must not be forgotten that there was a strong connexion between the Church of England and the Universities, and a proposal to allow Dissenters to interfere in fixing the theological studies to be pursued in those Universities would excite great alarm in the minds of many persons. He opposed the Amendment, believing that it would tend to impair the practical usefulness of the Bill.”—[3 Hansard, cxlij. 1755.]

Now, with those observations he entirely concurred. They were observations ascribed, and he believed justly ascribed, to a Member of Her Majesty's Government (Mr. Bouverie), that Member being the Gentleman who had charge of the Bill in the other House of Parliament; and he thought, therefore, that, taking those observations in connection with the fact that the Vote in the other House of Parliament was obtained by surprise, their Lordships would agree to the restoration of those words in the clause which prevented Dissenters from taking any part in the government of the University of Cambridge which had been expunged in the other House of Parliament. The noble and learned Lord concluded by moving, as an Amendment, the restoration of certain words in the clause, the effect of which was to prevent Dissenters taking part in the government of University.

Lord Lyndhurst

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, he would admit that it was true that such a restriction was contained in the Bill which was before their Lordships two years ago, and also that the Bill which had been introduced in the other House of Parliament during the present Session contained the words which the noble and learned Lord now wished to restore. For his own part, he should have been perfectly satisfied with the Bill if those words had been retained; but, as they had been struck out by the House of Commons, he ventured to submit to their Lordships, that unless it could be clearly shown that their omission created any serious evil, or gave rise to any real apprehension of danger to the Church of England, it would not be advantageous that upon a question of this description their Lordships should place themselves in antagonism with the other House of Parliament. [Lord LYNDHURST: There is no such omission from the Oxford Bill.] There was not; but still it would not be creditable to their Lordships to place themselves in antagonism with the House of Commons on the subject. It was only a fortnight back since an argument was pressed upon their Lordships which appeared to him to be germane to the present question. The noble and learned Lord opposite them occupied the attention of their Lordships for a length of time upon a question upon which he regretted to say that he was defeated, and the argument employed by the noble and learned Lord was singularly applicable to the present question. If it were not dangerous—and the noble and learned Lord argued that it was not—to the Christian legislation of the country to admit Jews into Parliament, surely it could not be dangerous to the Church of England character of the University of Cambridge to admit Dissenters into its Senate. For his own part, he believed that the admission of Dissenters would not be dangerous to the Church of England, but to the Dissenters themselves. It had been said by a popular writer—he did not know whether it was Dr. Aiken or Mrs. Barbauld—Dissenters never remained so during two generations, and they would be more likely to become members of the Established Church than to induce members of the Church to dissent from it.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, he had a great respect for the noble and learned Lord, and also for Mrs. Barbauld, but he did not think that her opinion could be relied upon to guide the decisions of their

Lordships in the present case. He regretted that the noble and learned Lord should have thought it necessary to rest his argument upon the speech made by his noble and learned Friend on a previous occasion, to the effect that the admission of Jews would not endanger the Christian character of the House of Commons. He could not tell whether his noble and learned Friend acutely felt the sarcasm, but he begged to remind the noble and learned Lord that there were many members of their Lordships' House who had not agreed in that opinion, and who, therefore, could consistently maintain that the exclusion of Dissenters from the governing body was necessary to preserve the Church of England character of the University. His noble and learned Friend (Lord Lyndhurst), on the present occasion, asked their Lordships to do, and the Government to do, that which both one and the other had declared would be most advantageous, and to adhere to a principle which they had established in the Oxford Bill. He could not conceive upon what ground the noble and learned Lord Chancellor could sanction the introduction of a Bill to amend the Oxford University Bill, and still less how the Government could reconcile themselves to adopting an important principle in one Session of Parliament, and then to be ready in the following Session to be guided upon the subject by a chance majority of the House of Commons. He would be most unwilling to see their Lordships in antagonism with the House of Commons, but upon an important principle their Lordships would be departing from their duty if they consented to abandon that which they felt to be right for any such consideration. It so happened that in the present instance, not only were the Government antagonistic to the views which they had expressed two years ago, and again during the present year, but the House of Commons had proved itself antagonistic to itself within the last two years. Two years ago, in the case of the Oxford Bill, the House of Commons decided by a large majority, and wisely decided, in favour of the admission of Dissenters to the University, but they decided also that they should not be admitted into the governing body. It was, in fact, the declarations repeatedly made in both Houses of Parliament to that effect, made and supported by the Government, which went far to reconcile the members of the University to the proposed change, because they felt that in retaining the Church of England character of the University, they would receive the support of Parliament and of Her Majesty's Government. That principle had now been reversed in a thin House of 130 or 140 Members, and then by a small majority, although it had been originally affirmed by a large majority in a House of no less than 400 Members. He would implore their Lordships not to be guided in their decision by the feeling evinced by a stolen vote of the House of Commons, nor by the willingness displayed by the Government to play fast and loose, but to adhere to the principle which they had laid down. If the principle were right with regard to Oxford, it could not be wrong with respect to Cambridge; and he earnestly trusted that their Lordships would not permit the Government to go back from the ground which they had adopted, and, out of consideration for a trifling majority of the House of Commons, to induce them to shrink from that course in a manner not creditable to their consistency.

LORD MONTEAGLE considered that the Bill as it at present stood was more consistent with wise legislation than it would be if altered in the way proposed by the noble Lord (Lord Lyndhurst). The assimilation of system in the two Universities was not necessarily either expedient or probable. He maintained that from the earliest times there had been a wide difference between the University of Cambridge and that of Oxford with respect to Dissenters. In the days of Elizabeth, at Cambridge, a Dissenter was not excluded from taking his degree or becoming a member of the University. During the reign of James I. the authorities of the University were forced by a royal letter written from Newmarket to do that which they would not have done, except under the compulsion of a monarch who was not attached to the laws or liberties of England: long after that time the cases of Oxford and Cambridge entirely differed. The Dissenter, no doubt, had cause of complaint in both Universities; but at Cambridge the course of education was opened freely to him, and it was only upon his going up in the Senate House to take his degree that he was refused that evidence and outward recognition of the honour to which his industry and talent entitled him. But at Oxford the prohibition against Dissenters took effect in limine—it was applied when the candidate presented himself for matriculation—and the Dissenter, refusing the offered test, was not admitted to the benefits of the same education which he enjoyed at the sister University. At Oxford, education was refused to the Dissenter. At Cambridge, education was granted, but the degree was refused. This was under the old system. He contended, further, that there would be no analogy between the two Universities even if the noble and learned Lord succeeded in carrying his Amendment. By the Oxford Bill a Dissenter could take only a B.A. degree. By the present Bill, even as amended by the noble and learned Lord, he would be admitted at Cambridge to the M.A. degree, although he would be excluded from the privileges of the Senate. The question had been argued by the Lord Chancellor upon a right principle. Could the noble Lord show any objection to the admission of Dissenters to the Senate, except the cry of exclusion, on the grounds of religious faith, which of all cries was, in his opinion, the one most abhorrent from the constitution of England? What were they afraid of? There were above 3,000 members of the Senate, and it was absurd to suppose that any real danger could arise to the Church of England from the admission of a few Dissenters to that body. But this did not rest on theory. The experiment had already been tried. Mr. Pitt, in 1793, without objection from the then exclusively Protestant Parliament of Ireland, had recommended the admission of both Dissenters and Roman Catholics to the enjoyment of the degrees conferred by the University of Dublin; and he appealed to their Lordships whether, while the result of that experiment had furnished them with the best argument against the Ultramontane doctrines entertained by a portion of the Roman Catholic party in Ireland with respect to the system of united education, they had ever heard a complaint from the Irish University or the Church arising from the intermixture of the Roman Catholics with the Protestants?

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE remarked that Dissenters did not form part of the governing body of the University of Dublin.

LORD MONTEAGLE was aware of that, but that only referred to the scholarships, fellowships, and the privileges of the foundation. As Masters of Arts, the Dissenters and Churchmen were equal; they took the same degree as Churchmen, and voted for Members of Parliament in the same manner. But it was said, that by previous clauses of the Bill, they had admitted Dissenters to the advantages of the University by giving them halls. This was not a correct statement. Equality was not conceded. The creation of three separate halls was also questionable. He regretted that these halls had been established, because some inconveniences, if not dangers, might arise from the establishment of small Dissenting communities in the University, very possibly representing the extreme and exclusive opinions of that body; whereas if Dissenters were admitted fully, freely, and unreservedly to the Colleges and to the "University" itself, the tendency would be of Dissenters towards the Church, not of Churchmen towards Dissent. But he relied upon "living authorities," as well as on that of the great statesman whom he had named, and he begged their Lordships to observe that the argument which he was about to quote was not founded upon any temporary or trumpery ground, but upon eternal principles which were at all times equally just and true. The noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Derby), on the occasion of the presentation of the memorable Cambridge petition in the year 1832, said that he was confident that the Church would not be strengthened by keeping up the system of exclusion at the Universities. The noble Earl then expressed an opinion that it was not by exclusion, but by admission, that the interests of the Church were best supported. If those arguments were good then, they were equally good now. He begged to remind the noble Lord that the petition of 1832, entrusted to him (Lord Monteagle) in 1832, recommended the admission of Dissenters to a full and free admission to degrees. That petition was signed by the present Archbishop of York, the late Bishop of Lichfield, and by a distinguished Prelate now present, the Bishop of St. David's. It also bore the signatures of the Dean of Ely, and many other leading members of the Church and of the University. He could not understand how the noble and learned Lord (Lord Lyndhurst) could consistently advocate the admission of those who were not Christians to the Legislature of this country, and at the same time object to the admission of a Dissenting Christian as one of the Senate of the University of Cambridge. He could not admit that the alteration in the Bill which admitted Dissenters to the Senate on terms of perfect equality was carried in the other House by surprise, since the Amendment upon which the Vote was taken had been printed and placed in the usual manner in the hands of Members, and in fact two divisions took place upon it. The House of Commons might have reversed its vote on the third reading, had it been carried by surprise; but, on the contrary, it was acquiesced in, without division, and the House unanimously passed the Bill with the Amendment. He implored their Lordships not to unsettle this question afresh by agreeing to the Motion of the noble and learned Lord. This was only continuing a cause of irritation, and it was certain that an imperfect concession would lead to a protracted struggle, which could only terminate by the concession of a just demand of that which was now unwisely refused. He would feel it to be his duty to take the sense of the House against the proposal of the noble Lord, and in favour of the Amendment introduced by the House of Commons, thus rendering the admission of Dissenters into the Senate final and satisfactory.

THE EARL OF DERBY said, that the noble Lord had quoted from a speech of his delivered twenty-four years ago, which represented him as having been opposed to the system of exclusion, and pledged to the question under their Lordships' consideration—namely, whether the Dissenters ought to be admitted to the governing body of the Universities. He adhered to the opinion he then expressed, that Dissenting youths ought not to be excluded from the benefits of a University education; and to the imposition of an oath on matriculation he had always objected; but that had nothing to do with the admission of the Dissenters to the governing body of the University; and if the noble Lord had read the whole of his speech he would have found that he proceeded to state that he would not enter upon details as to how far and in what manner it might be desirable to modify the admission of Dissenters—whether they ought to be admitted to all the honours and none of the powers of Government, and whether there should be any restriction with regard to the internal government of the University. Their Lordships would therefore see that he had carefully guarded himself then, as he guarded himself now, against declaring his opinion with respect to the modifications or relaxations under which Dissenters ought to be admitted to all the privileges of the University. He had always said Dissenters ought to be admitted to matriculatation and to the bachelor's degree; but he did not think they ought to be included in the government of the University, and in favour of that opinion there had been recorded during the present Session the vote and opinion of almost every Member of the Government in the House of Commons, including the Prime Minister himself.

THE BISHOP OF ST. DAVID'S said, he did not feel himself bound by his recollection of the petition to which the noble Lord (Lord Monteaule) had alluded, and which he (the Bishop of St. David's) had had the pleasure of signing, since he did not remember that one of the objects of that petition was to give the Dissenters a share in the governing body of the University. He desired to extend to Dissenters the fullest share in the honours of the University that was consistent with the principles of its constitution in connection with the Church of England. He did not think that a change so important should have been introduced into the Bill in the House of Commons in the manner which had been described. At the same time he did not believe that the clause, as it stood, would enable Dissenters at the University of Cambridge to exercise any injurious influence on the government of the University, because their numbers were very small and insignificant in proportion to the numbers of members of the Established Church. To the Dissenters, therefore, the boon in question was of the smallest possible value. The alteration proposed would not deprive them of that which would confer upon the Dissenters any substantial power, but it might infuse elements of discord and ill-feeling into the University. It was with very great reluctance, because he shrank from the appearance of withholding from the Dissenters any privileges which might be safely and usefully conferred, that he dissented from a change which he believed would be to them perfectly useless, while it would have a detrimental effect on the social state of the University, and give members of other Universities some right to complain.

House adjourned to Monday next.

Friday, July 4, 1856.

MINUTES.] New WRIT.—For Calne, v. the Earl of Shelburne, Steward of Hempholme.
PUBLIC BILL.—1° Divorce and Matrimonial Causes.
2° Incumbered Estates (Ireland); Revenue (Transfer of Charges).

LIABILITY OF CAB PROPRIETORS—QUESTION.

MR. D. WADDINGTON said, he wished to inquire of the right hon. Baronet the Secretary of State for the Home Department, whether his attention had been called to a judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench by which cab proprietors were held to be liable in respect of luggage lost in their cabs, and whether he intended to take any measure to relieve the cab proprietors from that liability?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that the effect of a recent decision in the Court of Queen's Bench was to fix an unlimited liability in respect of goods conveyed by railway companies, and that the subject was then under the consideration of Government; but he was not at that moment prepared with any measure which would have the effect of affording relief to those companies.

COUNTY COURT JUDGES' SALARIES—QUESTION.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he had a question to put to the Chancellor of the Exchequer. A Bill now stood for Monday, to regulate the salaries of the County Court Judges. That Bill placed the salaries to the charge of the Consolidated Fund. He therefore desired to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he would be able to lay on the table of the House an estimate of the amount which would be placed to the charge of the Consolidated Fund by the provisions of the Bill?

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that he had no objection to lay on the table the best estimate the Government were able to form as to the charge on the Consolidated Fund of those salaries. The Bill would not be taken till Friday next, and before that time he would endeavour to lay the estimate on the table.

MR. ROEBUCK said, he hoped that the estimate would show the distinction between the amount paid by the Consolidated Fund and the amount paid by fees.

TROOPS IN THE WEST INDIES—QUESTION.

MR. SCHOLEFIELD said, he would beg to ask the hon. Under-Secretary for War whether the three regiments—the 36th, 67th, and 69th, which have now been about five years stationed in the West India islands—were shortly to be relieved? The usual time for such service was only three years.

MR. FREDERICK PEEL said, that the delay had been caused by the necessity of concentrating the troops in the Crimea: The Government had no wish to detain those troops in the West Indies beyond their time. They were at present on their way to this country. It was impossible at present to say what would be their destination.

SALARY OF THE BISHOP OF NEW ZEALAND.

On the Motion that the House at its rising should adjourn until Monday,

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON rose, and said that he could not allow the Session to close without putting a question to the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for the Colonies with respect to the subject to which he had already called the attention of the House on more than one occasion, namely, the salary of the Bishop of New Zealand. His object in putting the question was to ascertain what was the intention of the Government with regard to a state of things which they must allow was not on the whole a creditable one, and which to them, as it was to him, must, he was sure, be matter of great regret. In former discussions that had taken place upon the subject, blame had been thrown upon him in consequence of some words which fell from his lips in moving the Colonial Estimates in the year 1852; but he had never acknowledged the justice of that blame, and even supposing that in the first three weeks of his holding office, during which it was natural that his mind should have been much occupied by matters of varied interest, and whilst moving the Colonial Estimates, he had used expressions which applied to the Bishop of New Zealand, nevertheless, he had subsequently, over and over again, declared that it was not his intention to convey the meaning that had been subsequently put upon them. The facts of the case were these:—The Bishop of New Zealand was appointed by the noble Lord the Member for London (Lord John Russell) when the noble Lord was Secretary of State for the Colonies in 1839 or 1841, with the distinct intimation that his salary was to be £600 per annum. No promise was made, however, that that income should be for life, though, according to all precedent, it might surely with fairness be understood to be for life. But within the last two years the income had been wholly stopped, and the bishop left without the means of support in his episcopal capacity. Reference was made by the right hon. Baronet opposite (Sir G. Grey), when at the Colonial Office, to the colony itself, but the colony refused to act upon it; and, if he remembered rightly, their refusal was given about the time that the new constitution for New Zealand came into operation, and the Government of the colony could hardly be considered in a settled state. How far that circumstance gave better hope of the result of any fresh reference to the colony he could not say; but he would submit to the Government whether it was creditable to the Church or honourable to the country that in consequence of a misunderstanding of the nature he had described a bishop should be deprived of the income he had a right to expect at the time of his appointment, and left without any means of supporting his position in the colony. If the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Labouchere) could not hold out any prospect of the salary of the bishop being renewed, he (Sir J. Pakington) should certainly bring forward a Motion upon the subject early in the next Session. In conclusion, he wished to ask whether it was the intention of the Government to make any arrangement for restoring to the Bishop of New Zealand the moderate and necessary income of £600 per annum, which was provided for him when he first accepted the position he has so well filled, and was continued till the last two years?

MR. LABOUCHERE said, that he could not avoid confessing that the subject brought forward by the right hon. Member for Droitwich was one which he always approached with pain and concern, because he readily admitted that the Bishop of New Zealand had been hardly treated. But he was also quite sure that it was not the result of design on the part of any one who had had to do with the transaction, though that result was equally certain as if it had been; and he must repeat that it was impossible to review the proceedings without coming to the conclusion that, so far as the Bishop was concerned, he had been somewhat harshly treated. He must also confess that the pain he felt was aggravated by the circumstance that nothing could have been more disinterested or high-minded than the conduct of the Bishop himself with regard to the whole matter. When applied to, and asked if he considered he had a right to the money on account of the manner in which he had been appointed, he answered, in writing, in these terms :—

"I admit the correctness of the statement which is reported to have been made by Lord John Russell, in the House of Commons, that no stipulation or agreement was made by me in 1841 respecting the amount or continuance of the salary; for I did not then, nor do I now, consider it to be a part of my office to make any such stipulation or agreement, either with the home or the colonial Government; and I must leave with Her Majesty's Government the responsibility of interfering with previous arrangements without making any provision for me."

Than such language nothing could be more becoming or suitable to the sacred station which the Bishop of New Zealand held, or more in consonance with the whole character and conduct of that right rev. person; and he (Mr. Labouchere) could assure the House that if he himself had come to the conclusion that he ought not again to put upon the Colonial Estimates the salary of the Bishop of New Zealand, which had now been omitted for three years, it was from no disrespect to the Bishop, nor any insensibility to the manner in which he had filled his sacred office during the time he had been in New Zealand, or the benefits which the community there had received at his hands; but he must remind the House of what were the real facts of the case. It was in 1841 that the bishopric of New Zealand was founded, and placed upon the Estimates with a salary of £600 a year. But it could not be said that any right to that salary was created by what then took place, although he was willing to admit that the Bishop had every reasonable expectation that it would be continued. In point of fact, the salary was continued until 1852, but from that period it was omitted from the Estimates. At that time the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Sir J. Pakington) filled the office of Secretary of State for the Colonies; and in referring to what he then stated it was not his (Mr. Labouchere's) intention to offer any personal taunt to the right hon. Gentleman, but to call the attention of the House to the fact that a distinct pledge was then given by the right hon. Gentleman that the salary should not again appear in the Votes. In a matter of that kind he did think that when the House was asked to agree to an Estimate with the distinct understanding that it should not be repeated, it was a pledge to the House of Commons which ought not to be broken without the strongest and most justifiable reasons for doing so. Well, now, what was the language of the right hon. Gentleman in moving the Estimates in 1852? There was a sum of £10,000 proposed to be voted that year for New Zealand, and he found the hon. Member for Lambeth addressing the following inquiry to the right hon. Gentleman :—

Mr. W. WILLIAMS said, he was glad to observe that there was a reduction in this Vote as compared with previous years, and he hoped that they might look forward to a further and a considerable reduction next year. The charge of £600 for the Bishop of New Zealand, and £590 for chaplains and schools, he must, however, object to, on the ground that the people of this country ought not to be taxed for providing Bishops and clergy for New Zealand, or any other colony, and added, that unless a pledge were given that these items should not appear again, he should divide the Committee against them."—[3 Hansard, cxxii. 106.]

The House would observe that the special, and, indeed, only ground upon which his hon. Friend the Member for Lambeth objected to the Vote was that a certain portion of ecclesiastical expenditure was included in the amount :—

"Sir JOHN PAKINGTON said, he was decidedly averse to giving any distinct pledge; but seeing the reduction already made in the Vote, and that next year it would be further reduced, it was hoped, to £5,000, and that after that time probably no grant at all would be required on account of New Zealand, he would suggest that it would be hardly reasonable to divide against the amount now proposed."

Upon that—

"Mr. W. WILLIAMS said, that after the gratifying statement of the right hon. Gentleman, considering that the Vote was now reduced to £10,000, and would be only £5,000, after which no grant would be required, he would not press his Amendment."—[3 Hansard, cxxii. 106.]

After such observations as the above he could hardly conceive a more distinct pledge to the House of Commons, that the whole of the expenditure for New Zealand should in future be defrayed by the colony itself, and that the House of Commons should not be called upon to meet it out of the revenues of the mother country. He must also confess that, finding such a pledge had been given to the House of Commons by the Secretary for the Colonies three years ago, and that that pledge had ever since been acted upon, he assuredly should not feel himself at liberty to propose such a grant to the House of Commons, except for the strongest reasons—unless, indeed, it were a gross and palpable breach of faith to do otherwise. In previous discussions on the subject, allusion had been made to the case of North American Bishops; but he did not consider that they stood at all on the same footing as the Bishop of New Zealand. The whole of the Vote for New Zealand to which he had alluded was made on temporary grounds; and the House was told that New Zealand would be a self-supporting colony, and no charge to this country; whereas the ecclesiastical establishments in America had always been defrayed out of the revenues of the mother country. Every effort had been made by the Government to induce the Legislature of New Zealand to continue the salary during the lifetime of the existing Bishop; but whilst the Legislature spoke in the most respectful terms of that right reverend person, and expressed a high sense of his merits and services, they stated that as a matter of principle they did not feel that they ought to support the Bishop of one religious denomination to the exclusion of another. He had now stated the reasons why he was afraid he must return a negative reply to the question of the right hon. Gentleman; but he could not sit down without observing that he should be astonished indeed if the Bishop of New Zealand were in any way a sufferer by the refusal of that House to continue his salary. For what was going on in the colony at the present moment? By the spontaneous efforts of Churchmen in New Zealand they were absolutely founding new bishoprics. It was only the other day that he himself advised the Crown to assent to the establishment of a new bishopric in the district of Canterbury, for which an endowment of £500 a year had already been secured from private sources alone; and there was now a proposal before him for constituting another see for the district of Wellington, where the endowment was equally liberal and secure. He could not imagine, therefore, that Churchmen in New Zealand would be guilty of the inconsistency and injustice of providing for New Bishops before they had made provision for the old; and he should hope there was no fear of that excellent prelate, Dr. Selwyn, suffering in pecuniary circumstances from the state of things which had arisen; but with regard to the question of the right hon. Gentleman (Sir J. Pakington) having stated the particulars of the case, he could only say, and he said it with the deepest regret, that he could not hold out any expectation of his advising that the salary of the Bishop of New Zealand should again be placed on the Estimates.

MR. GLADSTONE said, that the manner in which his right hon. Friend the Secretary for the Colonies had spoken of Dr. Selwyn was as worthy of the object of his commendation as of his own character and station; but he had not a word of objection to urge against the course taken by Her Majesty's Government up to that period; because he himself was responsible for having concurred in the propriety of that course. Undoubtedly it was the case, and there should be no mistake about it, that the difficulty in which the Government of Lord Aberdeen was placed in reference to the subject arose entirely and exclusively out of the effect of the words which were understood to be used by the right hon. Baronet (Sir J. Pakington) at the time he was Secretary of State for the Colonies. They construed the words used by the right hon. Baronet—whether intended by him or not was obviously not the question—as constituting a distinct pledge to the House of Commons that the Vote for the salary of the Bishop of New Zealand should not be renewed, and it certainly appeared to them that they would not be justified in departing from that pledge. If the Government had at the period he (Mr. Gladstone) was in office as Chancellor of the Exchequer placed a Vote upon the Estimates, and had used their influence as a Government to procure the assent of the House of Commons in the ordinary manner to that Vote, then he thought that while they might have been doing what was most desirable in regard to the Bishop of New Zealand, they would have given fair ground of complaint to the House of Commons on account of the manner in which the pledge—the involuntary pledge, perhaps—of the right hon. Gentleman would in that case have been violated. He did not see, then, though there was something to regret, that there was anything to find fault with on the part of the Government; because he held this sound parliamentary doctrine, that there were no words of higher authority than words used by a Minister of the Crown when giving answers, in his place, to Members of the House of Commons. The House of Commons was accustomed to repose the most implicit reliance in such verbal assurances; and cases occurred every year in which the Votes of that House were determined by the simple effect of those verbal assurances, given at that moment. Therefore they ought to be considered as of the highest authority, and the pledge they involved ought to be strictly believed. But how stood the case? Grant that the right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich was not, at the moment, fully aware of the breadth of the engagement which his words might be supposed to imply—grant that the Government which succeeded that of which the right hon. Gentleman was a Member were bound to refrain from using their authority to procure the continuance of the Bishop's salary, did the case stand in a position that was satisfactory to the Members of the House of Commons? Both the right hon. Gentleman and himself now spoke in the capacity of independent Members of that House; but the testimony on both sides of the House was the same. The right hon. Gentleman said that the state in which the question now stood was not altogether honourable to the House of Commons, whilst his right hon. Friend the Colonial Secretary, in following him, commenced his remarks with an emphatic assertion that the Bishop of New Zealand had been "harshly treated." Now, without determining where the blame might rest, he fully felt the pressure of those declarations that between them all the Bishop of New Zealand had been harshly treated. Let it be granted that Dr. Selwyn left this country without any agreement or stipulation. Well, so he did; but, as his right hon. Friend the Colonial Secretary had observed, he had a fair title to expect the continuance of his salary. Now, what was the rule upon which Parliament acted with regard to the recipients of public money? It did not inquire whether they had a written covenant or a positive legal right; but wherever there was a moral claim there Parliament invariably discharged it in the fullest and most liberal manner. The question was, then, whether the House of Commons, not being under the influence of a Government, or of pledges of any sort, but as a collection of English Gentlemen sitting there to discharge their duties, could, or could not, with respect to those declarations and to the general rules of administration, refute and contradict what had been observed by the right hon. Baronet (Sir J. Pakington)—namely, that the present state of things was not honourable to the House of Commons: besides that, what had been said by his right hon. Friend the Colonial Secretary?—why, that the Bishop of New Zealand had been harshly treated. Now, with regard to the provision which the Colonial Secretary thought the Churchmen of New Zealand ought to have made for the Bishop, he was afraid that that provision did not exist, but he must say that it weighed upon his conscience, as a Member of the House of Commons, that the subject under consideration remained in the position in which it now did. It seemed that no remedy could be applied to it without the general assent of that House. Speaking, therefore, in his individual capacity, he would say that it would be more satisfactory, and at the same time more consonant with the principles of justice, and in accordance with the rule upon which Parliament usually acted, if they encouraged the Government by their general assent to propose a renewal of the grant, than by holding the Government down to the letter of the pledge, which was apparently unconsciously given in the first instance, and since reluctantly acknowledged, they permitted the existing state of things to continue, and left the Bishop of New Zealand entirely dependent on private and voluntary contributions for his support.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, that it had been stated that Bishop Selwyn would rather labour with his own hands to obtain a living than apply to the House of Commons. If he did so, he would only do what better men than himself—what the apostles themselves had done before him. They, too, had laboured with their hands. He could not see why the people of New Zealand should not support their own Bishop. The colony had always been understood to be a self-supporting one. It was founded at a considerable expense to this country. That expense had not been thrown away, and the colony was now in a most prosperous condition, and was certainly in a condition to support its own ministers. He hoped that House would never be called upon to support so unchristian a proposition as that for making the people of England pay for a Bishop of New Zealand.

MR. DISRAELI said, that he did not consider that the present moment was a convenient one to enter into any discussion of the principles on which the Colonial Church was formed or how it should be supported, and he should not, therefore, touch upon that subject. With regard to the incident in question, however, he looked upon it as a case which ought to be considered entirely in reference to the claim of the individual. His impression was—though he had not then the opportunity of consulting the documents, as they were in the Secretary of State's office—that the post of Bishop of New Zealand had been accepted by the eminent divine who held it on the clear understanding that a decent provision was to be made for the support of the Church in the colony. He would ask, therefore, assuming that to be the case, whether the House of Commons had not entered into an engagement on the subject? and that being the case, he could not help thinking that whatever might be the opinion of hon. Members on the general question of Church endowment, if such an engagement was entered into, involving as it did such a peculiar responsibility, it ought to be fulfilled. The only real obstacle to a large and liberal interpretation of the question was, it appeared, a pledge which it was alleged had been given by his right hon. Friend the Member for Droitwich when he held office. Now, he (Mr. Disraeli) had, however, no recollection of any words which fell from his right hon. Friend that would bear such an interpretation. He was much surprised, therefore, to hear it alleged as such against his right hon. Friend. He found, however, on the contrary, in the only authentic record of the proceedings of that House which was to be had, that his right hon. Friend had said, at the very outset of his remarks, "that he was averse to giving any distinct pledge on the subject." His right hon. Friend, therefore, could not be held as having given a distinct pledge when he professed his aversion to it at the very outset. He was therefore surprised to hear the right hon. Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. Gladstone) speak of a "distinct pledge." But his right hon. Friend, in his subsequent observations, stated that "probably, after the next year, no further grant would be required." Now "probably" is one of the most vague expressions in the language, and certainly could not by any process be converted into a distinct pledge. Therefore he (Mr. Disraeli) could not but think that, as regarded his right hon. Friend's observations, it was a most severe and erroneous interpretation to charge him with having made a distinct pledge to Parliament on the subject. Still he (Mr. Disraeli) thought that even if his right hon. Friend had given the pledge, it ought to be no obstacle to a large and generous dealing with the Bishop of New Zealand. It was, as he had stated, a case which should be considered in the light of an engagement as between Parliament and the individual in question. That being so, he must protest against the introduction into its settlement of questions of politics or of Ecclesiastical Government. In his opinion Her Majesty's Government should consider it in that spirit; and he therefore contended that the observations of his right hon. Friend in 1852, even if they were made as alleged, should be construed into a distinct pledge as against the arrangement.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he had no desire to oppose the consideration of any well-founded claim which the Bishop of New Zealand might have; but he must correct the misapprehension of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Disraeli) that the only obstacle to the renewal of the grant was a casual expression dropped in debate, without sufficient consideration, by the right hon. Baronet the Member for Droitwich (Sir J. Pakington). When he (Sir G. Grey) became Colonial Secretary, his attention was called to the Estimates which were prepared in the Colonial Office in the year 1852, when the right hon. Gentleman was Chancellor of the Exchequer, and the right hon. Baronet was Secretary for the Colonies, and which were signed by Lord Desart as Under Secretary. The Estimate for New Zealand amounted to £10,000 made up of several items, one of which was £600 for the salary of the Bishop. To that Estimate there was appended a note which was in exact accordance with what the right hon. Baronet was reported to have afterwards stated in that House, and which had been added in the Colonial Office by the directions of the right hon. Baronet, transmitted to the Treasury, and by the Treasury submitted to Parliament with the Estimates, in order to induce Parliament more readily to agree to the Vote. That note was in these terms, "This Estimate is less by £10,000 than that of last year. The Governor represents that this reduced amount is required for the present year, but it is proposed that it should be reduced to £5,000 next year, after which it is hoped no further aid will be needed." He (Sir G. Grey) was willing to admit that the expression of a hope did not amount to a distinct pledge, but there was no exception made with regard to the salary of the bishop, and the expectation was held out, that if the revenue of New Zealand were sufficient, none of the sums included in the Vote would, in future, be asked for from Parliament. In according with that distinct, he would not say pledge, but intimation, the succeeding Government thought it its duty not to place the salary of the Bishop of New Zealand upon the Estimates, because, by doing so, it would have broken faith with Parliament.

MR. ROEBUCK said, several speakers had observed, that it was dishonourable in the House of Commons to do as they had done. Now let them see who it was that was bound to pay the money. The person who appointed the Bishop was the noble Lord the Member for London (Lord J. Russell), and then he came down to the House and asked the House to pay the salary, and the House acceded to it for one year. It appeared to him, therefore, that the person who appointed the Bishop was the person really responsible, and, consequently, he would call upon the noble Lord the Member for London to pay hereafter the salary of the Bishop. But the question went much further. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Disraeli) said, he did not want the question of the Colonial Church to be discussed with the question now under consideration, but he (Mr. Roebuck) apprehended that they were obliged to discuss it. The Colonial Church was increased in this way: there were certain persons in this country who wanted to see the English Church spread over the globe, and they would effect that if they could by making the Colonies pay; but if the Colonies would not pay, this country must. The Colonies, it appeared, would not pay, and this country would not pay either. He was glad to hear that the words of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Droitwich had been acted upon by successive Governments. It was to be presumed that the Minister in his place endeavouring to induce the House of Commons to pass an Estimate knew the words which he was employing, and he did not think any Member of that House would put the interpretation upon the words of the right hon. Member for Droitwich that had been put upon them by the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli). The right hon. Gentleman thought that the colony of New Zealand would pay, but he was mistaken, and because a Minister of the Crown chose to appoint a Bishop of New Zealand, it was assumed that the House of Commons would vote his salary out of the taxes of the country.

MR. HILDYARD said, he rose to make a suggestion which, if acted upon, might prevent any practical injustice being done to the Bishop of New Zealand. That individual was one of the first scholars that the University of Cambridge had produced, he was a most excellent divine, and possessed every virtue which ought to adorn a Christian prelate. It was scarcely to be expected that the colony of New Zealand should have the means of rewarding so eminent a person in a manner suitable to his deserts, but England could well afford to do so; and though there might be some difficulty in continuing to him the salary originally granted, it was to be hoped that the Government would bear his claims in mind, and not neglect to requite them when the opportunity arose.

Subject dropped.

UNIVERSITY OF EDINBURGH— QUESTION.

MR. COWAN said, he wished to inquire what was the intention of the Government with regard to the professorship of military surgery in the University of Edinburgh? The office had become vacant upwards of six months ago, through the lamented death of Sir John Ballingall, and no steps had been taken as yet towards the appointment of a successor. The chair left vacant by the death of Sir William Hamilton, he understood, was to be filled up in about a fortnight. He would take that opportunity also of bearing testimony to the devoted heroism of Dr. Mackenzie, who perished in the Crimea after the battle of the Alma. He hoped the condition of the University of Edinburgh, justly prizing, as it did, its medical school, would be considered by the Government.

MR. FREDERICK PEEL replied, that the chair of Military Surgery would be retained, and the authorities of the University had made provision for a course of lectures pending the appointment of a new professor.

IMPROVEMENT OF LANDS COMMIS- SIONERS—QUESTION.

LORD LOVAINE said, he wished to ask a question of the hon. Gentleman the Secretary of the Treasury to the following effect:—A sum of £5,000 had been applied for by the town council of Alnwick for the improvement of lands belonging to the corporation, and the improvement was commenced accordingly. But the town council found it impossible to get the money from the Treasury, because the Commissioners would not certify, though a year and a half had elapsed. The result was, that proceedings had been taken against twenty-three members of the town council.

MR. WILSON said, that in so far as certain improvements referred to in a petition from the freemen of the town of Alunwick came within the terms of the Act which authorised advances for purposes of drainage, the Drainage Commissioners would be prepared to lend money to the amount of £5,000, but this transaction was limited to arable lands, and did not extend to pastures.

PAYMASTERS OF THE IRISH CONSTABULARY.

MR. SERJEANT O'BRIEN said, he now rose to call the attention of the House to the case of the late paymasters of constabulary in Ireland, and to the compensation allowed to them on the abolition of their office. The office had been created in 1836, when eighteen paymasters were appointed at salaries of £200 a year each, and a considerable expense was incurred by the gentlemen appointed, as the regulations required they should reside in the respective counties to which they were appointed. Their offices were, however, abolished in 1851, by which means a considerable saving was effected to the public revenue; but as they had been led to expect that their situations would be permanent, and as, moreover, they were removed for reasons wholly irrespective of their own conduct or fitness, it was obvious that they were entitled to liberal treatment at the hands of the Government. In 1850, when the abolition of these offices was in contemplation, a correspondence on the subject of the claims of their occupants passed between the Irish Government, the Lords of the Treasury, and Lord Clarendon, then Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, and that noble Lord had recommended that they should be liberally dealt with. Sir Duncan M'Gregor also had recommended that the gentlemen so situated should get £100 a year each. The recommendation of Lord Clarendon, however, through Sir Thomas Redington, then Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant, was that they should get, in proportion to their former salaries and length of service, the sums respectively of £150, £120, and £100, per annum each. The sums given to them nevertheless were—those officers who had served fourteen years and a half £42 per annum, instead of £150; and those who had served ten years £36 per annum; while those who had served less than six years got no annual payment, but were paid gratuities respectively of £104, £77, £63, £51, £34, and, as if the Treasury meant to try every possible scale, the last got nothing at all. That was not the way in which the Government had dealt with the Irish Poor Law Inspectors at the commencement of last Session, for those gentlemen had got £400, £330, and £200 a year, upon salaries of £700, £500, and £300, their services ranging from three to fifteen years. There was a provision in the Act of 1851, abolishing the office of paymaster of the Irish Constabulary to the effect that the retirement should be regulated by the Superannuation Act of 1834; and in that Act there was also a power given to the Treasury to award compensation even beyond the scale laid down in the Act. He was surprised that the Treasury should, in this case, not have exercised the power given by that Act in a manner more favourable to claims of those gentlemen whose diligence and good service had been so highly commended by the Irish Government in the correspondence which took place on the subject. Again, in reference to the retirement of four gentlemen who had held office under the Metropolitan Board of Health, the Government had proposed, and the House had granted, allowances to two of them who had served eleven years, and whose salaries were £1,000 a year each, of £800 a year each, and to two who had served nine years £500 a year each. There was abundant authority in the cases he had referred to, and in the Estimates, to prove that persons whose claims were not stronger than were the claims of the parties for whom he pleaded had obtained compensation. He only asked the House to apply to those gentlemen, without being unmindful of the public service, the same principle as had been applied to so many other similar cases. He hoped Government would, under the circumstances, give an assurance that they would reconsider their decision, and not conceive themselves bound by what had taken place.

SIR DENHAM NORRIS said, he thought the case of the paymasters of constabulary was exceedingly hard, and showed the absolute necessity of administrative reform. It was impossible that the civil service of the country could be conducted in a satisfactory manner unless all classes of employés felt that if it were found necessary to abolish the offices which they held, they would be dealt with upon the same principle. When the office of paymasters of constabulary was established the appointments were regarded as permanent; while the office of Poor-Law Inspectors, which was subsequently established, was regarded as merely temporary. The office of paymasters of constabulary had been abolished, and the number of Poor Law Inspectors had been considerably diminished; but those who had held what had been regarded as permanent offices did not receive as compensation more than one-sixtieth or one-seventieth of their salaries, while Mr. Dillon, who had been only three years a Poor-Law Inspector, at £500 a year, had retired upon half his salary. He considered that such inequality of treatment in the case of public servants could by no means be justified.

VISCOUNT MONCK said, it was not in his power to hold out any hope that the Treasury, as at present constituted, would reverse the decision which had already been given upon the subject, and he thought great public inconvenience would arise if one Board of Treasury were to reverse the decisions of their predecessors without very good reasons. In 1848 provision was made to enable this class of officers to take a pension on retiring, and the option was given them of placing themselves under the operation of the Act by which the pension was provided. Those individuals whose case was now before the House distinctly refused to be placed under the provisions of the Act, but two years afterwards those offices were abolished, and the Treasury then agreed to give them such compensation as they were fairly entitled to. It was rather too much for those gentlemen, after having refused to avail themselves of the provision for a pension, to come forward now and complain that they had not received greater consideration. He trusted the House would support the Treasury in this instance on a matter which affected the expenditure of the public money.

LORD NAAS said, the noble Lord treated the question as one of superannuation, whereas the question was one of compensation for the abolition of their offices. It was true that in 1841 those gentlemen applied to be put on the superannuation fund and were then refused, but seven years afterwards the offer was certainly made to them, but coupled with such conditions as to induce them to decline it.

CAPE OF GOOD HOPE—QUESTION.

MR. LIDDELL said, he wished to put a question to the noble Lord at the head of the Government, of which he had not had an opportunity of giving him notice, but which he hoped he would pardon him for putting, considering the personal interest he took in the matter. He alluded to the sinister rumours which had appeared in the morning journals respecting the state of affairs at the Cape of Good Hope; and he wished to ask whether the noble Lord considered those rumours correct, and whether any orders had been given to reinforce the military stations on the frontiers, which he could say, from personal knowledge, were very slenderly provided with troops.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Certainly, Sir, my right hon. Friend the Colonial Secretary received yesterday some accounts which led to the apprehension that disturbances might occur on the frontiers, such as the hon. Gentleman has alluded to. I do not understand that there was any actual outbreak, and such steps had been taken as would guard against the possibility of the recurrence of anything unpleasant. I do not understand that the accounts contain any reports of actual occurrences, but simply that there had been indications of disturbances between the Dutch settlers and the natives, and there was an apprehension that those disturbances might extend to the English settlers.

MILITIA REWARDS—QUESTION.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he wished to know what was the specific rule for distributing rewards to the Militia regiments which had been disembodied? Applications had been made to him, stating that officers and men had not received the usual gratuities.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, if the officers and men of any regiment had not received the gratuities they were entitled to, it must be owing to some mistake, and the proper course would be to make application to the Department of War. He was not aware that any distinction had been established that would shut out any one regiment from the largess which it had been agreed to give to the Militia.

Motion agreed to.

House, at its rising, to adjourn till Monday.

Order for Third Reading read.

MR. HADFIELD said, he wished to point out the necessity for consolidating the whole of the Church-Building Acts. At the same time he strongly objected to the compensation clause which the Bill contained. Originally the Commission was intended to continue only ten years, but the time had extended to thirty-eight years. Nevertheless, it could hardly be asserted that the parties who had served under the Commission received their appointments under the expectation that at the expiration of the Commission they would be entitled to compensation for life. He thought that if the Commission were to cease altogether, that would be the best thing that could happen.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he would admit that it was desirable that the numerous Church-Building Acts should be consolidated, but the present Bill could not operate to obstruct such consolidation.

Bill read 3^o.

On the question that the Bill pass,

LORD ROBERT CECIL said, he objected that certain payments which had formerly been made out of the Consolidated Fund would now be placed by the Bill on the annual Estimates in the shape of compensations. He should, therefore, move the omission of the words transferring those charges to the annual Estimates.

MR. HADFIELD said, he thought it would be better to move the omission of the clause altogether.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, the way to perpetrate jobs was to get a Bill passed through the House at two o'clock in the morning, and to afford no time for the provisions inserted in the Bill to be overhauled. His view of the salaries in the Bill was, that such matters ought to come annually under the review of the House.

MR. SPOONER said, he wished to know why the persons to be compensated were to have compensation, when they took their situations with the full knowledge that the places were to be only temporary?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, the persons to be compensated had been servants of the Commission for a number of years, and it was, therefore, thought that long service entitled them to compensation. With regard to the salaries not being brought under annual revision, the reason was that they were never charged on the Consolidated Fund; and it was thought to be more in conformity with the established rule to transfer them to the Estimates.

Bill passed.

PARTNERSHIP AMENDMENT (No. 2) BILL.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair."

MR. MUNTZ said, the more he saw of the Bill the worse he thought of it, for he was satisfied it was one of the worst measures that had ever been introduced into Parliament. Instead of being called a Partnership Amendment Bill, it ought to be called a Bill for the encouragement of fraud, collusion, and robbery. Who was it that wanted the Bill? Certainly not the commercial community. He saw no reason why they should be dragooned into a Bill by the Board of Trade which was not wanted. If he were to take upon himself the business of a Chancery reformer, he would be called a conceited fool for his pains, and he did not see much difference between that and the Board of Trade undertaking to legislate in matters about which it knew nothing at all. A man in business, who was in bad odour and had little credit, could not do much harm; but if he got somebody of whom the world was to know nothing, to lend him capital secretly, he would be able to get credit on the strength of it, and then, the capital being quietly withdrawn, he might suddenly break and cheat his creditors in the most barefaced manner. He was satisfied that the commercial world did not want the Bill, and he should therefore move that it be committed that day three months.

Amendment proposed to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words, "This House will upon this day three months resolve itself into the said Committee," instead thereof.

MR. WILKINSON said, he would remind the hon. Gentleman that all the great reforms which had been effected of late years had been carried in opposition to persons of experience, and therefore he did not think the hon. Gentleman's remarks on the Board of Trade were well founded. Free trade and the penny post had been opposed, the one by the growers of corn, and the other by the officials of the Post Office; but both measures had proved of the greatest benefit to the community, notwithstanding the predictions of those whose opinion might have been supposed deserving of attention. He thought the Bill would turn out to be a most valuable measure, and in his belief it was one generally desired by the trading community.

MR. BIGGS said, that so far from agreeing with the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Muntz), he thought the Bill the most valuable one of the Session; and he would appeal to the House whether there was not a universal feeling in its favour. He regarded the present law as antiquated and semi-barbaric, and he must consider the Birmingham school very doubtful authorities in monetary matters.

MR. SPOONER, for his own part, had not conversed with any person on the subject of the Bill who had not denounced it in the terms in which it had been so properly described by his hon. Friend the Member for Birmingham (Mr. Muntz). He might illustrate the working of the measure by supposing a case which was very likely to occur if the Bill became law. Three persons might enter into partnership, two openly, the third secretly. The first two, it might be, had no money, and the funds were advanced by the third, who thus gave the concern a status and a credit which it could never without his assistance have obtained. The secret partner, having free access to the books, might discover that the trade was not going on well, and cautiously withdraw his capital little by little. In that way he might get back all he had advanced, in addition to the sums he had withdrawn, in the form of imagined profits. The partnership would then collapse, and the creditors who had been seduced into trusting the firm on the faith of appearances, arising from the advances of the secret partner, would thus be defrauded of their money. If the House went into Committee, he should propose a clause compelling any secret partner to refund all he had withdrawn during the three years previous to the insolvency of the firm of which he had been a member.

MR. ROEBUCK said, he could not consent to the rejection of the Bill in so summary a manner. To the general principle of the Bill, by which it was sought to enable a man to obtain a capital by subscriptions from various quarters, he entirely assented; but there were one or two precautions which he thought were absolutely requisite. The evils apprehended by the hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Spooner), that a man might improperly obtain a reputation and credit by trading upon a loan, might be guarded against by requiring all loans made under the Act to be registered in some public record, a provision which might easily be inserted in Committee. If such a clause as this were adopted they would have all the benefits of combination without any danger to the public; and he should, therefore, support the Motion for going into Committee.

MR. GLYN said, that if he had the slightest idea that the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Lowe) would assent to the introduction of any such precaution as that suggested by the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck), he would not support the Amendment; but as the Bill now stood, and remembering the evidence taken before the Committee of 1850-1, he must avail himself of every opportunity to get rid of what, in his belief, was a most obnoxious measure. Although that Committee made no Report except to recommend the issuing of a Royal Commission, yet the evidence taken before it was of great value, and fully established three points. The first point was, that the repeal of the usury laws had rendered it necessary for the protection of persons in trade that there should be an alteration of the laws of partnership; the second was the necessity of an alteration of the bankruptcy laws contemporaneously with that of those of partnership; and the third was that, while it was right that persons dealing in money should be allowed to make contracts exactly like persons dealing in other articles, that permission must be accompanied with a provision for the necessary publicity of such contracts. A great deal had been said during the progress of the Bill relative to the difficulties and frauds of legislation; but he was not aware of any other means by which that publicity could be attained. None of the points established by the evidence had been provided for in the Bill. Another reason why he objected to the further progress of the Bill was that, in moving the second reading, the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Lowe) said that the proposed measure was not to be considered as an alteration of the law of partnership, but only as a remedy for something which had accidentally occurred from a legal decision with that law, to which he (Mr. Glyn) could not assent; and that if he were encouraged, he should be happy to bring in an extended Bill upon the subject. [Mr. LOWE: Would the hon. Member move for a Select Committee?] To move for a Select Committee was the very thing which he (Mr. Glyn) wanted and had recommended, but if he were prepared to take that course, why should the right hon. Gentleman endeavour to force upon the House a measure of which he (Mr. Glyn) had heard no commercial man express a favourable opinion? The right hon. Gentleman had not made the slightest provision for the summary punishment of frauds. In all countries where the law at all resembled the proposed measure, as in France and Holland, there were very stringent bankruptcy laws; but, while introducing the Bill now before the House, the right hon. Gentleman proposed to leave the bankruptcy laws of the country precisely as they were, although their stringency was being daily diminished. He hoped that the House would take the matter into its own hands, and would induce his right hon. Friend to postpone the measure to another Session.

MR. MALINS said, he regretted that his hon. Friend the Member for Kendal (Mr. Glyn), who had hitherto supported the principles of limited liability, had made a retrograde movement, and was now opposed to them. Notwithstanding what his hon. Friend had stated, he would assure the House that he had scarcely met anybody who was not in favour of limited liability, and he would remind his hon. Friend that that principle was supported by three out of five of the eminent commercial men who were examined before the Committee of 1850-51. The usury laws having been repealed, a man might advance money for others to trade with at the rate of 20, 30, or 100 per cent, might stand in the place of a creditor, and might take, not only the property, but the persons of his debtors, leaving the other creditors to whistle for their money, not once only, as in the case supposed by the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Spooner), but ten times. Now, all that the Bill under consideration proposed was, that the money might be advanced, not at a fixed rate of interest, but in consideration of the reception of a certain share of any profits which might be made by the trading. Nothing could be more reasonable than such a proposal.

The Bill would put an end to the contradictions and inconsistencies of the present system, and would not fail to operate beneficially on the general interests of commerce. It was no uncommon thing for a trader to employ a confidential person to carry on his business for him, yet such was the absurdity of the law as it now stood, that if that servant received a share of the profits he was a partner, whereas if he received a sum equivalent to a share in the profits he was not a partner. The distinction, therefore, was preposterous, and the Bill under consideration very properly contemplated its abolition. The principle of the measure was undoubtedly sound, and, as there was no reasonable cause to apprehend that it would have any other than a salutary operation, it was to be hoped that the House would not hesitate to sanction it.

MR. CROSSLEY said, he must deny that the Bill had any connection whatever with the principle of limited liability, for a partner under its provisions would have no liability at all. It was said that a man might lend money at any rate of interest; but there was this difference in the two cases—that a creditor, unlike a partner, had no right to examine the books.

MR. BASS said, that millionaires might be opposed to the Bill, but men of moderate capital were generally in favour of it. The evils apprehended by the hon. Member for North Warwickshire from the Bill were every day in operation under the present law. The objections taken to the Bill were entirely of a nature for discussion in Committee. He hoped, therefore, that the House would go into Committee.

MR. G. BUTT said, he was really surprised to hear his hon. and learned Friend the Member for Wallingford (Mr. Malins) contend that the Bill embodied the principle of limited liability. Its principle, as had been truly observed, was no liability. Had it carried out the principle of limited liability, he would have supported it; but he denied that it did so. He would put a case. Suppose a man advanced to a trader £1,000 on condition of receiving seven-eighths of the profits, he would receive his money back over and over again; and when the trader failed, he would still be a creditor for the amount. He was as friendly to limited liability as any one, but the Bill would enable persons to take away the profits of business without incurring any liability at all. Under the second clause, an agent or factor who took a share of profits was exempted from partnership liabilities. The result of that would be, that men would engage as agents, servants, or factors, on such terms as to receive the greater share of the profits, and would escape liability altogether. The third clause was no less mischievous. It would enable retiring partners to pay themselves, in the shape of profits, the capital they professed to leave in the concern over and over again. Where, then, was the principle of limited liability? It was, in fact, a Bill to enable persons to share in the profits of business without being liable for a single farthing. It would give facilities for all sorts of fraud.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he hoped that the House would go into Committee, and there continue that discussion, which appeared to be carried on by anticipation on the Motion that Mr. Speaker should leave the chair. Most of the objections taken by hon. Gentlemen applied to the details of the Bill, and not to its principle. It was said that the measure was not founded on limited liability; but, at all events, it was founded on the propriety of doing away with unlimited liability. It was needless to remind the House of instances illustrative of the necessity of such a change; yet he might be permitted to cite a somewhat remarkable one—namely, that of Sir Walter Scott, who, if he mistook not, was a dreadful sufferer from the prejudicial operation of the law of unlimited liability. It was said that public opinion was opposed to the Bill. Now, he must confess that he thought, on the contrary, that public opinion was strongly in its favour. The country was convinced that the law of partnership required fundamental alteration; and nothing would tend more to relieve a large portion of the community from the impediments that now prevented them from turning their small capital to profitable account than the Bill which his right hon. Friend the Vice-President of the Board of Trade had introduced. It was somewhat singular that the opponents of this measure were chiefly the great capitalists, or individuals whose position enabled them to wield a large capital; while, on the other hand, its warmest advocates were persons connected with that more numerous class who were possessed of small capital. He thought that prima facie the inference to be drawn from that fact was, that the Bill was a good one. Be that, however, as it might, it was certainly remarkable that the hostility to the measure proceeded from—he would not say “the monopolists,” for that was an odious and offensive term, but—the few who had the advantage of a large capital in conducting their commercial transactions, while the friends of the Bill included those who were anxious to benefit people of humbler means by letting loose their small capital, and giving them freer access to the general market. He trusted that when the measure got into Committee, it would be found to be worthy of the attention of the House, and calculated to advance the prosperity of the community.

MR. T. BARING said, that if argument were wanting against going into Committee on the Bill, it would have been amply supplied by the speech of the noble Lord who had just sat down. The noble Lord had alleged that the contest on the question lay between the few who had the command of a large capital and the many who had but little; and in a very good-humoured way he ventured to impute motives of not the most honourable kind to the opponents of the measure. Now, he must protest against a person occupying the high position of leader of the House of Commons and Prime Minister of the Crown attempting to excite a cry against the capitalists of the country, and making it appear to the people out of doors that the question at issue was one of monopoly—a disagreeable term, indeed, as the noble Lord had admitted, but which he, nevertheless, did not refrain from launching most unjustly against the opponents of the Bill. The noble Lord, he apprehended, required to be reminded that the question before the House was one of principle, namely, whether they should go into Committee; and so far from all the objections taken that night being such as could best be treated in Committee, the objection stated by the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck) was in his (Mr. T. Baring's) opinion fatal to the principle of the measure. That principle was that everything should be done privately and secretly—that there should be no publicity either as to the amount and the duration of a loan or investment, or as to the time when the money was withdrawn from a concern. Would the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Lowe) consent to modify his Bill so as to adopt the system of registration and publicity on those matters? If he did, he must go directly in the teeth of the doctrines he enunciated in the speech with which he introduced his measure. It was manifest, therefore, that they were now debating a question of principle—the principle whether they were to establish a system different from any ever before adopted in any country, and completely at variance with the Bill which was proposed to the House by the predecessor of the right hon. Gentleman, and supported by the noble Lord (Viscount Palmerston) with the same warmth and, also, if he recollected rightly, with the very same insinuations against capitalists in which he had thought proper to indulge on the present occasion. Those charges were wholly unworthy of the noble Lord. If they wanted investments for small capitalists, that took them to the subject of joint-stock companies. The Bill before them dealt with capital applied to the carrying on of trade; and he (Mr. Baring) viewed it in regard to its effect upon the general credit of the country. When the vastness of the credit brought into play throughout the world to carry on the commerce of England was considered, it would be seen how important it was to maintain that credit unshaken, and, therefore, he looked with the greatest suspicion on a change not demanded by the commercial community, and which must have a tendency to diminish confidence in the commercial system of the country. Allusion had been made to the fact that persons were now allowed to lend money at high rates of interest, but that was a different thing from the credit given upon the faith of money advanced. No man would give credit to another who was known to be trading upon borrowed capital for which he was to pay a high rate of interest, but any man would give credit to an establishment in which it was known that a man of great capital had invested money for the purpose of obtaining a share of the profits. Loans known to be obtained upon usurious rates of interest, would detract from the credit of any house. He should vote for the Amendment of the hon. Member for Birmingham (Mr. Muntz), for he believed the Bill was not required at all. There was no want of capital under the present system for the full purposes of trade, and the Bill, moreover, was opposed to the Report of the Commissioners who had inquired into the practicability of reforms in the mercantile laws. It was said that the Bill was justified by the evidence which had been taken. There were, no doubt, many opinions expressed in favour of the change, but there were also opinions of equal authority against it, and the evidence was entirely against the principle of the Bill, which did not recognise the necessity of publicity and registration. Every witness from the United States, from France, from Holland, or any country where the principle of limited liability prevailed was opposed to the principle of the Bill. Upon those grounds he, therefore, hoped the House would call upon the right hon. Gentleman to withdraw the Bill for the present Session. The Bill was not so necessary now, as the right hon. Gentleman the Vice-President of the Board of Trade had announced his intention, at a future period, to introduce a Bill for changing the character of partnerships, and it would be much better, he considered, to deal with the whole subject upon a wide and comprehensive scale. If it were enacted that men of capital could receive profits without becoming partners, the result would be that, when hard times came, every creditor would set about collecting evidence to ascertain whether the lenders of capital had made themselves liable as partners in any other way—whether they had given advice, had examined the books, or frequented the office, and thus the Bill would become an endless source of profit to the lawyers, but a source of ruin to many who might be tempted by its provisions.

MR. MITCHELL said, he must also complain that the noble Lord at the head of the Government had thrown out unworthy taunts against the mercantile members of that House, and had told them that their objections to the measure would be better stated in Committee. But they were called upon to determine upon the principle of the Bill, which was limited liability without publicity, which was a most objectionable feature in any system of commercial legislation. He wished to know whether, in Committee, the Government would adopt those precautions against fraud which were embodied in the Joint-stock Companies Bill—that a person lending money should not be a creditor against the estate for that money, and that all partnerships in that form should be registered?

SIR JAMES GRAHAM said, presuming that the hon. Member for Birmingham would press his Amendment to a division, he would beg to join in the appeal which had been made to the Vice-President of the Board of Trade by the hon. Gentleman who had last addressed them. His own Vote would depend entirely upon the answer which might be given to that appeal. He could not forget that the Bill was opposed to the Report of a Commission and to the Reports of two Committees; and, although it was based upon certain evidence, it was upon evidence which did not warrant the Bill in its present shape. The great weight of testimony in favour of a measure of that description had been accompanied by statements of the necessity of publicity and various safeguards. There was a broad distinction between a man lending money on usurious interest and a person being admitted to share in the profits of the business in return for the loan of his money. The lender on usurious interest had great risks; he had no access to the accounts and knew nothing of the state of the profits. A person, however, receiving a share of the profits would have access to the accounts, would be cognisant of all the secret transactions of the concern, and might withdraw his money as opportunity offered, either immediately or gradually. He quite agreed with the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck) that the whole matter turned upon the question whether there should be publicity or not. If the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Lowe) said that in Committee he would be prepared to entertain propositions to insure publicity and to create safeguards, then he (Sir J. Graham) would vote for going into Committee. If, on the contrary, the right hon. Gentleman should regard such propositions as at variance with the principle of the Bill, he (Sir J. Graham) would feel bound to vote against going into Committee.

MR. LOWE said, the proposition made by the hon. Member for Bridport (Mr. Mitchell) and urged upon his acceptance by the right Baronet who had just resumed his seat reminded him that gold might be bought too dear. He should be glad to have the right hon. Baronet's support, but he would not purchase it at a price which he could not fairly pay. It had not been his intention to trouble the House upon this stage of the Bill, which had, in fact, been read a second time twice in the course of the session, after considerable discussion on each occasion; but, being challenged upon every point, and the last words of the right hon. Baronet sounding very much like an intimation of the probability that the Bill would not proceed any further, it was only right that he (Mr. Lowe) should briefly state the nature of the measure. The Bill certainly was not a Bill dealing with partnerships properly so called; that subject he had dealt with already. If a partnership wished to constitute itself in a shape to receive the privileges of limited liability, the Joint-stock Companies Bill, which was now in the House of Lords, offered facilities for that purpose. He thought it very doubtful whether the principle of limited liability should be applied to partnerships in the manner that had been shadowed forth by some hon. Members in the course of the discussion, but he would give no decided opinion at present upon that point. Whatever was done with the law of partnership, the law of principal and agent ought not to be destroyed. The Bill now under consideration, however, was not a Bill to alter the law of partnership, it was merely supplementary to the repeal of the usury laws. It was not a Bill to regulate the relation of partners inter se, nor with third parties, but to regulate the terms upon which capital should be advanced. He believed the Bill to be a beneficial one, for as the hon. Member for Tynemouth (Mr. Lindsay), in a pamphlet he had published, observed, talent was a drug and capital was a drug, but the union of capital with talent was rare, and so far from being a drug would be extremely valuable to society. The present Bill would, he believed, bring about that union, and it was most desirable that it should pass, as, if it were thrown over, great injustice would be done to single traders. The Joint-stock Companies Bill was almost certain to become law, and by it a host of Companies would be created to compete with traders in all kinds of business. [Ironical cries of "Hear, hear!"] He rejoiced at that circumstance. They had carried out the principle of free trade into the competition of capital. His notion of free trade was not a one-sided one, and having enabled Joint-stock Companies to compete with individual traders, it was only fair and just to give to the latter every reasonable liberty to compete with the Joint-stock Companies. Believing as he did that the Bill was a salutary measure, he was most anxious that it should also be an efficient Bill and carry into effect the principles upon which it professed to be founded. That principle was to facilitate the advance of capital upon the consideration of a participation in the profits, and he believed that advances upon such terms would be advantageous both to the borrowers and the lenders, because the latter would take nothing except when the borrower was fully able to pay, and thus his capital would never be incumbered with the payment of high interest. But the question which really pinched was—what was practicable? Hon. Gentlemen talked of safeguards being required, and that if they were introduced the Bill would be unobjectionable; but if too many safeguards were introduced, the Bill would be made safe altogether, for it would be inoperative and not work at all. The question which, as a practical man, he had to decide was, how many safeguards could be introduced without making the Bill a dead letter? He wished the Bill to pass, and he wished, at the same time, that it should be effective and carry out the object it professed to have in view. That, however, would depend not altogether on the nature of the Bill itself, but on the facilities now given to other transactions of a similar nature. Where you put a duty on an article you must look to the probable operations of the smuggler, and in the same way, when you imposed safeguards upon a particular kind of contract, which you were still anxious should be entered into, you had to consider what alternatives were possessed by persons for whom you legislated, and whether they would enter into those contracts with the safeguards you proposed to lay down. Now, he found that since the Committee of 1851, alluded to by the hon. Member for Kendal (Mr. Glyn), two changes in the law had taken place—namely, the repeal of the usury laws, and the Joint-stock Companies Act recently passed; and he asked himself, when you had got your safeguards—the publicity, the registration and the other machinery of the kind proposed—who would take advantage of the Bill at all, who would be disposed to avail themselves of its provisions? How could you expect people, when they could obtain nearly the same advantages by other methods of proceeding, to have recourse to this measure? On what principle of human nature was it expected that a man who could lend his money at a fixed rate of interest, without depending on the profits, without publicity, without registration, would put aside those facilities in order to involve himself in all the intricacies now proposed? It was perfectly clear that the effect of such a provision would be to perpetuate an injurious system now in operation—namely, the practice which prevailed, with regard to trading concerns, of having a certain amount of their capital supplied for a short period by dealers in money. That was a system which he looked upon as injurious to the trade of the country; it was far better that that capital should be supplied by persons who were more intimately concerned with the business carried on than the mere money-lender or bill-discounter. Under the system now proposed, however, you would be poisoning the scale in favour of the money-lender and bill-discounter, and against the persons whom it was wished to emancipate (so to speak) by the Bill now before the House. What was there in the nature of loans, based on a share of the profits, which should make them so utterly different from other kinds of loans? The only difference between such loans and those of the ordinary character was, that there was something to arrive at before the interest was paid, namely, the amount of the profits; whereas in the other case the amount of interest was settled by exact stipulation between the parties. Was there anything in that principle which warranted so great a difference in the manner of treating the two cases, so that whereas in the one instance you allowed the lender the fullest licence to deal with the borrower as he thought proper, without in the least interfering with the nature of the transaction, you should think it necessary in the other instance to tie up the transaction by every species of burdensome restriction which man could conceive or invent? It was said that the man who lent money on profits had access to the books. That, however, was a mistake. He apprehended that, practically, the mere lending of money on profits would not give a man the right to go into the counting-house and turn over the books as he pleased. In equity the lender might have such a right, but how many contracts would there be in which it would be left to a Court of Equity to decide in the matter? Would it not be left to be decided in the agreement between the parties? or would it not be left to arbitration? in which case there would be no difficulty at all in the matter. What was there in all this to warrant the wonderful difference made in treating the two kinds of loans? But go a little further. How long had it been laid down that a man, when he advanced his money, might not stipulate for any advantage he thought proper? In consideration for a loan at fixed interest he might stipulate for security, he might stipulate for access to the books, and for any other advantage which he chose to insist on. Take, however, a case:—Suppose a man advanced money on security on condition that he received some portion of the profit—would you take his security from him because he stipulated to be paid in profits instead of a high rate of interest, which would have covered the probable profits? Now, hon. Members should be aware that all those things were to be considered; the line must be drawn, and he could not conceive where that line was to be drawn. It appeared to him, under all the circumstances, that he should be inexcusable if he consented to the proposed system of registration. He looked upon that system as the most cruel trap, the most perfect delusion which could possibly be devised—as one which would cause more hardships, more ruin, more misery than any provisions which could be imagined—as a system which would be the fruitful mother of every species of fraud and iniquity. The first words of the clause were these—

“No person who may hereafter lend money to a trader in the manner authorised by this Act for a fixed period of time shall be deemed to be a partner.”

So that, if in the slightest particular the very numerous and intricate provisions of the Act were departed from—the least omission or inadvertence rendered a lender, instead of not being liable at all, accountable to the last shilling of his fortune. A simple error in the description, an error in a figure, an inadvertence for which he might not be in the slightest degree responsible, made him liable to the extent of every farthing he possessed for the debts of the concern. Well, then, he said, better—a thousand times better—have no Act at all than such a trap as that would prove to be. Again, it was proposed to register the name, the place of business, the description of the lender, and of the trader borrowing, and the amount of the loan. In France, where the system had been in force for a considerable period, it was found that the loans on terms of receiving profits, unlike loans on terms of fixed interest, gave a degree of credit to the borrower. If persons were found willing to lend to a concern on condition that they should only be repaid when profits began to be made, that would obviously be one means of creating confidence in such a concern. You therefore gave people, if fraudulently disposed, an opportunity, under the system of registration, of putting down the name of any great capitalist, and of entering him as a lender, thus imparting a fictitious credit to the concern. Then as to the amount of the loan. Fraudduently disposed persons might put down any amount they pleased, and might refer to the registry and show that they had this amount of capital at their disposal. What made the matter worse was, that the registrar was to ascertain, by a quasi judicial process the genuineness of the loan which would give rise to the notion that that officer had made inquiry into the bonâ fides of the transaction, whereas it would really establish nothing of the sort and could lead to nothing at all. Before registering the loan the registrar was to require the production of the instrument for securing or manifesting the same, and such other evidence of such loan as he shall deem sufficient,” and then he would certify that it had been paid. But suppose it had been paid. In the case of the fraudulent collusion suggested, what was to prevent the loan being recalled the next day after being so paid? Then any variation of the contract, or any change of the terms, established a new contract, that is to say, if it was not registered at the very moment it made a man again unlimitedly liable to the creditors of the concern. There were a great many points of a similar nature which he might bring forward; but he had said enough, he thought, to show the objections he entertained to the proposals made; and, entertaining those objections, he considered that he should be culpable indeed if he held out any hope that he would assent to those proposals. Their adoption would be, in his opinion, a thousand times worse than having no Bill at all. He had, therefore, no difficulty in meeting the challenge of his right hon. Friend (Sir J. Graham) by saying that he could not adopt a system of registration which would be looked upon as bonâ fide, but would be infinitely worse than none at all; and he could scarcely imagine how such Amendments could be introduced by any Gentleman favourable to the principle of the Bill. For his part, he was prepared to stand on the principle of the Bill, which was not, as had been truly said, that of limited liability; it was not the principle that a partner should limit his liability; it was not the principle of commandite, which was devised for the purpose of cheating the usury laws; but it was to enable private partnerships, under the competition to which they were now to be subjected, to increase their capital by removing from those who were willing to advance capital the present heavy restrictions and penalties. That was the principle of the measure, and he would not sacrifice the carrying out of that principle by holding out any promise of yielding to the proposals to which he had adverted.

MR. CARDWELL said, he must call upon the House to observe that, as it had been put by his right hon. Friend the Vice-President of the Board of Trade, they were not going to vote upon the question of limited liability, and, therefore, hon. Members who voted against the proposal to go into Committee would not be voting against that principle. He had been under the belief that to his right hon. Friend was due the credit of having sent to the other House in the present Session of Parliament a comprehensive and useful measure for giving limited liability to Joint-stock Companies; but how great must be the disappointment with which they had listened to his right hon. Friend, who told them that any attempt, with regard to this measure, to give that simple publicity which many hon. Gentlemen thought essential to the bona fides of those transactions must necessarily be so impracticable that it would be a thousand times better the Bill should not pass at all. Now what the advocates of publicity desired was, that the Bill now under consideration should follow the precedent of the Joint-stock Companies' Act. The hon. Member for Kendal (Mr. Glyn) identified himself with the principle of publicity, and argued that notice should be given to the whole community of the nature of the partnerships about to be created. The Joint-stock Companies Act carried out the fundamental principle of our own law, and what was also, he believed, a fundamental principle of the law of every commercial country in the world—that persons might limit their liability inter se, but that, if they limited their liability against an unknowing creditor, he should not be bound by a contract made behind his back—that freedom of trade should not be extended to freedom of fraud—and that the creditor should not be governed by arrangements made collusively without his knowledge. It was found that that principle of the law of this country operated as a restraint upon commercial transactions, and, therefore, in the Joint-stock Companies' Act a mode of registration and publicity was devised, and it was provided that all persons dealing with a partnership incorporated under that Act, since they had the means of ascertaining the limits of its liability, should be deemed to have dealt with it as a limited liability partnership. The hon. Member for Kendal, and others who agreed with him in opinion, said, "Be consistent in your legislation, and do not in the same Session, and on the same subject, assent to two measures which are diametrically opposed in principle." How could his right hon. Friend (Mr. Lowe) tell them that the very same regulation for which he had obtained much credit for sending up to the other House in the larger Bill would be delusive, impracticable, and mischievous, if it were introduced into the measure now before them. The right hon. Gentleman told them that the Bill did not relate to the question of partnership, but that it was intended to supplement the usury laws. Common persons, he apprehended, would judge of the object of a Bill from its endorsement, and he found the endorsement of the Bill was "Partnership Amendment (No. 2) Bill." The House had twice, during the present Session, agreed to amend the law of partnership, and he would now ask them, if they went into Committee, to do that which, by assenting to the second reading of the Bill, they had determined to do—namely, to amend the law of partnership. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Lowe) said, they would act with injustice towards private partnerships if they did not pass this Bill, because they had given to great partnerships all the privileges and advantages of the Joint-stock Companies' Bill, thereby raising up competitors against smaller partnerships. Now what was the natural inference to be deduced from that observation of his right hon. Friend? Why place the smaller partnerships precisely upon the same footing as the larger, let there be perfect equality—a clear stage and no favour. Every argument urged by the right hon. Gentleman against the introduction of reasonable precautions into his Bill told with precisely the same force against all the precautions which he had himself inserted in the Bill that had been sent up to the other House. [Mr. Lowe said that no conditions had been inserted in the latter measure.] His right hon. Friend said that no conditions had been inserted in the Bill sent up to the other House. Possibly his right hon. Friend might be interested to learn what were some of the provisions of the Bill which had been sent up to the other House. That Bill expressly required a registration of the names of partners; a statement of the objects with which the partnership was established; a declaration whether the liability of the shareholders was to be limited or unlimited; a statement of the amount of capital; and it provided also that the word "limited" should be added to the title of the company; yet the right hon. Gentleman said that the measure contained no provisions for the protection of the public. Surely those conditions would suffice to give universal notice of the character of the company, and would afford a protection against fraud to the public. But if the Bill was not only inconsistent with the principle of the law of this country, but also inconsistent with the measure for the regulation of joint-stock banks, which had been sent to the other House, upon what authority was it founded? Did the two Committees of that House, which had considered the subject, recommend a measure of this description? They did not. They recommended a measure similar to that which had been suggested by the hon. Member for Kendal (Mr. Glyn). Did the Commission recommend this Bill? No. One-half the members of the Commission—for there was a difference of opinion on the subject—recommended that some arrangement should be made with regard to such loans as were contemplated by the Bill, but not without safeguards against fraud. The example of foreign countries had been appealed to, and the case of America had been mentioned. He had in his hand the revised Statutes of Massachusetts, and he found that there was not one restriction that had been called for to-night that was not in force in that State. How could it be contended, then, that such restrictions would be impracticable, mischievous, and cruel in this country? What was the law of France and Germany on the subject? The speech of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Lowe) might lead hon. Members to imagine that in France no regulations existed for the protection of the public. He would not enter into a dissertation upon the bankruptcy laws of other countries, but he believed the stringency of those laws afforded greater protection to the public than was given by the laws of Great Britain. The Leipsic Chamber of Commerce, speaking of the Code de Commerce, said—

"It is necessary that this extract (a general notification of the character of the partnership), besides the names of the managing partners, the commercial objects of the newly-established company, the commencement and the termination of the period for which it is formed, should contain the number (not, however, the names) of the commanditaires, and the amount of the funds advanced or to be advanced by them. Other commercial codes require also the publication of the names of the individual commanditaires."

The right hon. Gentleman, then, could not appeal to the law of America, of France, or of Europe; but it was said that the law was found to be satisfactory in those countries where there was an absence of restriction. Among the eminent men who composed the Commission there was not one whose opinion on such a subject was more valuable than that of Mr. Slater, who said—

"But it is by no means certain that partnerships en commandite, even in those countries where the system is most adopted, give that satisfaction which its advocates would predicate. In France, M. Horson, although in favour of such partnerships, gives no very flattering account of its operation, ascribing the evil effects which are occasionally produced by such partnerships, or rather the excrescences which have arisen out of them, 'to the fact of its principle not having been sufficiently clearly defined in the Commercial Code of 1807, while since that time the jurisprudence and the precedents have gradually deviated more and more from this principle.'"

Now, he would ask hon. Members if that principle would be clearly defined by this Bill? Could any man tell what would be the operation of a measure which, according to the right hon. Member for Kidderminster, would not entitle a person advancing money to a partnership to have access to the books? He (Mr. Cardwell) knew the Bill did not in terms entitle a person under such circumstances to have access to the books; but was a man to form a contract that he should be remunerated according to the profits of an undertaking, and then to be denied access to the means of ascertaining what the amount of those profits were? The right hon. Gentleman said that an account might be had in chancery; but would that House assent to a Bill which would establish a system of commercial contracts the nature of which could only be determined by the cumbrous and costly expedient of an account in Chancery? Mr. Horson stated that the mischiefs which had arisen in France were attributable to the fact that the principle of the law had not been sufficiently clearly defined in the Commercial Code, and those mischiefs were—

"That there is no guarantee that the commanditaire has wholly paid up his quota—no registration of either names or shares—and no effective security against fraud, both partnerships en commandite and sociétés anonymes being addicted to reckless speculation."

The House had been told that all the evidence was in favour of limited liability. They were not now discussing limited liability, but, if they were, it would be found that the whole tenor of the evidence was in favour of limited liability with publicity, but certainly not without publicity. One of the witnesses, who would have the greatest weight with the Commissioners, must have been his right hon. Friend the Vice-President of the Board of Trade, and he would therefore read to the House the opinion given by him before the Commission. He was asked this question:—

"Ought it to be indispensable to such limited partnerships that a registration of the terms on which the partnership is carried on should be required; and that the very name by which such company was denominated should mark it as belonging to that class? What ought to appear in the registration of the company? In particular, do you think that the names of the limited partners, together with the sums furnished by them respectively, should be published in such register?"

The House would see that this was the very thing now asked for. The right hon. Gentleman answered the question thus:—

"I think, as the partners are left to fix the terms of their contract, the public should have access to those conditions by which it is to be bound, and therefore that the terms should be registered."

Cruel trap! mischief! impracticability! Such had been the language of the right hon. Gentleman that night. Then, in his evidence, his right hon. Friend proceeded to say:—

"Too much publicity cannot be given to the nature of the partnership; and I think, to facilitate inquiry, the names of the partners should be given. I see no objection to publication in the newspapers, as practised in America; but I do not think a circular of accounts should be required."

He also said, he would have certificates "distinguishing who are general and who are special partners, the amount of capital which each special partner has contributed to the common stock, the general nature of the business to be transacted, and the time when the partnership is to commence and when it is to terminate." Do not let the right hon. Gentleman now say that the lender—that was to say, the commanditaire—ought not to be registered as well as the general partners. The matter had been rather discussed as if it was some difficult question of law—as if we had got some deep abyss of legal knowledge to fathom before we could come to an intelligible opinion regarding it; but in truth it was a very plain question of common sense. The question was, whether we were going, for the first time in commercial history, to legalise a state of things in which such operations as he would now describe could be carried into effect? Imagine a capitalist desirous of speculating with £10,000. Imagine him to send down to Liverpool two men of straw with £5,000 each received from him. Let it be a period of great speculation, and let them deal with some particular article which was likely to fluctuate very considerably in price. He desires one of his agents to speculate for a rise, and the other for a fall in the value of the article. The article of course would either rise or fall. One of the persons so set up by the capitalist would sustain a loss, and the other would necessarily realise a large profit. The profit would go to the capitalist, while the loss would be limited to £5,000, and as the present Bill was drawn he would be a creditor for that amount. More than that, he would be a creditor with means of knowledge that no other man possessed, and with an opportunity of getting his £5,000 that no other creditor had. Now, let the Bill be called a supplement to the Joint-stock Company's Act, or to the Usury Laws Repeal Act; or let it be called on the back "A Bill to amend the Law of Partnership," and in the debate, as had been done, let it be stated that it had nothing to do with the law of partnership—what did all that signify? The question was, whether or not that House was going to establish a gigantic system of fraud to the injury of the honest trader and to the great detriment of the commercial interests of the country? Well, what was the particular time at which this Bill was brought before the House? He had read that morning some interesting observations in the city article of The Times, one or two of which he would take the liberty to bring under the notice of the House. It was said—

"The form of speculation now gradually commencing will be watched with anxiety by all who regard the permanent welfare of the country."

Then it went on to say that every one must see—"That the final result will be a crash such as was witnessed in 1825, 1836, and 1847, and which in this country may be looked for with absolute precision once every eleven years."

Then, if a crash might be expected to come in the periodical way here described, there surely was no need and no wisdom to make it more serious when it did come. But a part of the article referred to the Limited Liability Act as follows:—

“It is a singular fact, that while the law of limited liability has been assailed on the ground that it would prove a stimulus to the wildest speculation, it has thus far led only to a few moderate and for the most part useful projects, which may serve in their degree the healthful purpose of finding employment for our energies within the limits of our own shores.”

It must be very satisfactory that the limited liability law passed last year, which contained the principle of publicity, was working so well, even when the fever of speculation had begun. Could there be a better reason for taking care that in any other Bill passed by the House there should be the same safeguards? He would say, by all means allow persons, as our law now allowed, to limit their liability by such contracts as they pleased; but take care that the person against whom they were to be limited had the means of knowing the nature of the contract. On the second reading of the Bill he expressed his opinion that such alterations as were required could be made in Committee, and, had he been called on to give a vote some time ago when his noble Friend at the head of the Government, who judiciously said all those questions could be settled in Committee, sat down, he should not have voted with the hon. Member for Birmingham. But with that candour which his right hon. Friend (Mr. Lowe) exhibited on every occasion, he had distinctly told the House that the Bill would be worse than useless if the proposed change were introduced, and that it would be a thousand times better to have no Bill at all. It was clear, therefore, that if the Bill were changed in Committee, it would not have the advantage of his right hon. Friend's patronage in order to being carried into a law. If they went into Committee the result might be a law to which many in that House would positively object. If they succeeded in amending the Bill in Committee, then his right hon. Friend would abandon his guardianship of it, and they would be in no better case. Under those circumstances, therefore, he thought the wiser course would be to vote for the Amendment of the hon. Member for Birmingham.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he should not have interposed any observations of his own between the House and the division, if a discussion on the principle of the Bill had not been raised. He had devoted much attention to the subject, and he must confess that if it were not for the high authority of the speakers who had preceded him, he should have supposed they had been talking about an entirely different matter from that which was really before the House. The hon. Member for Huntingdon (Mr. T. Baring) seemed to say that the Bill involved the principle of commandite. Now so far from advocating the principle of commandite he (the Lord Advocate) was not in favour of that principle; and when his right hon. Friend two years ago, proposed to introduce a Bill for establishing the principle of limited liability, he requested him not to extend the measure to Scotland, because he was apprehensive they were travelling rather too fast under the pressure of the railway system that then prevailed. On the other hand the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxford (Mr. Cardwell) had dealt with the Bill as if it were a Joint-stock Companies Bill. Now, in his (the Lord Advocate's) opinion, no two subjects could be more distinct. There were three commercial relations totally distinct from each other, which had been brought into discussion by recent legislation:—First, partnership proper; second, partnership en commandite; and third, the partnership of a Joint-stock Company. Those were all totally distinct from what was meant when they spoke of limited liability. Everybody knew that a Joint-stock Company was not a partnership in the proper sense of the term. It was a combination in which the stocks and not the partners constituted the principal object; so much so, indeed, that it had been doubted whether the members of a Joint-stock Company were subject to the law of universal liability. It, in fact, differed entirely from a partnership proper, for the shareholders in Joint-stock Companies were not partners, they had only an interest in the stock. In the case of a partnership proper all the partners had a right to manage the concern; their shares were not transferable; and they were not succeeded by others in the partnership. All the qualifications which characterised the members of an ordinary partnership ceased in a Joint-stock Company. Having put that aside, what was it that was meant by limited liability? It was not to limit a man's obligations, for what he undertook to do he was bound to perform; and what he did not undertake to do, no law could make him do. If you meant by limited liability

to exempt a man from his own obligations, that would be a false system of legislation; but if you meant by limited liability to compel a man to do what he never undertook to do, that would be injustice. A man who stood in the position of a lender and a creditor, should not be placed in the position of a partner. He, therefore, objected to the law of commandite because it made a partner a creditor; and he objected to the present law of partnership in England, because it said that a man who was merely a creditor should stand in the position of a partner. When the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cardwell) talked about the universal liability of partners, that depended upon the plain principle that every trader was liable to pay his own debts; and, if there were two traders each authorising the other to act for him, each of them would be as much liable for the debts contracted by the other as if they had been contracted by himself. But, as regarded the partnership property, the man who had lent his money as an ordinary creditor in order to receive a share of the profits only, but without any authority to act as a partner—such a person could not be subjected to the liabilities of a partner. The right hon. Gentleman had said that wherever the usury laws were in force no man could receive more than the legal rate of interest in the capacity of a lender; and that he must be a partner in order to enable him to receive a larger share of the profits. But the law had been altered in this respect; and a man might now advance money upon any terms he liked, provided the amount of interest were fixed. It was said that the profits were what the shareholders and creditors looked to for the payment of their debts. But that was entirely a fallacy. It was to the partnership that those parties looked; and it was the partnership that would be liable to pay the debts. It had been argued that the terms on which the money was lent might be so extortionate that the lender would have it in his power to sweep away the whole of the profits. But the answer to that was, that if a man were truly a partner he should not be anything different from a partner; and that if he were truly a creditor he should not be something different from a creditor. That was all that his right hon. Friend the Vice President of the Board of Trade asked by this Bill. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cardwell) had put the case of a man sending down to Manchester or Liverpool two men of straw, to whom he advanced money, giving them instructions how they were to apply it, in order that he himself might avoid all liability; but was it not plain and evident that in that case, when a person not only advanced money, but exercised a control over it, giving instructions as to its application, the lender would be a partner, and that those facts would prove him to be a partner? The whole question, after all, was this—if a man honestly lent money to another for the purposes of trade, was that a sufficient ground for saying that he who was really only a creditor should be deemed to be a partner? It was said that such a person would have an advantage over all other creditors by knowing under what circumstances the borrower was carrying on his trade. That was perfectly true. But in Scotland any preference shown to the lender by the borrower was unlawful and was good ground for a commission of bankruptcy. It appeared to him that there was nothing in the objections that had been raised by hon. Members that could at all militate against the Bill. It was not proposed by the Bill to establish the principle of limited partnerships. What his right hon. Friend (Mr. Lowe) proposed was to describe a creditor as a creditor. He held that a partnership consisted of persons who participated both in the profit and in the loss; but where there was only a participation in the profit, and without any participation in the loss, that was not a partnership. They could not create commerce, but they could leave commerce free, and allow every man to make what contract he pleased that was consistent with the ordinary laws and policy of the country—let him know what that contract was, and give him the cheapest and most efficient remedy to enforce its observance. He was perfectly satisfied that the more free commerce was left, and the more they reverted to first principles, the more surely would they protect commerce against fraud. He believed that all restraints and penalties that might be imposed either on money-lenders or borrowers would only result in opening a door to mischief, and would be of advantage to no one.

MR. LINDSAY said, the arguments used against the Bill went against the principle of limited liability altogether. His opinion was that the House legislated too much for the protection of the creditor. Men should be left to their own judgment, energy, and industry, and all the attempts of the Legislature to prevent frauds were, he feared, but so many cloaks to cover them. The House could not prevent fraud, and it would be vain to attempt it. He agreed with his right hon. Friend, the Vice President of the Board of Trade, that the principle of registration was so entirely opposed to the principle of the Bill that it would be better to leave it alone altogether than admit anything like what had been shadowed forth that evening. The principle of the Bill was a simple and sound one, to allow A and B to borrow and lend on any conditions they thought proper. The public had nothing to do with those conditions. If registration was introduced, where were they to stop? Would they extend it to sums of £5 or £1? They should register not merely the sums, but also the conditions. A mere register of the loan would be of no avail, and would not prevent fraud. It would be better, in his opinion, to put the Bill aside altogether than adopt the system of registration. He could not, however, but respect the opinion of such men as the hon. Members for Kendal (Mr. Glyn), and for Oxford (Mr. Cardwell), and he thought his right hon. Friend, the Vice President of the Board of Trade, might very well have asked to be allowed to go into Committee, and see whether the opponents of the Bill had not some proposal different from that on the paper, which he might be able to adopt without sacrificing the Bill.

MR. MONTAGU CHAMBERS said, he was of opinion that there ought to be some means of preventing reckless men of wealth from working on the credulity of others, deriving all the profits in case of success, but, in case of failure, throwing the loss upon their dupes. The difficulties he felt were with respect to the third clause of the Bill, which contained the whole pith of the measure. It proposed to enact that no person making a loan to any trader shall be deemed to be a partner, or subject to any liability incurred by such trader, by reason only that he received as a compensation for such loan any profits of the business carried on by such trader. Now, what security was there in that clause against fraud? A trader might in two or three years take nine-tenths of the profits, and then in the fourth year, when the credits of the company had become large, and it may have incurred great losses, might demand his share of the profits without contributing to the losses, and, perhaps, £1,000 besides. The right hon. and learned Lord Advocate said it was simply a matter of borrowing and lending; but the law, as it at present stood, provided that a sharer in the profits should also be a sharer in the peril; and it was now proposed to abolish that salutary provision. He should, however, vote for going into Committee, in the hope that such changes would be made as would make this a useful Bill, giving freedom to capital without granting impunity to fraud.

The House divided:—Ayes 75; Noes 61: Majority 14.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

House in Committee.

Clause 1.

MR. CRAUFURD said, it was his intention to move the omission of the first four clauses, and in lieu thereof the insertion of the following:—

"The advance of capital or money, to be used in any trade or undertaking, not being the trade of a banker, upon a contract with the person carrying on such trade or undertaking that the person making such advance shall receive a share of, or a rate of interest varying with, the profits of the trade or undertaking, shall not, of itself, render the person making such advance a partner in such trade or undertaking. The person making such advance shall be entitled to call for an account of the profits of such trade or undertaking, but shall not, as against creditors, have any right or title to the property or assets of the trade or undertaking; and in case of the bankruptcy or insolvency of the person carrying on such trade or undertaking, the person making such advance shall be compellable to pay to the assignees any share of capital or money which he has undertaken to provide. Any such capital or money withdrawn by the person making such advance shall, if withdrawn within six months prior to the bankruptcy or insolvency of the person carrying on such trade or undertaking, be recoverable by the assignees. No contract for the remuneration of a servant or agent of any person engaged in any trade or undertaking, by a share of the profits of such trade or undertaking, shall, of itself, render such servant or agent a partner therein, but such servant or agent shall be entitled to call for an account of the profits of such trade or undertaking."

It was evident to him from the debate which had just taken place that there was a feeling, or rather a prejudice, in many minds against the object of the Bill. That prejudice arose, he apprehended, from a misconception. The Bill did not, as was supposed, touch the question of limited liability, but merely settled who should and who should not be deemed a partner in a commercial undertaking. Its object was to neutralise the decision in "Waugh v. Carver," and so far it would effect a great improvement in the existing law. Nevertheless he thought some of its provisions might be altered with advantage, and the clause which he proposed would, in his opinion, make it less objectionable than at present to some hon. Members. There seemed to be a very general impression that a distinction should be drawn between a lender with a varying rate of interest and one with a fixed rate. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman the Vice President of the Board of Trade would see the propriety of yielding to that impression. He would not, however, press his Motion to a division.

Clause agreed to ; as was also Clause 2.

Clause 3 (Lender not to be deemed a Partner).

Mr. GREGSON said, he would propose to add the following words :—

"No portion of such loan as aforesaid shall be recoverable until after all other creditors shall have been fully satisfied as to their lawful claims on the said business."

He thought, if a person partaking of the profits was not to be considered a partner it would be difficult to say who was a partner; but he ought, at any rate, to be liable for the sum he put down to obtain those profits.

Mr. LOWE said, he must object to the proposed Amendment, the effect of which would be, that if a person lent some one money for the purpose of his business on the terms of receiving a portion of the profits, and, on the period of the loan elapsing, was obliged to sue the debtor for it, he could not recover without proving that all the other creditors had been satisfied. He thought he need say no more to prove the impropriety of adopting the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman.

Mr. MALINS said, that the Amendment was a clinging to the old notion that persons participating in a business should be amenable to the liabilities, the very thing which the Bill sought to get rid of. Taking the case of a farmer to whom money was lent, this Act said that they might lend the money and accept a share of the profits ; but was there any reason why the demand of the lender should be postponed, in case of failure, till after the remainder of the creditors were satisfied ? The hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gregson) seemed to think that all such transactions were to be founded in fraud. The Bill was intended to give relief to capital, whereas to insert such a provision as that proposed would totally defeat its object.

Mr. HINDLEY said, that a partner was nothing but one who took a share in the profits ; and hon. Gentlemen had better get rid of their new-fangled notions. He objected to the clause. Under it a man did not maintain the same character ; in his engagements he was at one time a lender, at another a partner, and again a creditor. They had been told they were to have free trade in everything. If so, he should like to know why, if he liked to issue pieces of paper, promising to pay £1 on demand, and the people were ready to take them, the law should step in and forbid him to do so ?

Mr. SPOONER said, he would suggest to the hon. Member for Lancaster (Mr. Gregson) that the Amendment should commence as follows :—"But in case of the insolvency or bankruptcy of such trader, no portion," &c.

Mr. MITCHELL said, he should be glad if the Vice-President of the Board of Trade would clearly define what a partner would be if the clause passed. He foresaw very plainly that the clause would lead to endless litigation, for in every case of bankruptcy where there was a man who had lent money in this manner attempts would be made to constitute him a partner.

Mr. VANCE said, he knew many firms in which the names under which the business was carried on were entirely different from those of the actual partners, and it was possible that under the clause all the partners might lend money to each other and yet none of them be deemed partners in case of bankruptcy. He agreed, therefore, with the hon. Member for Bridport (Mr. Mitchell) that the Government ought to state who would and who would not be a partner under the Bill.

Mr. MONTAGU CHAMBERS said, he must avow that, in common with all mercantile men, he was under the impression that an arrangement between two persons that one should advance money for the purposes of business and the other conduct it, and that they should share the profits, constituted a partnership. Now, an agreement between two persons that one should lend money to the other for the purposes of a business and share the profits was, in substance, the same thing. He was aware that it might be considered an old-fashioned notion, but it was a plain, common-sense notion, and an English notion. The Amendment proposed that he should run some risk corresponding to his chances of gain, and he thought that was only fair. The measure, therefore, in his opinion, required the limitation and restriction proposed.

MR. LOWE said, he was not perhaps an authority on law matters, but he would state what he believed to be essential elements in partnership at present. In the first place, there must be joint ownership of the partnership property; in the second place, there must be joint contracting; in the third place, there must be the power of choosing who should constitute the partners; and, further, the partners must be agents in binding each other in partnership transactions, which mere lenders were not. Besides all this, there must be the power of sharing in the profits. But that was only one, and perhaps not the most important, incident; and his complaint against the present system was, that it extended a single incident of the law of partnership to everything, such as contracts for loans, &c. The object of the Bill was to remedy that state of things, by declaring that a man should not be deemed a partner simply because he shared in the profits. There would still be abundant criteria by which to distinguish partners.

MR. HINDLEY said, he thought one of the greatest objections to the Bill was, that the question of who were partners would be left to be settled by arbitration.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he thought that if the third clause were passed without any qualification, it would open a door to fraud. In his opinion, parties who lent money should be made liable for all engagements which were entered into while the money remained, and he also considered that in case of bankruptcy, if any collusion was proved to have taken place in regard to the division of profits, the money should be returned. The grand point was to make the provisions of the Bill sufficiently stringent to prevent fraud.

MR. E. BALL said, that the simple question was this—Whether a person advancing money to another person to enable him to carry on trade was to be in a worse position than other creditors? It would be a very hard case if a man who should lend a farmer money to extend his farming were, if hard times should come, to be deprived of his claim to repayment in his due proportion on that account. The Amendment would deprive the tradesman of his proper chance of obtaining capital.

MR. WILKINSON said, he had never been able to understand how the creditor could be damaged by a lender's receiving interest in proportion to the profits, instead of a fixed rate; on the contrary, that had always appeared to him the best arrangement for them, inasmuch as it would prevent the lender from drawing interest when no profits were made.

MR. BARROW said, that the proper principle was, that a man who claimed an extraordinary amount of profit, and who did not enter the concern as a mere ordinary trader, should also run the risk of loss.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 83; Noes 80; Majority 3.

MR. SPOONER said, he thought the Bill contained no sufficient precaution against the undue preference of a creditor who had advanced money upon participation of profits, and he therefore moved the addition to the clause of the following proviso:—

"Provided always, that any person making a loan to any trader and receiving a share of the profits as compensation for such loan shall, in the event of the trader becoming insolvent, repay to the estate of such insolvent trader all moneys drawn out by him either on account of the principal of the loan so made as aforesaid, or on account of the profits received as aforesaid, within the three years immediately preceding the insolvency of such trader."

MR. MALINS said, he put it to the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Lowe) whether, after the division which had just taken place, it was worth while to proceed with the Bill? The principle of the Bill was that money might be lent to a trader upon a contract for remuneration by the receipt of a share of the profits, without incurring any of the disadvantages formerly incurred by a partnership. Now, those disadvantages were two—liability to creditors and liability to the loss of capital, as between the lender and the other creditors. It had, by a small majority of three, been decided that if a trader or farmer borrowed money of two persons—of one upon interest at the rate of 20 per cent, and of the other upon a participation in the profits, and became insolvent—the man who had lent at the rate of 20 per cent, while the profits were not more than 10 per cent, should be paid in full, while the other who had fairly agreed to take a share of the profits should be unpaid. That seemed to be so fatal to the principle of the Bill that he put it to the noble Lord (Lord Palmerston) and the right hon. Gentleman, that it had become valueless and was not worth the waste of any more time upon it.

MR. MUNTZ said, he quite agreed with the hon. and learned Gentleman who had last addressed them, that the Bill now was not worth a single farthing, as no man of any common sense would lend money under the clause as it now stood. He would recommend that when a Bill of this sort was next brought in it should be a little better considered. If they wanted to have limited liability, why not adopt the system which prevailed on the other side of the Atlantic? In America, when persons entered into a limited partnership, they advertised the names of the limited, and of the general, partners; and with respect to the former class not only the sums they had contributed, but the time for which they were to remain in the concern. An intelligent American, whom he had met the other day, told him that, in the United States, they were very jealous even of the system, and clogged it as much as possible. A limited partner was not allowed to interfere at all in the management of the concern. If he kept but a desk or a stool in the office for himself he became a general partner. To the adoption of such a system as that he (Mr. Muntz) should have no objection; but do not let parties contract debts with the public under an arrangement which no one could understand.

MR. LOWE said, he considered that he need not assure the Committee that he very much regretted the decision which had just been come to. An old school-book of his said, that two things were most contrary to good counsel—quickness and anger. He would indulge in neither. The best proof which he could give of his intention to go on with the Bill was to turn to the Amendment before the Committee. That Amendment was quite opposed to the principle of the Bill. Its effect would be that a man who had advanced money upon participation in the profits might draw out his money, leaving the concern perfectly solvent; but if two years and a half from that time the man who was carrying on the business entered into a speculation and failed, the party who had previously advanced money would have to pay to the other creditors all that he had advanced.

MR. ARCHIBALD HASTIE said, that the right hon. Gentleman had stated that if anything occurred in Committee which went against the principle of the Bill he would abandon it; but yet, after the Amendment which had just been carried, he said that it was his intention to go on with it. If the Amendment was adopted there could be no objection to the addition of the proviso of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire.

MR. GLYN said, he was in favour of the Amendment, but he would suggest that the period to which it was designed to apply should be reduced to one year.

MR. SPOONER said, he would acquiesce in the propriety of the suggestion, and modify his proviso accordingly.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he should support the limitation of one year.

MR. MONTAGU CHAMBERS said, he thought the difficulty could be met by making the proviso run, "Provided that at the time the party withdrew the loan the concern was solvent." He would also suggest the further limitation of the time to six months.

MR. SPOONER said, he feared that the adoption of the hon. and learned Member's advice would lead to endless litigation. The difficulty would be to prove when the insolvency commenced. The remedy was in the hands of the party himself, by inserting a notice of the withdrawal of the money in the Gazette.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, it was his opinion that the real question they had to determine was whether they would make a man a partner who had advanced money to a firm without any intention of becoming one? If they meant to do so, the better course would be at once to abandon the Bill; if, on the contrary, they designed that he should not be a partner, it was most inconsistent and inequitable to saddle him with any of the perils and responsibilities of partnership. The principle of the Bill was, that what a man stipulated for in the way of interest he might stipulate for in the shape of profit, but that he might make this arrangement with the borrower, that if there were profits he, the lender, should share in them, and that if there were none he should forego the benefit he might have derived if the advance had been made on the usual terms of loans on interest. The hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Spooner) said, let the withdrawal from the concern be inserted in the Gazette, but if the person advancing the money were not a partner, why was he to insert that he had quitted the firm?

MR. CARDWELL said, he did not think his hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General had heard the argument which took place previous to the last Amendment. By the last division they had made a person who advanced money to a firm a partner to this extent, that the money he put in was to remain as assets for a certain time. The object of his hon. Friend (Mr. Spooner) was to take care that that provision was not evaded by the lender withdrawing his money. That proposition was on the same principle as the Joint-stock Companies Act, which provided that any person who ceased to be a holder of any share should, if the Company were wound up within the period of one year, be liable to contribute to the debts.

MR. HANKEY said, it appeared to him that the Committee seemed determined to argue the Bill as if the lenders were to have all the responsibilities of partners. If they affirmed that principle, he should recommend his right hon. Friend to withdraw the Bill. He was one of those who thought that if the Bill were carried out in its original intention, it would have a good effect, but if it was to be fettered by the Amendments proposed, the better course would be to abandon it.

MR. MALINS said, he thought there could be no more miserable and profitless occupation than that in which they were now engaged. The principle of the Bill was, that a person lending money should be absolutely free from the consequences of partnership. The Committee had negatived the principle by throwing on the lender one of the most penal consequences of a partner—the total forfeiture of the capital lent. It was attempted now to carry that further, and to say that if a man, on the 1st of January, withdrew money from a firm perfectly solvent, and that firm, on the 1st of February, entered into imprudent speculations, leading to ruin, and was insolvent on the 1st of June, the original lender should be liable, on the 31st of December, to bring the money back again. If that proposition was agreed to, he trusted that, with or without the consent of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Lowe), the Committee would come to a Resolution not further to waste their time.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he quite agreed that it was impossible to assent to the clause without entirely departing from the fundamental principle of the Bill. They could not alter a lender into a partner without defeating the object with which the Bill was introduced. Therefore, he had no hesitation in saying the decision of the Committee now must determine whether the Bill should be given up or not.

MR. W. EWART said, that as they had already departed from the principle, it was useless to go on with the Bill.

The Committee divided:—Ayes 105; Noes 125: Majority 20.

Clause agreed to, as were the remaining clauses.

House resumed.

Bill reported.

PAROCHIAL SCHOOLS (SCOTLAND) BILL.

Order for Third Reading read.

SIR MICHAEL SHAW STEWART said, that he rose to move that the Bill should be read a third time that day three months. For his part, he could not understand why the parish school should be severed from the parish church. That was a step of which he could not approve unless they obtained some security for the religious character of the schoolmaster—that he did not hold opinions contrary to the Confession of Faith, and that he would not use his office as a means of lessening the influence of the Established Church of Scotland. His reason for moving the Amendment was that the party most anxious for the passing of the Bill—namely, the religious denomination of which the right hon. and learned Lord was a distinguished member—the Free Church party had, in a meeting lately held at Edinburgh, declared that they would take the present Bill as an instalment, as they were for the present satisfied with getting in the narrow end of the wedge. Why was it they wished to have the narrow end in? It was for the overthrow of the Established Church of Scotland. The danger to be apprehended arose not out of anything which it provided, but from those things which it failed to provide, and he would ask the hon. Member for Perth (Mr. Kin-naird) instead of trying to get the present Bill passed, to join the right hon. and learned Lord in preparing a measure suited to the Scotch boroughs, where a change was more required than in the landed districts. A short Bill for that object had been introduced as a sister measure to the present, and he was now anxious to know what had become of it. For the reasons which he had stated, he felt it his duty to move an Amendment of which he had given notice.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now" and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months."

MR. BLACK said, he thought the objections of the hon. Baronet were untenable. He denied that by this Bill the parish schools would be separated from the Church. Indeed he believed that the superintendence of the Church would be rather fortified than weakened. The minister of the parish would still retain the same power as he had before. The power of the Presbytery, as to removing the schoolmaster, was at present a mere delusion. He (Mr. Black) held that all tests were either delusions or snares and had always failed in their object. A schoolmaster's signature to a test was no indication either of his opinions or his moral character. Hume himself would have signed any test that they could devise. It was a mistake also to suppose that the test had been abolished to favour the Free Church party. The right hon. and learned Lord Advocate had shown his impartiality by refusing to adopt the test which had been proposed, and which would have been conscientiously taken by members of the body to which the right hon. and learned Lord belonged, but would have excluded other Presbyterians, Congregationalists, and all Dissenters.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he must congratulate the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate on the dexterity with which he had changed his measure. It completely destroyed the jurisdiction of the Church of Scotland over the schools, and in lieu of that jurisdiction, which rendered the schools of Scotland models, in favour of a system of inspectors with no religious qualification whatever. That should warn the people of England how insidious were the attacks upon the Protestants system. The Bill had no recommendation save that it indirectly accomplished those purposes which had been rejected by that House and the House of Lords. He looked upon it as a measure calculated to destroy the Church of Scotland, and give a heavy blow and a great discouragement to the Protestant Church of England. He was surprised that such a measure should be accepted by members for Scotland, but the English members, who had a duty to perform, would record their votes against it.

The House divided:—Ayes 149; Noes 79: Majority 70.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read 3^d, and passed.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. WHITESIDE said, he did not wish to object to the passing of the Bill if certain suggestions made by the Committee who had sat on the subject were adopted. He wished to know whether it was the intention of the Government to have the business of the Court during the remainder of its existence discharged by two of the three Commissioners who now presided over the sale and transfer of estates by this tribunal. As the House was already aware, one of the Commissioners was Mr. Baron Richards, who was also a Judge of one of the Superior Courts, and was therefore unable to discharge the duties entailed upon him by both offices. A return obtained by the hon. Baronet (Sir J. Shelley) at the beginning of the Session, when he was making an attack upon some of the Irish Judges, showed that Baron Richards had not gone circuit since 1849; and one of the witnesses examined by the Committee, Dr. Longfield, had stated that Baron Richards had not latterly been able to give much of his time to the Incumbered Estate Court. Dr. Longfield had also stated that a great deal of the time of the Commissioners was expended in hearing appeals from each other. Now, a proposition had been made by some of the Committee that Baron Richards, who was no doubt a valuable Commissioner if he could attend to his duties, should be relieved from the office of Chief Commissioner; that the other two Commissioners should be left to do the business of the Court; but that two additional days in the week should be saved to them for the performance of more active business by constituting another tribunal—a Court of Appeal from the Incumbered Estates Court—so that they should not have to be hearing appeals from each other. He should be glad to know whether it was the intention of the Government to adopt the suggestion? If not, he would propose a clause to carry out that object.

SIR JAMES GRAHAM said, he would beg to call the attention of the House to another matter connected with the Bill under consideration, which he regarded as a matter of very great importance. If he was rightly informed, a most important judgment had lately been pronounced in one of the Superior Courts in Ireland, which gravely affected what had hitherto been supposed to be the indefeasible title of the Incumbered Estates Court, namely, the Parliamentary titles granted under the Act. If that judgment were a correct one, questions might be raised in all cases where there had been sales under that Court, and purchasers would have to go back to title-deeds anterior to the Parliamentary conveyance given under the Act. In fact, if the judgment were well founded, all titles obtained under that Court were shaken. There had been, he believed, about 5,000 sales through the medium of the Incumbered Estates Court, and there had probably been from twenty to thirty title-deeds brought into Court with each estate; and one of the Commissioners (Dr. Longfield), a very able man, had, as he (Sir J. Graham) was informed, recommended, with the view of preventing parties from going behind the Parliamentary title, that all those anterior title deeds should be destroyed. Now, if they had not been destroyed, they had been, he believed, put into something like a process of destruction, for they were stowed in a cellar into which nothing ever entered except the River Liffey, which did penetrate this deep recess, he was given to understand, from time to time, and bid fair to destroy them. Now, if the judgment to which he had alluded stood, the owner might be called on to produce his title when he no longer had access to those deeds, or when, if he had, he would find them in a state bordering on total destruction, the effect of which destruction would be to throw the whole proceedings that had taken place under the Bill, which it was thought had done so much for the benefit of Ireland, into absolute confusion. He would ask the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland to consider whether, under those circumstances, it would not be advisable, by some declaratory Act, to establish those indefeasible titles which it was the object of the Legislature to give? He could not conceive a more grave subject than this—it was also a most pressing one—it was germane to the matter now in hand, and he hoped, therefore, the House would be favoured with a statement of what it was intended to do in order to correct this state of things.

MR. J. D. FITZGERALD said, that the matter to which the right hon. Baronet had called the attention of the House was one of very great importance indeed. The moment he (Mr. J. D. FitzGerald) heard of the judgment referred to, he took pains to put himself in possession of all the facts of the case, and to get an accurate report of the observations of the Judges who had pronounced that decision, in order to bring the matter under the consideration of the Government, that they might take such steps as might appear necessary. Unquestionably the feeling of the public, and that of the Bar generally, had been that the title given to the Incumbered Estate Court was indefeasible, and that no question need be asked by the purchaser, except as to what the Court professed to sell—whether a leasehold or a freehold interest. In confirmation of the observation of the right hon. Baronet, he could state that he had himself heard one of the Commissioners say, if once a purchaser got his conveyance from the Court, the best thing he could do was to commit all previous title-deeds to the flames. That advice he (Mr. J. D. FitzGerald) believed to be perfectly sound; and there could be no doubt that in passing the Incumbered Estates Bill the Legislature intended to give an indefeasible title; and one of the difficulties which he should have to contend with, if he were now to set about framing a declaratory clause, would be to find words any stronger than those in which the Legislature had recorded that intention. The case which the right hon. Baronet had alluded to was that of “Errington v. Rourke.” Now, one of the most arduous and carefully performed duties of the Commissioners was the ascertaining of tenancies, and the insertion of those tenancies in the printed rental upon which they sold; and if any tenant found that he had not been served with a preliminary notice of sale, had not been mentioned in the draft rental, or that his tenancy was improperly described in that document, it was open to him to come in and object before the Commissioners, which he could do almost without any cost whatever. If he did not object, he was taken to acquiesce in the description which the rental gave in his tenancy. In the case in question Mr. Errington was the purchaser under the Court, but twenty acres of his purchase were refused to be given up to him by a man named Rourke, who claimed to hold under an old lease. Rourke's tenancy was not noticed in the conveyance from the Incumbered Estates Court to Mr. Errington, and the latter refused to recognise it. Two out of the three Judges of the Court of Queen's Bench, before whom the case came, held that Rourke's tenancy was not disturbed by the conveyance from the Incumbered Estates Court; but in this Mr. Justice Crampton adopted the commonly received view of the Act—namely, that it gave an indefeasible title to all conveyed by the Commissioners. That learned Judge's view was subsequently confirmed by a judgment given in another case by the Chief Justice of the Court of Common Pleas in Ireland and another Judge of that Court, and he (Mr. J. D. FitzGerald) had not the least doubt that it was a correct one. However, as the case of "Errington v. Rourke" would be brought to the Court of Exchequer Chamber, and subsequently to the House of Lords, he had not thought it his duty to advise the Government to introduce a declaratory enactment pending the decision of the question by the ultimate tribunal. Should that decision be against the hitherto received opinion, he should certainly recommend such an enactment. As to the question put to him by the hon. and learned Member for Enniskillen (Mr. Whiteside), he believed that an Amendment, such as that referred to, would be introduced by the right hon. Baronet (Sir J. Graham) when the House went into Committee on the Bill; but while admitting the inconvenience of having two such judicial offices as those of Baron of the Exchequer and Chief Commissioner of the Incumbered Estates Court filled by one individual, yet, having regard to the amount of business which the latter Court would have to discharge during the remainder of its term of existence—a year or two—he would not feel justified in recommending the reduction of its judicial staff. The Act empowered the Government to make such reduction if it thought fit, for it did not oblige them to have three Commissioners.

MR. NAPIER said, he was aware of an instance in which great injustice had been done in the case of the sale of land, subject to a lease that had been seen by the Commissioners and pronounced to be valid. There ought to be no Act of Parliament to make valid such doings; the Act of Parliament ought to be made to operate the other way. He considered that the judgment of the Court of Queen's Bench was perfectly sound. All that it declared was, that the Commissioners of the Incumbered Estates Court had no right to sell away any interest belonging to third parties, the title to which appeared on the face of their own documents. He did not think a declaratory clause necessary, and he thought that Parliament had acted wisely in not introducing it. He considered that no blame attached to Mr. Baron Richards; the difficulty arose from the learned Judge going from one Court to another. From his own observation he could, however, say that Mr. Baron Richards had attended the Exchequer Court regularly. He hoped the Government would remove the Incumbered Estates Court to the Four Courts, and then the business would be conducted regularly.

MR. J. D. FITZGERALD said, that he had prepared a Resolution to the effect that the Court should, within a short time, be removed to the Four Courts.

MR. SERJEANT O'BRIEN said, that the Court of Queen's Bench had broadly asserted that they had the right to go behind the Parliamentary title, and if they could do that, he did not see how purchasers could have an indefeasible title. However, pending the appeal to the Court of Error in reference to the case which had been alluded to, he considered that it would be inexpedient to bring forward any declaratory Bill on the subject; but should the decision of the ultimate Court be in accordance with the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench, he thought it would then be necessary to introduce such a measure.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he thought the present position of the Court was inconvenient. The instance brought forward by the right hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Napier) was not the first or only instance in which that Court had sold property belonging to another person, over which they had no proper control. The Court was in bad odour with the public, owing to the nepotism and irregularities practised in it.

MR. M'CANN said, he was well acquainted with the sentiments of the people of Ireland with regard to the Court, and he could state that they believed it had conferred more blessings on that country than any other institution that had been established. The Chamber of Commerce in Dublin, who were as good judges on the subject as any body of persons, presented an address to the Lord Lieutenant, in which they attributed the rising prosperity of Ireland mainly to the transference of property through the means of the Incumbered Estates Court. Men now got twenty-five years' purchase for their property, when formerly they only got eighteen years' purchase.

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD said, he thought that, under present circumstances, a more objectionable title than that under the Incumbered Estates Court could not be found. The late decision of the Judges of the Court of Queen's Bench was sufficient to shake the title of every property purchased under the Incumbered Estates Court. Unless the Government stepped forward and interfered by a declaratory Act, stating that all titles under the Incumbered Estates Court were indefeasible, the holders of property under that Court would be in a worse condition than the owners of any other property.

MR. I. BUTT said, he thought that the last speaker had greatly exaggerated the effect of the decision of the Court of Queen's Bench. However, he would not go into the question, as the case was still sub judice, but refer to one more practically urgent. He alluded to the locality in which the Incumbered Estates Court was situated. Two years ago, he obtained a pledge from the Government that the Court for the sale of Incumbered Estates should be brought into the neighbourhood of the Four Courts. It was most desirable that that step should be taken, but as yet no measures had been taken to redeem that pledge. He did not ask for another pledge on the subject, because he had experienced the little value which could be attached to pledges; but he hoped that the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland would take immediate steps for the removal of the Court into the neighbourhood of the Four Courts. It was not a mere professional question. As the Court was now placed, it was away from the legal public, and so lost the superintending influence of that public opinion which was most beneficial to all Courts of Law. When he spoke of public opinion, he did not allude to the views of the unlearned public, or of newspaper writers, who seldom understood those matters. The truth was, that the junior Bar, who crowded the back benches, and who apparently had nothing to do, exercised a very wholesome influence over Courts of Law; but through the inconvenient distance between the Incumbered Estates Court and the Four Courts, a legal public—so to speak—was almost utterly wanting.

LORD NAAS said, he thought that the course taken by the Incumbered Estates Court in the case referred to was a most unusual one. The Commissioners had departed from their general practice and their rules, and that had been the cause of their difficulty. He was of opinion that anything calculated to question the validity of the title given by the Incumbered Estates Court would be one of the most unfortunate circumstances that could occur to Ireland. He would call upon the Government to lay before the House the full particulars of the case alluded to, with a view to a thorough investigation of all the facts. He hoped that the Government would carry out the pledge they had given to remove the Court from its present inconvenient position to the neighbourhood of the Four Courts in Dublin.

Question put, and agreed to.

WAYS AND MEANS.

House in Committee.

1. Resolved—"That, towards making good the Supply granted to Her Majesty, the sum of £24,548,773 0s. 7d., be granted out of the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland."

2. Resolved—"That, towards making good the Supply granted to Her Majesty, there be issued and applied to the service of the year 1858 the sum of £562,028 13s., being the Surplus of Ways and Means granted for the service of preceding years."

MR. I. BUTT said, he would beg to ask if that was to be the last Committee of Ways and Means for the Session.

MR. WILSON said, he hoped it would be.

Resolutions to be reported on Monday next.

MR. JAMES SADLEIR AND THE TIPPERARY BANK.

On the Motion for deferring the Committee on the Joint-stock Companies' Winding-up Acts Amendment Bill,

MR. I. BUTT said, he felt called upon, in consequence of statements which had appeared in the newspapers, to put a question to the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer. Unhappily it was too notorious that frauds of the grossest character had been perpetrated in connection with the Tipperary Bank. He believed also he was not wrong in stating that according to what had appeared in the newspapers, a Member of that House had been judicially connected with those frauds. It also appeared, according to the same authority, that an active canvass was being carried on for the representation of the county of Tipperary, in expectation of the resignation of the Member who had been thus judicially referred to. Well, as that resignation could only be brought about by the acceptance of the individual in question of a nominal office under the Crown, he wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether there was an intention of conferring even that nominal office upon the Member for the county of Tipperary, for the purpose of vacating his seat. Of course, if the right hon. Gentleman decided in the negative, then it would be for the House to decide what course it should adopt for the vindication of its honour.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER: Sir, no application has been made to me, either by Mr. James Sadleir, or on his behalf, for the office of the "Chiltern Hundreds," and therefore it would be quite premature to answer the question of the hon. and learned Gentleman. I can only say, if such an application should be made to me, I shall of course consider the propriety of doing so before acceding to the request.

MR. WHITESIDE said, he would remind the House that upon the occasion of the "South Sea Bubble," Members involved in those transactions were expelled the House of Commons. Perhaps a similar course might be proper under the present most scandalous circumstances. There was, however, another very serious matter arising for consideration out of those proceedings. A learned Judge, from his seat on the Irish bench, had declared that a certain person ought to be prosecuted, and that it was the duty of the Government to consider the propriety of such prosecution.

Now, it might hereafter be matter for serious investigation if, as had been stated, and stated also judicially, that the principal in those transactions, after having been allowed to walk about for some days subsequently unmolested, had finally left the country—it might, he would say, be matter for investigation how far the Government were responsible for not having acted upon the admonition thus judicially given to them.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. J. D. FITZGERALD) said, he hoped he might be allowed to make a few observations after what had fallen from the hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Enniskillen (Mr. Whiteside). The case of the Tipperary Bank had originally come before Master Murphy on an order of reference. That learned functionary had had before him for private examination the Member of the House whose name was under discussion, and when the Master came to deliver his judgment he acquitted all the parties before him, including the Gentleman in question, of any intentional fraud. Subsequently the case came before the Master of the Rolls in Ireland, but that learned Judge adopted the very unusual course of broaching his opinions to the public before delivering his judgment. That judgment was delivered some ten days afterwards, and when he (Mr. J. D. Fitzgerald) came to read it, he learned that the Judge had come to the conclusion that a fraud had been committed by the Member alluded to—and that he had gone further, and had impeached the conduct of the Government—or rather his (Mr. J. D. Fitzgerald's) conduct, for not having instituted a prosecution against the party implicated, as the House would observe, without any knowledge of the circumstances of which the learned Judge was in possession. Now, if the Master of the Rolls had adopted the course which became him, he ought either to have made an order directing the evidence to be laid before the Attorney General for Ireland, or in his capacity of a Privy Councillor he ought to have waited upon his Excellency the Lord Lieutenant, and apprised him that materials were before him to enable him to declare that a Member of Parliament had been guilty of a serious breach of faith. However, immediately upon having seen the judgment of the Master of the Rolls, he went to Dublin, and having examined all the documents in the case, he at once took the most active steps to set the powers of the law in motion against the parties implicated; and all he could say, therefore, was, if the Gentleman referred to had absconded—and he (Mr. J. D. Fitzgerald) was rather inclined to the conclusion that he had not—all he could say was, that if he had absconded he did so immediately after the Master of the Rolls had delivered himself of those most irregular observations of which he had already complained. The escape, therefore, of the Gentleman in question from the hands of justice would be attributable to the Master of the Rolls, and not to the dilatoriness of Her Majesty's Government.

The Motion for deferring the Committee was then agreed to.

NAWAB OF SURAT TREATY BILL.

On the Order of the Day for the Second Reading of the Bill,

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE said, that before moving that the Bill be read a second time, he should be glad if the noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll) would inform the House what course the Government proposed to take with regard to the measure?

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, he was rather surprised at the question of his noble Friend, who, he understood, had taken upon himself the duty of moving the second reading of the Bill as a Private Bill. He was anxious, therefore, to hear what were the grounds upon which his noble Friend recommended their Lordships to adopt this course; and he should certainly wait until he had heard those reasons, and the Chairman of Committees had given his opinion upon the expediency of taking such a course, in reference to such a subject, before he should be prepared to state the course which the Government meant to pursue.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH said, the Bill materially affected revenues which the East India Company only held as trustees for the Crown; he wished to know, therefore, if the noble Duke was prepared, with the approbation of the Government, to give the assent of the Crown to it?

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL agreed with the noble Earl that the Bill did affect the revenues of the Crown, and he was not empowered by the Government to give the assent of the Crown to it.

LORD REDESDALE, as Chairman of Committees, thought that this, being a Bill which affected the public revenue, ought not to be treated as an ordinary private Bill. It had come before him as an ordinary unopposed private Bill, and he could not take upon himself the responsibility of stopping it; but on every ground he felt that it was a measure which ought not to be treated as an ordinary Private Bill, and so strongly was he impressed with this conviction, that at the fitting opportunity he should move as an Amendment that it be read a second time that day six months.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE had as much reason to express surprise at the course the noble Duke had taken as the latter had to express surprise at the course he (the Marquess of Clanricarde) had taken. The noble Duke had himself volunteered on Friday to tell the House to-night what the Government intended to do with regard to the Bill.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL explained. He was entrusted with a petition for presentation to their Lordships on Friday night from the East India Company, praying to be heard by counsel at the bar against the Bill; and in presenting it, he merely stated that on Monday when the measure came before the House he should call their Lordships' attention to the subject matter of that petition. He stated nothing more, and certainly stated nothing as to the period of the evening when he should make the statement. When his noble Friend had moved the second reading, he should be quite ready to state the course which the Government were prepared to pursue with reference to the Bill.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE then proceeded to move the second reading of the Bill and said, that no doubt this Bill affected a portion of the revenues of the empire; but the Government did not seem disposed to treat it as its importance demanded. He agreed with a noble and learned Lord (Lord Lyndhurst) that the Bill was one upon which the law officers of the Crown ought to have been consulted, and that the Government ought to act in accordance with their opinions. The Solicitor General, however, had spoken in favour of this Bill in the other House, and he had, therefore, a right to assume that, so far as the law officers of the Crown had been consulted, their opinion was favourable to this Bill. He asked the House merely to do justice. The President of the Board of Control had begged the other House to consider this matter judicially, and he made the same request to their Lordships. It was said that this Bill ought to be treated as a public measure. He was informed that the promoters of the Bill wished it to be treated as a public Bill, and he saw no reason why it should not have been so considered. But the Speaker of the House of Commons had objected to Mr. Pollock's Bill, and now to resort to this objection at the present stage of the Bill seemed to him to be an evasion of justice and a course unworthy of the Government and of the East India Directors. All that the parties interested wanted, and all that he asked on their behalf, was that the question should be sent before some tribunal capable of investigating the justice of the claims to which it related; and whether that tribunal were the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council or any other competent body was a matter upon which the promoters were indifferent. The Bill arose upon the construction of a treaty entered into by the Indian Government in the year 1800 with the Nawab of Surat. The whole matter of it turned upon the construction of the words of the treaty, and whether the Government were bound to pay to the heirs of the late Nawab the sum of £15,000 a year. The answer given to the claim by the Directors was a long story about matters which occurred in 1750, and a reference to the instructions given by Lord Wellesley to the political agent, as a commentary on the construction of the treaty; but you must look to the treaty itself, for it was by that you were bound, and not by anything which might have taken place before it was made. The meaning of the word "Nawab" was an officer employed under the Mogul empire, and when that empire fell into decline many of the Nawabs usurped the power which they originally held by delegation. Such had been the case at Surat; and, so far from our establishing the first Nawab, we went there with the intention of putting another man in his place, but found that the Nawab in possession was too strong, and then, instead of disturbing, it was thought better to enter into treaty with him. The Nawabship was always considered hereditary, with this chance incidental to it—that a weak prince was very likely to be set aside by a strong one; but the Nawabs were not elected like the former kings of Poland or emperors of Germany, neither were they appointed by the English Government. They succeeded from father to son and to grandson by right of inheritance. It mattered nothing, however, what were his rights or lineage, because, if in 1800 the East India Company stipulated by treaty to pay a certain annuity to the heirs of the then Nawab of Surat so long as that race lasted, they were bound to pay it. It was contended on the other side that as the heirs male of that Nawab had failed in 1842, and he had no successor to the Nawabship, that the annuity had ceased. The question then arose whether the annuity was not granted not to his "successors" in the Nawabship, but to his heirs, which would include heiresses. On the death of the last Nawab, neither Sir George Arthur, Governor of Bombay, nor Mr. Elliot, Resident at Surat, who were directed to make inquiries, ever expressed any doubt as to the annuity being payable; the only question mooted was, to whom was it to be paid. It had been asked why had not the petitioner applied to a public tribunal in India; but the answer was that the petitioner could not do any such thing, as the questions in dispute would involve the construction of the terms of a treaty—a power which courts of justice in India did not possess. The petitioner could not apply to the Privy Council, as no Court in England had original jurisdiction in Indian cases; neither could he appeal to a court of law. Therefore he had adopted the only course open to him, and appealed to the high Court of Parliament—the tribunal to which every subject of Her Majesty had a right to come when they could not obtain justice in the ordinary courts of law. He (the Marquess of Clanricarde) quite agreed that it would have been desirable had this matter been settled out of that House, but the petitioner had no means of obtaining justice elsewhere. It was stated that great constitutional questions were involved in this matter, and he (the Marquess of Clanricarde) admitted it; for what could be a greater constitutional question than the good government and administration of justice to an immense population? There was another and a distinct part of the Bill before the House, which related to the real and personal property of the late Nawab, respecting which a decision had been pronounced by the Governor of Bombay in Council, and against which all parties were anxious to appeal. They found, however, that they had no appeal to the Privy Council; for, upon making the experiment, the Privy Council declared itself incompetent to entertain the appeal, as it had not been referred to them by the Queen. Another plausible objection had been raised in the petition which had been laid upon their Lordships' table, that the Bill affected the rights of different parties who had received no notice and were resident in a distant country. The fact was, there was not one interested person who had not full notice of the Bill, and was not fully cognizant of its progress. Every party had appealed from the decision of the Governor of Bombay. The Bill itself was propounded last Session, and had been intended to be considered as a public Bill. But the highest authority in the other House — the Speaker — decided that it could not be introduced as a public Bill. The noble Lord, the Chairman of Committees, now said this was not a subject for a private Bill. The applicant did not care whether it came on in the shape of a private or of a public Bill, or whether any other remedy could be proposed for his grievance. It was because he (the Marquess of Clanricarde) was anxious to know whether the Government intended to propose any other remedy for an admitted wrong that he had ventured to ask the noble Duke (the Duke of Argyll) whether the Government had arrived at any conclusion upon the subject. The noble Duke could not deny that a wrong had been done. It had been admitted in the other House by the President of the Board of Control; it had been admitted by the Solicitor General, who voted for the Bill entirely upon grounds of justice. The Government could not venture to set aside a claim which was supported by such high authority. The Bill was referred to a Select Committee of the House of Commons, which was composed chiefly of lawyers eminent for their ability and knowledge of the law, among whom was Mr. Butt and Mr. Napier, lately Her Majesty's Attorney General for Ireland; not one of whom but was not at the present moment qualified to take his seat on the judicial bench. These four lawyers were appointed to inquire into the subject, and the Committee was presided over by Mr. Cardwell; and would any man deny that that right hon. Gentleman, by his intellectual powers, attainments, and habits, was not as able to enter into a legal argument as any man in either House of Parliament? Thus, then, they had a tribunal fit to try any case, and that tribunal reported unanimously in favour of the Bill; but they at the same time stated that there were considerations of policy which might be involved in the question which they did not think it their duty to report upon. The Bill was passed by the House of Commons by a large majority, and was supported by every lawyer in the House, except one hon. and learned Gentleman, who, though undoubtedly not retained to speak against it, it could not be denied had been for many years one of the leading counsel of the East India Company. Every man who had examined into the facts of the case had said that injustice had been committed which required redress by Parliament. He did not ask their Lordships to decide the question upon his mere advocacy; but he did implore their Lordships not to shut the door against inquiry to a person who had brought a case before them so sustained. Let it not be said that there were wrongs that might be committed by a powerful corporation, and that Parliament would not attempt to remedy those wrongs. Were their Lordships to sanction such a principle, they would be taking one great step towards shaking the allegiance of the people of India and of endangering the whole of our Indian empire. All, therefore, that he entreated their Lordships to do was, not to send back to India these persons who asked for a hearing until their case had been heard and fairly and impartially decided. The noble Marquess then moved, that the Bill be now read 2^a.

Amendment moved, to leave out ("now") and insert ("this Day Three Months").

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL said, he should support the Motion of his noble Friend the Chairman of Committees, that the Bill be read a second time that day three months. Undoubtedly his noble Friend made that Motion on a question of form; but, although in coming to that vote it might practically be one on a point of form, yet he hoped to convince their Lordships that they would not be doing any injustice to the merits of the case. But before he proceeded to the question itself, he trusted he might be allowed to say a single word upon this point of form. Among the functions belonging to that House, there were few more important than those connected with the private Bill legislation of the country. Directed as those Bills professedly were to private ends, and the promotion of private interests—supported as they often were by an active personal canvass—they yet frequently affected the most important public principles. It was essential, therefore, for the interests of the country that the parties connected with those Bills should be required to observe the rules laid down by Parliament in respect to the passing of private Bills. Finding, then, the Chairman of Committees repudiating this Bill as a private Bill, he thought it was a strong presumption that the Bill was illegitimate in its nature, and that it dealt with its subject in a manner which ought not to be tolerated. The Bill had been referred to the Standing Orders Committee, and the Committee had reported that they had minutely inquired into this Bill; and they found that none of the standing orders which were applicable to private Bills previously to the second reading were applicable to this Bill. What did this mean? It meant that no such case was made out by the parties as was contemplated by the Committee when those orders were made. That the Bill affected the public interest was beyond question, for it dealt with the revenues of the Crown to the extent in capital of half a million sterling; and as regarded private rights, he must maintain, in spite of the argument of his noble Friend, that one part of the Bill would have a most injurious effect upon the private rights of several individuals who were totally unrepresented in this country, and who, so far as they knew, had no knowledge of such a measure being in contemplation. Under these circumstances, it was not a mere matter of form that their Lordships should strictly adhere to their standing orders. He should be ashamed to make this appeal to their standing orders if he thought it would be a denial of substantial justice to the parties; but he maintained that no substantial injustice had been committed in this case. The Bill itself concerned mainly two questions—one a question respecting the disposal of a perpetual annuity, given by treaty by the East India Company in the year 1800 to the person claiming to be the heir and successor of the late Nawab of Surat; and the other a question respecting the distribution of the private estate of that Nawab. He should confine himself mainly to the first question. In the year 1800 the late Nawab of Surat died. Lord Wellesley was at that time Governor-General of India. The East India Company felt themselves entitled to take into their hands the Government of Surat; and Lord Wellesley accordingly sent down an agent with instructions not to allow the person claiming the Nawabship to assume the Government of Surat, except under the terms of a treaty to be entered into. He would read to their Lordships the terms of that treaty, on which the whole question depended. The preamble of the treaty ran thus:—"Articles of agreement between the East India Company and their successors and the Nawab of Surat, his heirs and successors." It was perfectly true that, in what might be called the enacting clauses of the treaty, the word "successors" was dropped, and the word "heirs" only was used; but it would presently be seen what interpretation this word was to bear. Immediately after the death of the Nawab, in 1842, upon whose death without male heirs this question had arisen, Sir George Arthur, then Governor of Bombay, drew up a Report upon the question, and said that on the whole he was inclined to come to the conclusion that the Company were bound to continue the annuity of £15,000 a year to the personal heirs and family of the Nawab of Surat. Governor Duncan, in his private diary, also spoke of the pension continuing until the Nawab's heirs became extinct; but from other parts of this diary, where it was declared that the Nawab and his family should be secured in constant succession to the Nawabship, he gathered that in the treaty, as well as when Governor Duncan spoke of the heirs becoming extinct, "heirs" were understood as meaning heirs to the Nawabship. The decision of the Governor of Bombay was in due course referred to his noble Friend opposite (the Earl of Ellenborough), then Governor General of India, who, having before him the minute of Sir George Arthur, the diary of Governor Duncan, and all the evidence which the claimant could bring before him, decided that with the title and office of Nawab expired all claim to the money which the British Government engaged to pay annually by the treaty of 1800. That money, said his Lordship, was clearly to be paid as the surplus of the State revenue, after defraying all charges; it would be paid to the Nawab as Nawab; it was not made private property, to be severed from the State when the heads of the State failed. This was the decision, not of the Court of Directors (who, he feared, were at the present moment exceedingly obnoxious, and who had incurred a great deal of public odium in this matter), but it was the interpretation put upon the treaty by the then Governor-General of India, under the guidance and advice of the able men whom he had with him in Council at that time. This very minute was signed by Mr. Thomason, one of the very ablest men in the East India service, and whose administration as Governor of the North Western provinces had been the subject of such just eulogy. Surely the House would be satisfied with such authority. It was not usual for Parliament to interfere with the construction of treaties unless some injustice had evidently been done by the constituted authorities, and he called upon any independent Member of their Lordships' House to say whether there was such a prima facie case of gross injustice as would justify Parliament in interfering in this question either by a private or a public Bill? As to the decision of Sir George Arthur, he strongly suspected that that decision was not so much founded upon a strict construction of the treaty as upon the opinion he entertained that it would be an act of liberality on the part of the East India Company, failing male heirs and failing the nawabship, nevertheless to continue the pension, as a matter of grace and favour, to the members of his family. He was very much confirmed in this impression by a minute drawn up by Mr. Anderson, then a member of Sir George Arthur's Council, who said he doubted if, at the time the treaty was entered into, the lapse of the nawabship was thought of; he believed the pension was intended for those who filled the nawabship. Mr. Anderson's opinion was that the annuity was to be tied up with the title, and in another minute Sir George Arthur said he was glad Mr. Anderson's opinion coincided with his own. He (the Duke of Argyll) thought, then, he was justified in assuming that Sir George's decision with regard to the pension was not founded upon the legal merits of the case, but was merely a generous concession made upon a liberal consideration of all the circumstances of the case. The noble Marquess had endeavoured to cast odium upon the Government of India, as directed by the East India Company, with regard to this matter; but, in point of fact, he could only find that two documents had been sent by the Board of Directors bearing upon the case, and both were to the effect that larger pensions than had been awarded by the local Government should be granted to the family of the late Nawab. The Government of Bombay, acting upon the general instructions of the Board of Directors, had appointed an agent to inquire into and report upon the circumstances of the case and upon the pensions allotted to every member of the family of the late Nawab. The result of that report had been that the Board of Directors had informed the local Government that the pensions which had been allotted were not sufficiently large, and, in fact, £11,000 out of the £15,000 claimed was distributed among the family by their order. Was it, then, fair to take advantage of a passing feeling of hostility against the East India Company in order to bring charges of such a character against them? For his own part, he was prepared to maintain that the East India Company had behaved well towards the family of the late Nawab of Surat, and he hoped that the noble Marquess would not suspect them or the Government of wishing to behave shabbily towards that family. As regarded the course which Her Majesty's Government proposed to pursue, he was not prepared to say that the Government might not refer to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council a question arising out of this case for their decision; but, even if they did, it was difficult to determine what course it would be expedient to pursue, whatever might be the decision of the Judicial Committee. But, notwithstanding that difficulty, he wished to impress upon their Lordships that the Government in rejecting the present Bill, and in calling upon the House to reject it, by no means precluded themselves from such reconsideration of the case as the circumstances of it might appear to require. Great odium had been cast upon the East India Company with regard to this transaction; but he would bring the attention of their Lordships to some of the facts of the case. Their Lordships were aware that it was one of the privileges of high rank in India not to be subject to local jurisdiction, and there was a special agreement with the Nawab of Surat that he should be exempt from the jurisdiction of the ordinary courts of the country. When the late Nawab died a question arose as to the disposition of his property, and, on the suggestion of Mr. Arbuthnot, a special Act was passed to appoint an agent to inquire into and decide upon the subject, and providing that against that decision there should be no appeal, and to that Act the claimant, in the present case, was a consenting party; and not only was he a consenting party, but he objected that under the second clause of the Act, as it was originally drawn up, the agent was not entitled to deal as freely with the property as he ought to be, and he suggested a clause giving the agent fuller power; and that clause was the very one against which he now protested. It was preposterous that the claimant in the present case should now come before Parliament and represent that he was precluded from appeal when he had himself acquiesced in that exclusion. It would be impossible for the Government to consent to have the case re-opened as this Bill attempted to re-open it, when a number of persons, many of them comparatively poor, had for several years been in possession of this property, under the conviction that the matter had been finally decided. The Government were not taking advantage of a mere question of form. They denied the justice of this person's claim, and they thought it would be unjust to the Government of India and the parties concerned to reopen the question, either by a public or a private Bill.

THE EARL OF ALBEMARLE said, he coincided with what had fallen from the noble Marquess respecting the Government, for, on a question relating to India, there was the old juggle of a double Government—at one time it was the East India Company, at another the Board of Control—and the consequence was a mere jumble and confusion. As for the petition of the East India Company—what was the Company?—why for thirty-three years it had been a board subordinate to the Government—a part of the Executive—and he did not know what right they, as a subordinate part of the Government, had to be heard at the bar against the rest of the Government. The Treasury or the Admiralty might just as well apply to be heard against their superiors.

The petition stated that this was the first private Bill which had ever dealt with a subject of this kind. But in 1833, when a case of similar character occurred, the complainant, Mr. Hodges, obtained redress by means of a private Bill. As to the fourth paragraph of the petition, he said he never knew a greater number of statements not borne out by the truth disgrace any petition. The petition stated that the treaty of 1800 was negotiated by the Marquess of Wellesley; that the first of the family of the late Nawab had been raised to the musnud by the East India Company in 1759; and that the Company had always refused, up to 1800, to treat the dignity as hereditary. The facts, however, were that that treaty was concluded by Governor Duncan; that the first of the line of the late Nawab gained possession of the country in 1748, and kept it till he was turned out in 1758, but he became Nawab again the same year without the agency of the Company; and that, in 1798, which was before 1800, the claim of the then late Nawab's son was recognised as hereditary. There were two kinds of Nawabs—the one was a viceroy, the other possessed a merely titular dignity. Before 1800, the late Nawab was a viceroy, and afterwards was reduced to the dignity of the title—he became as it were a Nawab in partibus. But the noble Duke argued that, if there was a failure of male heirs, there must be a failure of the title. Why, John, Duke of Marlborough, received the manor of Woodstock and a pension of £5,000 a year; and did any one believe that, in case of a failure of male heirs in that family, the manor and the pension would be resumable? He, at all events, did not think they would. A member of a Dutch family—the De Ginkell—came over to this country with William III., and was created Earl of Athlone. The last male representative of that nobleman had lately died, and the title became extinct, but the estate was now enjoyed by his daughter. That was a case analogous to the present. Again, the Stanleys, Earls of Derby, had been the Kings of Man, and all their sovereign rights descended to a female. He had said enough to show that no reliance was to be placed upon the petition of the East India Company.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH thought that the noble Duke had gone so satisfactorily into this question that it was not necessary for him to detain their

Lordships at any length. He had been on many occasions compelled to differ from the Court of Directors of the East India Company, but he was satisfied that in the present case they had done their duty as representing the interests of the people of England and of India. The question now before their Lordships was not one between the promoters of this Bill and the East India Company, who had no personal interest in this matter; the question was one between the promoter of this Bill and the people of India, whose money he desired to take away for his private purposes, as he (the Earl of Ellenborough) believed wrongfully; and therefore he opposed the Bill. As far back as the year 1800 a negotiator had made a treaty, in which, like a recent diplomatist, he had not expressed himself with sufficient precision. He had no doubt that the idea of the continuation of the pension, guaranteed to the Nawab and his female descendants, never could have occurred to Governor Duncan as the possible construction of the treaty. He never could have supposed that the descendants could claim anything that was not part and parcel of the nawabship. The Government consulted with Mr. Thomason, who was, perhaps, more competent than any one else to give an opinion on this subject, and who was not only an able and thoroughly conscientious man, but intimately conversant with Eastern habits and Eastern customs and with Mahomedan law. The present question, indeed, seemed to him to be one, not so much for English as for Mahomedan law. The treaty was an Indian treaty, contracted between Indian potentates; while our lawyers had construed it as they would have construed an English deed, giving an annuity to the descendants of an English nobleman. The treaty came under the consideration of the Indian Government in 1843. The documents must have been in the possession of the President of the Board of Control (the Earl of Ripon) in November of that year, and it was for him, if he thought that an erroneous impression prevailed, to call for the opinion of the law officers of the Crown. He (the Earl of Ellenborough) had done that at the Board of Control whenever he had doubts as to the legality of any Indian decisions, so that the law might be corrected if it were erroneous. That decision had been adopted by two Indian Governments, and had been adhered to by three or four Presidents of the Board of Control. Would their Lordships allow him to bring the question into Europe, and to place it more palpably before them than if it were an Indian question? Let him imagine the possibility that the Principalities of Moldavia and Wallachia, which now acknowledged the suzerainty of the Porte, and paid to it a certain sum, desired to relieve themselves from their nominal suzerainty, and that they were permitted to do so, upon the condition that they contracted to pay a certain annual sum to the Sultan and his heirs. Was there any man in that House or in Europe who would say that, if the dignity of the Sultan were extinguished the Principalities of Moldavia and Wallachia would continue after the decease of the Sultan to pay the money to the Pashas who had married his daughters? Why, such an interpretation would be repudiated by the common sense of mankind. In any public treaty it would be the common understanding of European nations that the annuity applied only to heirs male. In India there was no knowledge of heirs female, or of any suzerainty as attached to them. He could not attach great weight to the opinion of a purely English lawyer upon a matter of Mahomedan law; but, considering the knowledge of Eastern habits and Indian law possessed by Mr. Pemberton Leigh and the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, he should feel satisfied if the true construction of the treaty were submitted to that body. What he desired was, to get the matter out of that House and out of Parliament. The Bill was a bad precedent. Already he knew of two or three similar cases, which were only awaiting the decision which their Lordships might come to; and he would caution their Lordships that if they took this first step they would find it very difficult to stop. He deeply regretted that it should have been necessary for the Privy Council to decline to entertain the appeal. It had been done, and there was no remedy; but the conclusion which would be most satisfactory to him would be for the promoters of the Bill to be placed exactly where they would have been if the Privy Council had been able to entertain the appeal. He thought that, as regarded the most important points on which rested the claim of the petitioners, the view taken had not been that of a judicial mind, and that, most probably, the decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council would reverse it. He earnestly desired to submit to that tribunal the question whether, by the treaty of 1800 the annuity granted to the Nawab and his heirs was descendible to heirs general, or only to heirs male.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE said, the noble Duke had been grossly misinformed with respect to the personal property of the late Nawab, as not one sixpence of it had, as yet, gone into the hands of his heirs, as the distribution of it was still sub lite. He had, however, such confidence in the noble Duke, that when he said the case should be placed before the Judicial Committee, and their decision carried into effect, he had no doubt justice would be done to all parties. But he trusted that when the matter had been thus inquired into, steps would be taken to carry the decision of the Privy Council into effect, even although a special Act should be required to enforce it. He had been accused of doing that which he had not done; but he would now earn some portion of that accusation by declaring his opinion that the conduct of the Court of Directors was very bad, very unwise, and open to great reproof, which reproof they had received for the litigation with which they persecuted the people of India; and they were now unpopular, because the people of this country thought that they were guilty of great injustice to the Indian people.

After a few words from Lord DENMAN,

On Question, that ("now") stand part of the Motion, Resolved in the Negative; and Bill to be read 2^a, on this Day Three Months.

CONVOCAATION.

LORD REDESDALE presented a petition from certain Members of the Convocation of the Province of York, praying the House, before proceeding with the Church Discipline Bill, or any measure specifically affecting the clergy, the same may be submitted to the clergy of both Provinces in their Convocations now lawfully in being under the Royal writs addressed to both Archbishops respectively. He thought it unjust that one set of proceedings should be adopted with regard to the Province of Canterbury, and another mode of proceeding with respect to the Province of York. He entertained a strong opinion that if the Convocation of the Province of York was put upon a proper footing much good might result from it. He thought the manner in which the proceedings in Convocation of the Province of Canterbury were conducted showed that all those apprehensions which had been entertained by parties as to their dangerous character were altogether unfounded. Of course, in all public assemblies they must expect differences of opinion, and when discussions took place they were not always conducted in the manner in which it could be wished they should be; but because matters of difference might occur that was no argument against such assemblies altogether. It was very desirable that the Church should represent itself. At the present moment the Church was abused for many things for which it was really not responsible, and it was unjust that it should not be allowed to express its opinion as to what should be done in reference to such questions. At the same time, some improvement ought, he thought, to take place in the constitution of the bodies to which he was referring, and the first and most obvious improvement was the fusion of the two Provinces. Nothing, he was aware, could be done now beyond calling public attention to the matter, but he hoped some attention would be given to the subject of the petition, and that the same privileges would be given to the Convocation of one Province as were enjoyed by the other.

CORPORATION OF LONDON REFORM— QUESTION.

SIR JAMES DUKE asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether the Government would assist the corporation of the City of London in passing a Bill, during the present Session, to extend the right of voting in the election of Aldermen and members in the Common Council to all occupiers within the city who were on the Parliamentary register?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that, as he understood, the Bill referred to, of which he had received a copy from the Recorder, was limited to the object of amending the Act of 1849, having relation to the right of voting for the election of aldermen and sheriffs. This was a very desirable object, and was provided for in the measure for the amendment of the constitution of the Corporation which had lately been withdrawn; but he doubted the policy of introducing a Bill limited to that single object. Besides, the Bill of 1849 was a private Bill, and any Bill to amend it must of course be introduced in the same form; but the regulations of both Houses of Parliament would prevent a private Bill from passing at this period of the Session.

MR. JAMES SADLEIR AND THE TIPPERARY BANK—QUESTION.

MR. G. H. MOORE rose to ask the question of which he had given notice—whether it was true that Mr. James Sadleir had been permitted to leave Ireland without having been arrested; and whether any steps had been taken for the arrest and prosecution of the said James Sadleir by Her Majesty's Government? It was well known that John Sadleir, the late Member for Sligo had been involved in commercial frauds which had no parallel in the criminal history of this country. Who were his confederates and accomplices in these frauds was not yet made public, though the proceedings in the Irish Court of Exchequer pointed to his brother, James Sadleir, as one of the parties. It was also well known that John Sadleir was engaged in a political conspiracy, his associates in which were not doubtful. Relatively to the character of the transactions in which he had been engaged they were regarded by public opinion in Ireland—

MR. SPEAKER called the hon. Member to order. He was to confine himself strictly to the facts in the petition, and such statements as were necessary to make those facts intelligible; and he was not to go beyond them, or make any comment.

MR. G. H. MOORE proceeded. About a month ago the Master of the Rolls in Ireland delivered a charge on the case of the Tipperary Bank, in which he expressed great surprise that the Irish Government had not instituted proceedings for fraudulent conspiracy against James Sadleir, and he went so far even as to say that he should not be surprised if the public held them accountable for his frauds in the event of his escape. The Attorney General for Ireland had on a former occasion told the House that he had gone to Dublin, and taken all the steps necessary to put the powers of the law in force in the case. That was about a month ago. He (Mr. Moore) therefore wished the right hon. Gentleman to state also what were the steps which he had taken to put the law in force, as well as to answer the question of which he had given notice.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. J. D. FITZGERALD) said, he would not follow the hon. Member's example, but would confine himself to the question put on the paper, and avoid extraneous matter. He had already stated the facts in reply to a question put to him on Friday night, or rather Saturday morning. It was quite true that about a month ago, in the early part of June, the Master of the Rolls, in making observations on a case before him, did use expressions tantamount to what was stated by the hon. Member for Mayo, or rather, more strictly speaking, to the effect that, if the Government did not prosecute some person, whom he did not, however, name, the public would consider them guilty of complicity with his crime. In other words, he charged the law officers of the Crown with a dereliction of their duty in not having already instituted a prosecution against that individual. The answer he (Mr. Fitzgerald) gave to this was a statement of the fact that the case had been before another Judge previous to the Master of the Rolls making these observations; and that this Judge, Master Murphy, in whose department the case was, had not only accused no one of fraud, but had acquitted the parties who were before him of all implication in it. He (Mr. Fitzgerald) had further stated, that until he had read these observations of the Master of the Rolls he was wholly unaware of the facts of the case, inasmuch as no one had complained of fraud in connection with the parties in question, and no one had called upon the Government to commence a prosecution against them. But that, when these observations were made, he had felt it to be his duty to pay them the attention which was due to them; that he had proceeded to Dublin accordingly; and that he had not been able to find within the reach of the Crown a single fact, a single document, or a single witness, which would enable him to take any steps in a prosecution. The Master of the Rolls was to deliver his judgment in a few days, but he deferred it till the 22nd of June; and when he delivered it the Court was attended by an officer on his (Mr. FitzGerald's) part, or rather on the part of the Crown, in the hope that the evidence on which the judgment was founded would be placed in the hands of the Crown Solicitor to be submitted to the law officers of the Crown. The Master of the Rolls delivered a lengthened judgment on the occasion, but he did not give the documents in question; though he (Mr. FitzGerald) was bound to state, in justice to that learned Judge, that subsequently he received every assistance which he could afford him. The steps since taken by the Crown in the case were of the promptest character. Considerable difficulty was experienced, as the persons expected to be witnesses were either in communication with the parties implicated or in the employment of Mr. James Sadleir, and evidence was moreover to be sought from this country. He had stated on Friday night that he did not consider it for the advantage of the public to press him to answer the question put by the hon. and learned Member for Youghal. He would, however, say, that the most active steps had been taken in the case, and warrants had been issued for the arrest of Mr. James Sadleir, both in this country and Ireland, on some day in the early part of last week, certainly before Friday. The hon. Member for Mayo had asked if Mr. James Sadleir had been permitted to leave Ireland? Knowing from the former course of the hon. Member what the meaning was that he put on that question, and that he intended to convey the imputation that if Mr. James Sadleir had escaped it was with the connivance of the Government, he (Mr. FitzGerald) had only one answer to give to that question—it was not the fact. He would add, that from the earliest moment the question was brought under his cognisance he had taken the most active steps to prevent Mr. James Sadleir leaving Ireland; and the report of the officers appointed for the purpose was, that he had not left since the 17th or 18th June. If he left before that time, therefore, it was in consequence of the irregular observations of the Master of the Rolls, and not through any fault of the law officers of the Crown.

ARCTIC EXPEDITION—QUESTION.

MR. W. BROWN asked the First Lord of the Admiralty, whether he had any official information of an event that had occurred in the United States touching the British vessel of war Resolute, which had been abandoned in the ice, and was met by a whaler floating about, and which was carried into the United States? The American Government paid the salvage to the whaler, and the American Senate had passed an unanimous Resolution, in which the President and the Secretary of State concurred, that the vessel should be fitted out and restored to Great Britain.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, that the circumstances mentioned by the hon. Gentleman, if accurate, were certainly very creditable to the Government of the United States; but no official report on the subject had been received by Her Majesty's Government. The vessel referred to was, no doubt, one of the Arctic discovery ships that was abandoned a few years ago, and subsequently found adrift in the ice by an American whaler, which put a crew on board of her and took her to the United States. Her Majesty's Government had been asked, whether they would claim her, and they answered in the negative, thinking that those who picked her up after she had been abandoned were entitled to retain her.

HER MAJESTY'S SHIP "TERMAGANT"—QUESTION.

ADMIRAL WALCOTT wished to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty, whether it be correct that a malignant fever has for a second time broken out on board Her Majesty's ship Termagant on the West India station; and, whether, if this be so, the Board of Admiralty has given orders, or propose to give them, for the immediate removal of that ship from a station apparently so ill adapted, from her imperfect means of ventilation, to insure the health of her officers and crew.

SIR CHARLES WOOD believed that the vessel alluded to by the hon. and gallant Member was the Termagant. It was not correct that there was malignant fever on board, although, as was not uncommon in the West Indies, some cases of yellow fever had certainly occurred in her, and she had therefore been sent to the northward, which it was well known was one of the best specifics for that malady.

VACCINATION BILL—QUESTION.

MR. T. DUNCOMBE asked the right hon. the President of the Board of Health, if he could fix any time when the Vaccination Bill would be brought on?

MR. COWPER said, the Bill was one in which Members did not take any great interest. It was one of that class of Bills which was usually taken at a late period of the evening, and he hoped the hon. Member would not object to its being taken at the same time as other Bills similarly situated.

MR. T. DUNCOMBE, referring to the answer given by the hon. Member for Hertford (Mr. Cowper), asked whether it was the intention of the Government to persevere in pressing this Bill through the House. The hon. Member had, to a similar question with respect to the Medical Profession Bill, immediately surrendered it; but to those on this side of the House, he said few Members cared for this Vaccination Bill. He (Mr. Duncombe) would say that, if hon. Members did not care for this Bill, they did great injustice to the people, because it was a compulsory Bill. Besides, 200 petitions had been presented against the Bill, and only one, namely, that from the Royal Vaccine Establishment, in its favour. The Bill, if passed, would be put into work by the Board of Health; but that Board would expire next year, unless the House should to-morrow consent to continue it. A more arrant job than this Bill he never knew, and he hoped an opportunity would be given to oppose it.

MR. COWPER said, he did not mean to say the Bill was of no importance, because it was intended to check the ravages of a disease which killed thousands every year. This Bill was one of greater importance than many which were passed, and which did no good to anybody. What he intended to say was, that the opposition which his hon. Friend made to this Bill was not generally shared in by other hon. Members. His hon. Friend said, the Bill would make vaccination compulsory; but the present law did that. This Bill was merely for the purpose of consolidating and improving the law. His hon. Friend opposed this Bill; but it would be much fairer for him to bring in a Bill to repeal the existing law than to do so. He would not bring it on after twelve o'clock at night.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS AND THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND—EXPLANATION.

COLONEL FRENCH wished to take the present opportunity of expressing his regret at the observations which had fallen from the right hon. Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland, on a former evening relative to the Irish Master of the Rolls. He regretted that such observations should have fallen from one in the position of the right hon. Gentleman, and he begged to say that there was not in England or Ireland a person of higher honour or of greater legal attainments, or a Judge in whom the public had more confidence, than the present Master of the Rolls in Ireland. ●

Mr. Cowper

MR. J. D. FITZGERALD expressed his entire concurrence in what had fallen from the hon. and gallant Member, as to the character and legal acquirements and high honour of the Master of the Rolls in Ireland; but he had stated, that he thought the observations of the learned Judge, on the case referred to, were irregular; and that, if a person charged with crime had left the country, his doing so had been brought about by those observations.

MR. NAPIER said, in consequence of the observations of the Attorney General the other evening, he had written to Ireland to ascertain the true state of the facts in this case.

WAYS AND MEANS.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY then said, he had given notice of calling attention to a most important matter. The Resolutions before the House passed at one o'clock in the morning, and the House had been entirely deprived of the opportunity of judging of the state of the finances of the kingdom in consequence of the total absence of the accounts relating to the past expenditure. The House knew nothing of the financial transactions of the country up to the end of March last. The papers were laid upon the table so late as to be of no use to hon. Members during the Session. This year the papers were presented to the House on the 10th of June, but not in time to prevent the House voting money without any knowledge of the previous expenditure. Last year the papers were laid on the table in July, but were not printed and sent to hon. Members until the 6th of October, so that, in point of fact, the House decided questions without having accurate information. The delay which occurred in laying the accounts on the table of the House was productive of serious inconvenience, and gave rise to a most anomalous state of things; hon. Gentlemen voted away millions of money without knowing in what manner it was expended. He called upon Her Majesty's Government so to arrange matters, as to have the accounts printed earlier, and in the hands of Members before they left town for different parts of the country.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, if the hon. Gentleman meant that they should return to the old system of financial accounts, he would be still further than now from getting the information he desired, for the accounts were then made up to the 5th of January, whereas the financial year did not end till the 5th of April. With regard to the production of the accounts, he might state that the whole of them were in the hands of the printers on the 4th of June with the exception of those of the Land Revenue Department. The Department of Land Revenue had to call in the accounts of the various Crown estates, a duty which was attended with delay and difficulty; and the Commissioners had not yet succeeded in making up their accounts. When they were completed, however, he could assure the House that no delay would take place in having the whole laid on the table.

MR. W. WILLIAMS must say, that the public accounts were in a most unsatisfactory state—in such a state as to render it necessary for that House to take measures for providing a remedy. He had endeavoured, time after time, to ascertain what had become of the enormous amount voted for the militia in 1855—a sum amounting to £3,800,000. Not more than 65,000 militia had been embodied—a number coming very far short of what had been voted by Parliament, and yet nobody could inform him what had become of the money granted by the House. It was high time for the House to take steps towards securing the necessary information as to the expenditure of the public money.

MR. DISRAELI thought that what the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had stated, with regard to the importance of the finance accounts terminating at the end of the financial year was quite unanswerable. Any other mode of making up the accounts would be most unsatisfactory; but at the same time it did not appear to him that the other portions or the right hon. Gentleman's statement were quite so much to the point. What he should like to know was, why the accounts, if they were ready for the printer on the 4th of June, were not yet on the table? They might have been printed in a week. What the right hon. Gentleman said as to the Land Revenue Department not being prepared with their accounts was by no means satisfactory, because the question still remained, why were they not prepared? The right hon. Gentleman had ample power in this matter, and he should have issued orders to have these accounts forwarded in due time. At all events, the House might have had before it other accounts which were of much greater importance than those connected with the Land Revenue Department. It was exceedingly important that they should have in their hands the various accounts in the form in which they were drawn up, and it was the duty of the Government to see that these were regularly laid before them, as every one must feel that the present state of matters was highly unsatisfactory. It would be out of the question to think of returning to the old system, as that would give them no information whatever, but there was no reason why in two months' time, after the closing of the financial year, the whole of the accounts should not be laid on the table.

SIR FRANCIS BARING agreed with the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that to make up the accounts to the end of January would not afford the explanation which was asked for; but, at the same time, the present system was full of inconvenience. Last year the accounts were not produced till after the close of the Session, and this year the whole of the Supply had been granted, and the accounts were not yet on the table. This subject had not escaped the attention of the Committee for which he had moved, and he trusted they would be able to make some valuable suggestions on this subject.

SIR H. WILLOUGHBY explained that he had been misunderstood by the Chancellor of the Exchequer. He did not want to go back to the old system of finance accounts; but he thought the statesmen of the reign of George III. were wiser than the statesmen of the present day, for they always got their financial accounts by the month of May.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, it was a mistake to suppose that the Government had any wish to withhold accounts and information from the House. Nothing, indeed, could be further from the truth. The Government were anxious to lay the accounts on the table at the earliest possible moment, but it was necessary to wait until they were completed. There was one important account—that of Land Revenue—which it had not hitherto been in the power of the heads of departments to exhibit in a complete form. When it had been finished the other accounts would be presented to the House.

Resolutions agreed to.

Order for Second Reading read.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL moved the second reading of this Bill, and said it was one that had come to them from the House of Lords, where it was introduced upon the Report of a Committee appointed to inquire into the exercise of the appellate jurisdiction of that House, with the view of seeing whether any Amendments might be suggested. That Committee, after receiving a great deal of very important evidence, made a Report to the House of Lords, which in substance declared that the appellate jurisdiction of the Upper House as now exercised was not satisfactory, and that the time had arrived for making certain improvements which they recommended, and the principle of which were embodied in the present measure. There could be no doubt of the great importance of the subject. The House of Lords, as they all knew, exercised in all suits, both at common law and in equity, a jurisdiction as a Court of Appeal in the last resort, and by its decisions all such suits were finally settled and determined. Now, it was perfectly notorious, and he thought could not be contradicted, that for some time past great dissatisfaction on the part of the suitors and of the legal profession had existed with respect to the manner in which the appellate jurisdiction had been exercised. Hon. Members were aware that, although the appellate jurisdiction was vested, according to the theory of the constitution, in the House of Lords, yet practically it was not exercised by the whole body of the Members of that House, but was left in the hands of those Members only who were holding or had held high judicial office. With the exception of the Lord Chancellor for the time being, and the Lord Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench—who was, and generally had been, a Member of the House of Lords—the Judges of the Court had consisted of those who had formerly held the office of Chancellor, with the occasional but very rare exception of other Members of the House who had belonged to the legal profession. A body of Judges so composed was open to several inconveniences. It was quite clear that the number of such Judges—that was to say, Judges not exercising actual judicial functions—must depend more or less upon accident. Sometimes the number of ex-Chancellors had been considerable; at others it had been comparatively small. A long Administration, during which the Chancellorship remained in the same hands, would have a tendency to limit the number; while, on the other hand, frequent changes of Government would increase the number of those who had held the Great Seal. Again, the circumstances of age and infirmity must be taken into account as exercising an influence with respect to the attendance of those who hold seats in the House of Lords under the designation of “law Lords.” But, lastly, supposing that there was a sufficient number of law Lords to furnish a requisite body of persons to act as Judges on appeals in the House of Lords, there was nothing, except in the case of a person holding a judicial office like the Lord Chancellor, to make it obligatory on them to attend. Their attendance was purely voluntary. Considerations of personal convenience or other occupations might make the number who attended extremely small. The result had been, that for some time past the number of law Lords attending on hearing of appeals had been reduced below the point which was at all satisfactory either to the suitors or the public. It had frequently happened that not more than two Judges had sat on very important appeals, and not unfrequently the number had been reduced even to one. Now this was a state of things which must be deemed unsatisfactory, when it was considered that the House of Lords was the appellate tribunal in the last resort from Courts of Error, also courts of high authority, and that in cases which came before them they might have to adjudicate on matters theretofore decided on by two of the Courts of common law, perhaps confirming the decision of a third, or, in equity, cases which had been decided by the Lords Justices, confirming, perhaps, in like manner, the judgment of the Master of the Rolls or one of the Vice Chancellors, or, lastly, on cases which had come up from the Court of Session in Scotland, which consisted of a number of Judges who were surely better acquainted with the principles and rules of Scotch jurisprudence than any English Judge or Judges, however eminent, could possibly be. In all these cases the decision in the highest and last

Court of Appeal might be the decision of a single law Lord. But, again, in many instances, where two Judges sat in the House of Lords, the evil was, if possible, greater. Nothing had been more frequent of late than to see the two Judges in the House of Lords divided in opinion; the effect of which was that the judgment of the inferior Court could not be reversed, and was held to be affirmed. That occurred several times when the Lord Chancellor and Lord St. Leonards sat together as Judges, being the only law Lords present; and the effect had necessarily been to cause a feeling of great dissatisfaction. In a case mentioned in the evidence there had been conflicting decisions given by the Court of Exchequer and the Master of the Rolls. There was an appeal from the judgment of the latter, and it was heard before two law Lords; they differed, and the result was that the judgment of the Master of the Rolls was confirmed, notwithstanding the conflicting decision of the Court of Exchequer. Meantime there were several other suits in Chancery standing over to await the result of the appeal which had thus proved abortive. If it happened that the Lord Chancellor was sitting alone, he might confirm by his own judgment a decision which he had given in the Court of Chancery in opposition to that of an inferior Court—a state of things which must strike every one as the reverse of what was desirable in a Court of final appeal. But not only was the composition of the House as an appellate tribunal unsatisfactory, there was another inconvenience which nothing but the interference of Parliament could remedy. The sitting of the House of Lords as a Court of final appeal could only be coextensive in time with its sittings as a branch of the Legislature; so that from the prorogation of Parliament until the Parliament met again all appeals were necessarily in abeyance. Nothing could be more inconvenient than this delay, especially where the appeals were in matters of injunction or specific performance; and, according to the evidence given before the Committee of the House of Lords, it led to this further inconvenience, that the shortest period within which an appeal could be brought to hearing was at least two years. All these matters were subjects of grave and serious consideration. He had omitted to notice other topics brought forward in evidence before the Lords—the want of the externals of judicial office, the absence of a specific dress—the want of a common combination as regards sitting, enabling the Judges to hear one another and hold communications together, so necessary for the due administration of the judicial office; and the grievous expense of which parties complained, arising from the proceedings in the House of Lords; because these were matters which did not require the interposition of the Legislature, as they might easily be corrected by arrangements made by the House of Lords itself. The matters, however, to which the present Bill related could not be corrected except by the interposition of the Legislature. An efficient number of the Judges could not be secured, their attendance could not be compelled, and the sittings of the Court of Appeal could not be made like the sittings of any other Court, extending over the whole judicial year, except by passing an Act of Parliament; and hence it was that the present Bill was necessary. He was well aware that very strong objections had been urged to this Bill from various quarters, arising, perhaps, from different considerations; but the question for the House to consider dispassionately was, whether, when the evidence taken before the Lords' Committee demonstrated that the administration of justice by the House of Lords, as an appellate tribunal, was glaringly unsatisfactory to the suitors and the public, it was not necessary to do something to meet the evils complained of, and to improve the character of the House of Lords as a judicial tribunal in the last resort; and whether the present Bill did not offer the best practical remedy, and, indeed, under the circumstances, the only remedy that could be devised? He knew that many persons thought that the simple and shorter course would be to withdraw from the House of Lords the appellate jurisdiction. [Cheers.] He found by that cheer that he was not wrong in anticipating that that argument would be urged; but to such a course were there not very serious, if not insuperable, difficulties? Even if such an object could be accomplished at all, it was likely that great delay would take place before it was attained, and in the meantime the unhappy suitors would be left in the same position as they stood in at present. Many persons conceived that to deprive the Lords of their judicial functions would be to strip them of one of the chief elements of their importance and dignity. He owned he could not bring himself to look on the matter in that light. He did not see the necessary connection between the functions of the House of Lords, as an integral portion of the constitution and Legislature, and the exercise of judicial functions, which, after all, were not exercised by the House itself, but only by the law Members, a few lay Lords being present to constitute the House; but, as far as judicial proceedings were concerned, acting only the part of mutes. He could not help thinking that the dignity and influence of the House of Lords was rather impaired than otherwise by its appellate jurisdiction, so long as the administration of that jurisdiction was the subject of just complaint and was regarded as a grievance; but, on the other hand, there were persons who thought otherwise, and who would resist to the utmost any proposition to divest the House of Lords of its judicial functions. The grave difficulties in the way of withdrawing the judicial functions from the House of Lords must not be overlooked. To what tribunal could they be transferred? He thought it would be impossible to constitute a tribunal in the last resort other than the House of Lords without recasting and reconstructing the whole judicature of the country. There would be great difficulty in creating a Court which should decide in the last resort appeals brought up from all the Superior Courts of common law and the Courts of Equity. If it were proposed to form such a tribunal from the Judges at the present sitting in those Courts, then of course they must be withdrawn from the important duties which they had to discharge in their proper Courts. It had been argued that the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council should be made the last Court of Appeal. He was perfectly ready to admit that it was impossible to conceive a Court the functions of which were discharged more admirably; but, on the other hand, they must not overlook the difficulties which would stand in the way of transferring the whole appellate jurisdiction of the country to that Court. At the present moment the Judicial Committee consisted of Members of the Privy Council, who, with one or two exceptions, either held, or had formerly held, judicial offices. There was one splendid exception—a Member of that tribunal, a shining light of justice, who must add dignity, lustre, and efficiency to any Court in which he sat—he meant Mr. Pemberton Leigh—in respect of whom, if there was ever a matter of surprise and regret, it was that he had never filled a judicial office, worthy as he was to have filled the highest of all. The Committee, then, consisted generally of two classes—those who were actually Judges of Courts, and those who had been, but who had ceased to be, such Judges. With respect to those Members of the Judicial Committee who had ceased to hold judicial offices, it must be remembered that they had already earned an honourable retirement by the discharge of important judicial duties, and that the country had no right to call upon them now to undertake the whole appellate business of the country. It would be impossible to make their attendance compulsory, and if they attended at all it must be as volunteers. With regard to those Members of the Committee who were Judges of Courts, they were enabled to attend the Committee because the amount of its business was comparatively small and its sittings were occasional. Those Judges were the Lord Chief Justice, the Lords Justices, and other Members of the Superior Courts, the Judge of the Admiralty, and the Judge of the Prerogative Court. They were at present able to attend; but if the whole appellate business of the country was thrown upon the Judicial Committee, it would render it impossible for them to devote as much of their time as was due to their own Courts, and at the same time to serve as Members of the Privy Council. If the Judicial Committee, therefore, were to be made the sole tribunal of appeal in the last resort, it would be necessary to recast it. There was a still greater difficulty in the way, which, perhaps, he ought to have put first. The House of Lords could not be divested of this appellate jurisdiction without its own consent, and, so far as he could gather from all that had passed on the subject, the last thing which the House of Lords dreamt of was the surrender of their prerogative. Unless, therefore, the House of Lords could be persuaded to give up their appellate jurisdiction, all that was left was to endeavour to improve it, and to make it what it was not now—an efficient and satisfactory tribunal in the last resort. Attempts had already been made to do this without legislative interference. Hon. Members who had heard the petition of Lord Wensleydale read were quite aware what had passed with respect to the elevation to a life peerage of that eminent personage, of whom, as he was present, he could not say all that he might otherwise have wished—[Lord Wensleydale occupied a seat in the Peers' box];—this much, however, he might state, namely, that no individual could have been selected more fitted for the performance of any duties that could be entrusted to him. The noble Lord was selected by Her Majesty to discharge judicial functions in the House of Lords; but that attempt, as they were all aware, had failed. It failed because, although many eminent persons, whose opinions were entitled to the greatest weight—and the authority of the noble Baron himself was second to none in such matters—considered that Her Majesty had done no more than exercise Her undoubted prerogative in conferring upon him a peerage for life, the House of Lords had been practically enabled to frustrate Her Majesty's writ, the constitution having placed it in its power to determine upon the validity of any writ of summons which might be presented at its bar. Under these circumstances Lord Wensleydale had not been able to take his place in the House of Lords. The question, then, arose, what was to be done? They might undoubtedly elevate a sufficient number of eminent judicial persons to the dignity of the peerage; but there would be considerable difficulty in carrying a plan like that into effect. There were now few lawyers who could afford, with any due regard to themselves or their families, to take upon themselves the dignity of a peerage. Things were not as they used to be, and fortunes were not now to be easily earned at the bar. The number of the Courts had of late been greatly increased. Formerly there were few Queen's Counsel; now there were a great number; and many changes had been made in the administration of justice, which were beneficial, no doubt, to suitors, to the public, and to the profession, but which rendered it very difficult to amass such fortunes as would justify a man imposing upon his family the onerous burden of a peerage. They were thus in this dilemma. The House of Lords would not admit life Peers, and they could not obtain a sufficient number of lawyers to accept hereditary peerages; they would not part with their appellate jurisdiction, and it was admitted on all hands—themselves included—that the exercise of that jurisdiction was in a most unsatisfactory condition. What, then, was to be done? Would they enter upon a conflict with the House of Lords? But how long would that conflict last, and what was to become in the meantime of the unfortunate suitors? Besides, even if the House of Lords were disposed to admit Peers created for life, they would still have to resort to legislation for the purpose of making the sittings of the appellate tribunal coextensive with the legal year. What, then, was the objection to the Bill? It would give efficiency to the House of Lords as a judicial body, and it would also enable Her Majesty to supply a defect which had long been regarded as a grievance, and even as a scandal. He did not believe there was any desire to have a Scotch Court of Appeal; but it was desired (and the wish seemed to him not unreasonable) that there should be a Scotch Judge introduced into the House of Lords, who might assist his learned brethren with his knowledge and experience of Scottish law and procedure, whenever appeals from the northern part of the island came before the House for final decision. Was not that a simple, and at the same time an efficient course to pursue? He was perfectly aware of the objections to the Bill. He could only put it to the House in this way—they had a most grievous evil to overcome, and this was the only practical means of doing it. But then it would be said that they were surrendering the Royal prerogative. It would be said that, whereas the Crown had, by virtue of its prerogative, in the opinion of many of the most eminent constitutional lawyers of the day, the right to create life Peers, the Government were abandoning that right, as indeed was suggested by the petition of Lord Wensleydale. In answer to that, he could only say that although they really asserted the Royal prerogative, and he was quite prepared to assert it, and as far in him lay to support it whenever the opportunity arose—still, practically, to stand up for that prerogative in the face of circumstances which rendered improvement imperatively necessary, would be to make that prerogative stand in the way of such an improvement. He could only present this Bill as a mode of getting out of the difficulty. [Laughter.] Hon. Gentlemen might laugh; but he did not for a single moment disguise that there were difficulties which beset this question. The evil they had to overcome was a vast and a fearful one; for what could be worse than an inefficient administration of justice, and a sense of wrong entertained by suitors? Therefore the House ought to apply itself with earnestness and with its best ability and power to overcome that difficulty. He submitted that the proposition involved in this Bill did meet and overcome the difficulty. Better courses might possibly be suggested. The question was, could they be carried into practical operation? Unless it could be shown to the satisfaction of the House that some other scheme was practicable which would effect the object of establishing an appellate tribunal in the last resort, at once efficient and satisfactory to the suitors and the country—he hoped that the House would not lightly or inconsiderately reject a proposition which at all events held out a prospect of effecting that great improvement so loudly demanded.

Motion made and Question proposed, “That the Bill be now read a second time.”

MR. BOWYER rose, pursuant to notice, to move that the Bill be read a second time that day six months. Early in the present Session, when the question of the appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords was first mooted, he had said that that House ought not to remain a stranger to the discussion of a matter so deeply affecting the rights and interests of their constituents. It then appeared to him that the opinions of the most eminent persons in that House ought to be elicited, and go forth to the country; so that public opinion might exercise a salutary influence on the decision of this great question. Entertaining as he did the profoundest respect for the House of Lords, he thought that there was danger of the question being considered with too much reference to local feelings and prepossessions, and rather with reference to the dignity and privileges of that House, than with reference to the necessity of providing a large and thoroughly satisfactory measure for the reform of that great branch of the administration of justice and the public service. It was true their Lordships had disclaimed any such influence, and professed themselves ready to give up the appellate jurisdiction altogether, if it could be shown that the satisfactory administration of justice required the renunciation of their privileges. He believed their Lordships were sincere, but it seemed the Attorney General did not think so; for he said that nothing remained but to accept the House of Lords as the court of supreme judicature, and to submit to the course now proposed as the only mode of solving the difficulty. The Bill now before the House showed that his (Mr. Bow-yer's) fears were not groundless. He considered the Bill altogether inadequate to satisfy the just expectations of the country and the exigencies of the public service. It was more like an expedient to stop a clamour, than a well-considered and well-digested measure for the reform and reconstruction of the tribunal of ultimate appeal. He need not enter into any arguments to prove the necessity of a reform of that tribunal; that had been already proved by the Attorney General, and it had been admitted in the Report of the Committee of the House of Lords, that their House was not adequate to the discharge of the judicial duties with which it was invested by the constitution. The statements in that Report, however, fell very far short of the real evils which attended the appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords as it now stood. These evils, as stated in the Report, were—uncertainty as to the number of law Lords, besides the Chancellor, who heard appeals; that the House sat during only six months of each year; and that the administration of Scotch law had been at times unsatisfactory. He would take these evils in the order in which they stood in the Report. Not only was there uncertainty in the number of law Lords, besides the Chancellor, who sat to hear appeals, but there was a manifest want of strength of law Lords. It often happened that the Chancellor sat alone and heard appeals, either from himself or from the two Lords Justices in Chancery. If only one law Lord sat with him, and they differed in opinion, there was no judgment, and of such cases five occurred during the last Session of Parliament. In cases of appeal from the Courts of Error, opinions pronounced by nine common law Judges were perhaps set aside by men who had never held a brief in their lives in a common law Court. Even when the Judges were called in, the case was not much better, because they were not allowed to ask a single question of counsel, nor to take any part in the proceedings. That the appellate tribunal sat only during six months of the year was not only an inconvenience, but an absolute denial of justice and a constitutional absurdity. It ought to sit during the whole of the judicial year. The Lords' Committee reported that the administration of Scotch appeals had at times been unsatisfactory. Now, he (Mr. Bowyer) had no hesitation in saying, that the administration of Scotch law was not only “at times,” but always unsatisfactory ; and, as the tribunal of appeal was at present constituted, it must necessarily be so. The appeal was from the fifteen Judges of Scotland—men of the greatest dignity and experience—to two or three English Judges who knew nothing of Scotch law. At the present time, it happened that the Lord Chief Justice was a Scotchman and acquainted with Scotch law, but he was detained elsewhere often by the pressure of other duties. Lord Brougham, too, was well acquainted with Scotch law, but could not now be expected to attend regularly to dispose of appeals. It was said that Lord Erskine, a Scotchman, had been Lord Chancellor ; but that was an accidental circumstance, which should not prevent the Legislature from dealing with this important subject, and Lord Erskine was more an orator than a lawyer. Having shown how inadequately the Report had dealt with the evils which were stated upon its face, he would proceed to consider the provisions of the Bill, and how far they were likely to cure those evils. The proposal was to create two Deputy Speakers to assist the Lord Chancellor in the hearing of appeals, giving to such Deputy Speakers salaries in order to secure their regular attendance. The Bill also contained a limitation of the power of creating life Peers to the extent of four. It was also provided that no writ to sit in the House of Lords should issue to a life Peer, except he were one of the Deputy Speakers, or held the office of Lord Chancellor. The chief feature of the Bill was, that which operated on the right of creating Peers for life. Without entering upon the constitutional question as to the prerogative of the Crown to create such Peers, he would only observe that the Bill before the House did not settle that point. It, however, did something which was very important—it sanctioned the creation of Peers for life without seats in the House of Lords—a perfectly new order of nobility. Upon that point some very grave constitutional considerations would arise. One question was, what would be the status of those Peers for life ? By the constitutional laws of the country every man not a Peer was a commoner, and every Peer was either entitled to sit in the House of Lords, or, as in the case of the Scotch and Irish Peers, was represented in that body by Peers whom they selected. The Bill would sanction the creation of Peers who would neither have seats in the House of Lords nor be represented there. What, then, would be the rights and privileges of such persons ? Would they have a right to claim a trial by their Peers ? Would they be eligible to be elected to seats in the House of Commons ? But the creation of those titular peerages must lead to serious results. Admirals and generals who had greatly served their country, judges and statesmen of great distinction, might be created life Peers, and public opinion would not long permit the exclusion of such persons from the House of Lords. There would then occur a great change in the constitution of the House of Lords, for there would be two classes of Peers who would never amalgamate and would never be upon an equality. Such a subject was one which merited the most mature and deliberate consideration of Parliament, and should not be dealt with indirectly. The Bill, by its title, appeared to relate entirely to the administration of justice, but under cover of that Bill, a most vital change in the constitution of Parliament might be brought about. A further inspection of the Bill had led him to discover many anomalies and absurdities. He would first call their attention to the title of Deputy Speaker. A Speaker was a president or prolocutor, and a Deputy Speaker was a person to act in that capacity when the Speaker was absent. In the case provided for by the Bill, the Speaker and the Deputy Speakers were to sit together. Then, again, the Speaker and the Deputy Speakers were practically to sit without a House. The Bill, certainly, did not provide that the lay Lords should not take any part in appeals, but the understanding was, that they would abdicate their functions. If so the House would consist of a Speaker and two Deputy Speakers. Could anything be more absurd ? Another and most important anomaly was, that the House of Lords was to be empowered to sit during a prorogation of Parliament. That was a proposal which he thought should be regarded with great constitutional jealousy, for it was almost unprecedented in our history. It was true that in the reign of Edward III. an Act was passed which enabled certain Lords and Bishops to sit when Parliament was not sitting ; but the powers of that Committee were limited to reception of complaints of delays in the inferior Courts, and, moreover, the period was a revolutionary one and could form no precedent for our times. But, even if that were a precedent, the course proposed would be opposed to the fundamental principles of the constitution. The appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords was exercised by the Queen in Parliament, and Hale had shown that from the most ancient times writs of error were brought before the King in Parliament. At one time that (the Commons) House claimed a right to participate in the exercise of the appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords, upon the ground that it formed one branch of the High Court of Parliament. By the principles of the constitution Parliament could not be divided by time, and all its three branches must be in existence at the same moment, and though one House might adjourn for a few days while the other continued to meet, both Houses must be prorogued at the same time. But by this Bill it was now proposed that the Queen and the House of Lords should sit in Parliament while the House of Commons was not sitting. Clause 5, enabling the House of Lords to dispose of appeals and writs of error during the prorogation, ended with the proviso that no other business than the determination of appeals "and matters connected therewith" should be transacted by the Upper House under such circumstances. What was the meaning of the words "matters connected therewith?" Encroachments on constitutional principles had before now taken place under cover of language far less vague and indefinite than this; and, although there might be no immediate danger of an invasion of the privileges of that House, it behoved them to guard with jealous care against the least loophole for a departure from the fundamental principles of the constitution. A further question was, who were to be the Judges of this Court of Appeal? The Lord Chancellor and four Peers for life. Practically, however, there would be the Lord Chancellor and only two life Peers, because there was nothing to compel the other life Peers, who would be unpaid, to attend. It was said that one of the Deputy Speakers was to be a Scotch Judge, and it was certainly impossible for the hearing of appeals from Scotland to be improved without some such arrangement. It was also stated that the Scotch Judge was to be unpaid; but it would doubtless be found that Scotch jurists were men far too shrewd and practical to come to London to discharge such functions without receiving proper remuneration. The Judge of the Admiralty Court and the Judge of the Prerogative Court were also to be Deputy Speakers; but the branches of the law which the House of Lords had to administer being totally different from that dealt with in either of those Courts, where could be the sense of this provision? Let the House pause and consider how the proposed tribunal of last resort was likely to work. First, there would be the appeals from the Courts of Equity. These would go up from the Lord Chancellor to the same high judicial personage, assisted by two Deputy Speakers, one of whom would be a Scotch Judge wholly ignorant of English law, and the other a common law Judge, who, perhaps, had never held a brief in a Court of Equity. The same unsatisfactory tribunal would determine appeals from the two Lords Justices—Judges of the highest rank and the greatest experience. The result would be still more anomalous if the Deputy Speakers were the Judges of the Admiralty and the Prerogative Courts, because then the appeal would practically be from the Lords Justices to the Lord Chancellor alone, and he would be really one equity Judge sitting to determine on the decisions of two equity Judges of the highest rank. Next, there was the jurisdiction upon writs of error from England and Ireland. Those writs proceeded from the Court of Exchequer Chamber, consisting of ten Judges, the case before reaching that Court having been heard in one of the three Superior Courts. Yet they would go to the Lord Chancellor in most instances an equity Judge who had probably never practised at common law, assisted by a Scotch Judge knowing nothing of English law, and an English Judge who might be either an equity Judge or a common law Judge. The appeal would, therefore, practically lie from ten common law Judges to one common law Judge. A stronger reductio ad absurdum than this it was impossible to conceive. There still remained the appeals from Scotland, which would go up from fifteen Judges of the highest rank and experience sitting in the Court of Session, to the Lord Chancellor, who had no knowledge of Scotch law, assisted by one Scotch Judge and one English Judge of common law or of equity. Such would be the operation of this Bill, which surely could not deserve the sanction of the House. But the measure had another fault of a radical nature; it did not deal with the great constitutional defects of our judicial system. There were now two supreme Courts of Appeal in this country—the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council and the House of Lords. These two Courts might take quite different views of the construction of the same statute and administer the law quite differently. Such a system could not be defended; and a Bill which professed to deal with the supreme appellate jurisdiction of the country, and which did not remedy the existing evil, must be regarded as inadequate and unsatisfactory. The defects of such a system were even greater in this country than they would be in most other countries in Europe. In most continental States the decisions of Judges were founded upon established codes or upon the civil law, or on both combined. But here the case was different. The greater part of the decisions of our Courts were founded on reported cases; and though it was true that the Courts decided according to law, yet the law was what the Courts had decided, which was a vicious circle. There were, moreover, a great many important questions still in doubt, and which Judges might decide just as they pleased. The amount of doubt connected with the law of this country was, he believed, unexampled in any other country, and if it were not for the high character of our Judges our legal system would be so arbitrary as to be absolutely intolerable. The law of this country was now in a state of transition; the boundaries between law and equity were not so decidedly marked as was formerly the case; and the tendency of the Judges was to unite the two as much as possible. Under such circumstances, he thought the establishment of a single supreme Court, permanent and independent, was absolutely necessary for the development of our jurisprudence. He would venture to say that without the institution of the Court of Cassation in France the Code Napoléon would have been almost inoperative; and even now complaints were made of the quantity of uncertain and undefined law which had grown up, like a sort of jungle, about that code. The question was then, what remedy ought to be applied? The Attorney General had defied any one to suggest a better measure than that now under consideration, and the hon. and learned Gentleman asked to whom, if the House of Lords were deprived of their appellate jurisdiction, that jurisdiction was to be transferred? He (Mr. Bowyer) would suggest the remedy which common sense pointed out—the establishment of a supreme Court, to consist of not less than five Judges, selected from the best men on the bench or at the bar, and he would transfer to such Court the jurisdiction of the House of Lords and that of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. The members of the Court should be persons bred and trained to different branches of the law, and should have nothing but the appeal business to attend to. He proposed that that Court should sit during the whole of the judicial year, and that it should be composed of Judges acquainted with the various laws prevailing in this empire. Those Judges would not only be enabled to hear appeals without unnecessary delay, and consequently without causing undue expense to the suitors, but, from being in frequent communication and from constantly sitting together, they would doubtless, in course of time, form a series of decisions which would go far to fix and to develop the jurisprudence of this country. The only objection to the plan he suggested was its expense. The County Courts had already diminished very materially the business of the Superior Courts of common law, and as the County Courts received an accession of jurisdiction the effect on the business of the Superior Courts would doubtless be still more considerable. The Court of Exchequer and the Court of Common Pleas had not at present sufficient employment, and the expense of the supreme Court he proposed to establish might be partially met by reducing the number of Judges in those Courts. This Court would answer another purpose—it could be made a Court of Criminal Appeal. In this country, if a man had a judgment given against him for a small sum of money he had an appeal to other Courts; but if he was sentenced to be hanged he had no appeal except ex gratia, and that appeal, he believed, was never given, or by a point being reserved, which remedy depended on the discretion of the Judge. A writ of error was his only remedy, and that could only be for an error apparent on the record; but there might be no error on the face of the record, and yet the man be substantially innocent; or there might be error on the face of the record and the man be substantially guilty. In point of fact, the carrying or not carrying out of the sentence lay practically with the Home Secretary, and he could conceive nothing more unconstitutional than to repose such a power in that functionary. If, however, there was a Court of Appeal in criminal cases, with the power of granting a new trial, it would remedy this great defect ; and such a Court would be found in the tribunal which he had taken the liberty to suggest. He trusted he had said enough to show that this Bill would be inadequate for the purpose for which it was intended, that it was replete with absurdities, and that its operation would scarcely be more satisfactory than the working of the jurisdiction which it was intended to amend. He objected to the Bill being accepted as an experiment, because what might be called bit-by-bit improvements always stood in the way of effectual reforms. The hon. and learned Gentleman then moved that the Bill be read a second time that day six months.

MR. ROBERT PHILLIMORE, in seconding the Amendment, observed, that the Attorney General had asked what could be worse than the present state of the Supreme Appellate Jurisdiction ; he (Mr. R. Phillimore) knew what would be worse—to render that state of things permanent, as they were invited to do by the measure now before them. He then objected to the passing of a measure so novel and so important at so late a period of the Session. It was in the second week of July that the House of Lords thought fit to invoke the aid of the House of Commons for the maintenance of what the House of Lords had hitherto considered their most dearly cherished prerogative, and which they had guarded with religious scrupulosity from the profane hands of the House of Commons. How had this strange event come to pass ? Who had assailed their privilege ? It was not the democracy, or the overweening ambition of the House of Commons, that had driven the House of Lords to take this extraordinary step. The enemy was not without, but within, the walls. The conduct of the House of Lords had forced the House of Commons to examine the whole question—one which most deeply concerned the welfare of the whole country—Ought the House of Lords to retain the supreme appellate jurisdiction over the property, and, in some measure, over the liberties of the subjects of Her Majesty ? The state of the appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords had been painted in such colours by the Attorney General as to require no additional touches from those who spoke after him ; and yet it was proposed, by means of this ill-considered Bill, to render permanent, through this House, and the money of the people voted by this House, the state of things so described. The Bill had two objects of paramount importance. In the first place, it provided for the enactment of life peerages, and those of a peculiar character, being limited to the profession of the law, and founded on arguments which could not recommend themselves to those who maturely and deliberately considered the subject. The House of Commons ought not to conceal from itself that the effect of this measure, as respected life peerages, was a practical limitation of the peerage, and on that account alone the House ought to look upon the Bill with great jealousy. It would be remembered that, in 1719, an attempt was made by the House of Lords to limit creations of the peerage within a certain number, and he need not remind hon. Members how resolutely that measure was opposed by Sir R. Walpole, and thrown out by the House of Commons. It was true the present Bill was not precisely the same as the Bill of 1719, but its practical effect was the same—it was a Bill for the limitation of the peerage—a Bill in derogation of the rights of the Crown, and of the Commons. It was his deliberate opinion that it was the fact of the House of Lords being accessible not only to birth and to wealth, but to the industry and ability of every man and every profession in the land, which had been the cause of its surviving, almost alone, similar institutions in other countries. He repeated that with regard to that part of the Bill which had reference to the appellate jurisdiction, the Lords had obliged them to examine into the foundations of the whole question, for the Bill contained a practical confession that the House of Lords was unable to discharge the great trust which the constitution had confided to it. Before, however, they proceeded to build the new edifice upon the plan now recommended to them, they were bound to look a little at the materials within their reach, and to pause before they sanctioned the patchwork which had originated in a strange compromise of political parties ; it was their duty to look closely and examine severely every provision of the measure. Was it founded upon sound and wise principles, or was it a wretched temporary expedient ? Now, what did he find on the threshold, so to speak, of this measure ? Why, the Bill before them left untouched the great practical defect, that of having two tribunals equally supreme, and of co-ordinate jurisdiction ; there were the House of Lords and the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, both exercising over different subjects supreme jurisdiction in the last resort. The latter was indeed the creature of little more than twenty years' existence. But it could not be denied that of those two supreme judicatures, one had gradually won while the other had gradually lost the confidence and esteem of the public. One question was, how had this happened? Another question for consideration was, could these two adjudicatures be amalgamated and made to work together, or must the House of Commons be obliged to vote £10,000 a year for two Deputy Speakers, in order that the House of Lords might continue to exercise its appellate jurisdiction, their present administration of which the Attorney General had so severely censured this night? Hon. Members were aware that the jurisdiction of the House of Lords with respect to common law was of immemorial antiquity. The case was not so with regard to the other portions of the judicature. It was only in 1675, after a long struggle, and under peculiar circumstances, that the House of Lords obtained its jurisdiction in matters of equity. At the same time it endeavoured to procure jurisdiction in appeals from the Ecclesiastical, Testamentary, and Admiralty Courts, but was foiled in the attempt. Its jurisdiction was at first surrounded by checks and limitations. There was the highest authority for saying that up to 1700 the jurisdiction of the House of Lords was exercised with the concurrence of the Judges as assistants, and at an earlier period with the concurrence of the Privy Council. It was true that the Judges did not vote in the House of Peers; but Lord Hale maintained that they had a right to do so, and Lord Somers regarded the Judges as ancillary to the jurisdiction of the House, the two subsisting together. The present Bill proceeded upon a totally different principle. It said in effect, though not in express terms, that lay Peers should not vote upon judicial questions, and, while abandoning altogether the principle of the hereditary jurisdiction of the House of Lords, it set up a different, an inferior, a bad court, under the name of the House of Lords. As late as 1786 the lay Peers voted upon a judicial question of the greatest importance—namely, the case of the "Bishop of London against Fitch," respecting the validity or non-validity of general resignation bonds. On that occasion nineteen voted on one side and eighteen on the other, Lord Thurlow carrying the question with the aid of the lay Peers against the authority of Lord Mansfield. Since that time the lay Peers, he believed, had not voted, and for 150 years the practice of the Judges attending as the regular assistants of the House of Lords had been discontinued, those learned persons being now called in by way of exception, and not as formerly, as a matter of general practice. An abortive attempt had been made to remedy that evil. Lawyers, according to the Attorney General, had ceased to make large fortunes; the House of Lords could no longer be recruited with hereditary Peers from the Bar. That was a point upon which different opinions might be entertained; but assuredly the example cited by the Attorney General did not bear out his statement. Was it meant to be said that Baron Wensleydale was so poor that he could not with propriety be made an hereditary Peer, and that the Government were driven by necessity to the experiment of a life peerage—the greatest experiment, he might add, tried upon the constitution for the last 300 years? It was well known that his noble Friend Baron Wensleydale was a rich man, that he had no son to inherit his dignity, and that there was no necessity in his case to resort to the experiment of a life peerage. Nor was the possibility of finding other competent and able lawyers sufficiently rich to endure the honours of the hereditary peerage so entirely impossible as the Attorney General seemed to suppose. But the attention of the House might now be usefully called to the practical working of the other supreme tribunal—namely, the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council—and to the consideration of the question how it had come to pass that this Court had engrossed to itself the confidence of the public. The Judicial Committee was in itself a creation of modern times; but the jurisdiction of the Privy Council, apart from the Judicial Committee, was of great antiquity. From the beginning of Henry V. to the end of James I., owing to the frequent intermission and non-holding of Parliament, and the consequently rare exercise of either civil or criminal jurisdiction by the Lords, it was found necessary to establish a judicature connected with the Privy Council, which was afterwards greatly strengthened, and which, notwithstanding the resumption of Parliaments, continued with great fidelity to exercise its functions up to the time of the constitution of the Judicial Committee. It took cognisance of all questions from abroad, of all appeals from the Ecclesiastical, Admiralty, and Testamentary Courts, and, what was still more singular, of petitions in matters of lunacy from the Court of Chancery. When Lord Brougham was Chancellor, among his other eminent services to the country, he established the present Judicial Committee, founding it so wisely, making its constitution so flexible, composing it of such distinguished Judges that it gradually attracted the attention of the public, and engrossed to itself the confidence which the other co-ordinate tribunal had lost. In 1834 a Bill was introduced into the House of Lords that never got beyond the first reading, in which Lord Brougham proposed to amend the appellate jurisdiction of the House by giving the House the power of referring certain cases to the Judicial Committee, that tribunal being empowered to send for the Lord Chief Justices and the other Judges and to improve its machinery generally, and required to make a report to the House of Lords on the questions submitted to its judgment. There were two advantages connected with that scheme—first, the advantage of having one supreme tribunal for all cases; secondly, the advantage of concentrating in it all the judicial learning and talent of the country. Contrast such a scheme as this with the present miserable proposal of two Deputy Speakers, with £5,000 a year each—the salary of a puisne Judge—to sit with the Lord Chancellor to overrule the decisions of the Exchequer Chamber—that was to say, of all the common law Judges—and to continue all the abuses which the Attorney General had so justly and so indignantly described in his opening speech. Surely the House of Commons ought not to be forced, at the weary end of the Session, into the passing of a measure which continued every abuse of the present system, and created new places and fresh patronage to no inconsiderable amount. The only argument which the Attorney General urged for passing the measure now was, that the suitors before the House of Lords would suffer by delay. He had great compassion for these unfortunate people, but he denied that it became the House of Commons to pass a bad measure respecting so important a subject as the court of last resort for all the property and, indirectly, the rights and liberties of Her Majesty's subjects, because certain unfortunate suitors

might suffer for a year or two longer. He was prepared to admit that it was very doubtful indeed what course ought to be adopted by Parliament. It was very desirable that a supreme Court of Appeal should exist, containing men of the highest talent and the most varied learning; and, as to the question of money, he was well convinced that the House would not grudge any sum in order to insure a court of last resort in which justice might be expeditiously done, and in a manner to command the confidence of the people of this country. But if it were doubtful what course that House ought to adopt with regard to the general question, it was by no means doubtful what course it ought to adopt with regard to the present Bill. There could be no doubt that the Bill did not remedy one-third of the evils at present complained of, and that it only skinned over the disease without curing it; and therefore, if the second reading were—which he trusted would not be the case—to pass, it would be most expedient to send the measure to a Select Committee, for the evidence before the Committee had by no means exhausted the subject. It was for the House of Commons to consider well the position in which it was now for the first time placed. The House of Peers had sent them down a Bill in order to supply a defect which they for the first time acknowledged to exist, and which Bill admitted that they could not without assistance discharge the trust confided to them by the constitution. How, then, would that House be able to answer to the country and to posterity, if, on this great occasion, when they had the opportunity of conferring a real benefit of inestimable value to the people—namely, the constitution of a good court of ultimate appeal over the most important interests of the subject—if, because there had been a compromise between certain parties in the House of Lords, or because some suitors might suffer from delay—they consented to permanently establish that which would be the greatest curse, a court of judicature in the last resort alienated from the sympathy, and which did not command the confidence of the country?

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months."

MR. WHITESIDE: Sir, the two hon. and learned Gentlemen who spoke last have contented themselves with urging all manner of objections to the Bill, from the first word in the preamble to the last in the clauses. Surely, if the subject is full of difficulty, a gentleman so eminent for his legal ability as the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. R. Phillimore) might have suggested some mode of removing those difficulties; and if it is the duty of the House of Commons to strike out some practical mode of redressing the grievances admitted, who more fit to do so than the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk? [Mr. BOWYER: I did so.] The hon. and learned Member amused, and perhaps instructed the House by a reference to the French laws, and the practice of the French courts; but with all respect to him, I should not wish to see either those laws or that practice introduced into this country. What the hon. and learned Gentleman did was to suggest a number of difficulties and objections to the Bill, but he sat down without having applied his abilities to solve in any way the difficulties which he raised. Now, I am not here to discuss the question of criminal law, or appeals from criminal law—I am not here to offer an opinion as to whether the Attorney General for Ireland ought to be empowered to grant a writ of error or not, but am occupied with an entirely different question—a question which is quite enough to engross the whole attention of this House, and one to which the hon. and learned Gentleman would have done well to have applied his mind. The hon. and learned Gentleman, among other things, spoke of the low scale of salaries to be given under this Bill; but that seemed to me no argument against the principle of the measure. If the hon. and learned Gentleman was seized with a fit of liberality, he might have proposed to increase those salaries in Committee; and perhaps he would have prevailed upon the Chancellor of the Exchequer to do so, if he could persuade him that by so doing he could procure a greater amount of ability in the persons to be appointed. But the salaries proposed in the House of Lords had been already reduced because it was thought they would not meet the views of some of the political economists in the House of Commons, so there was little chance of success in that direction. The hon. and learned Gentleman also spoke in high terms of the eligibility of the Judicial Committee of Privy Council as an appellate Court. I fully admit that that is an excellent Court, that it has discharged its duties faithfully, and is worthy of the confidence which the public place in it; while at the same time its members are cautious enough to suppress any difference of opinion which may arise between them, so that its decisions appear to have the stamp of unanimity, whilst that is not always the case. But I am surprised that a Gentleman possessing that profound knowledge of the constitution which the hon. and learned Gentleman possesses should have approved the suggestion that the Judicial Committee should be constituted the ultimate Court of Appeal in all cases. The hon. and learned Gentleman did not condescend to inform the House that the Judges of the Committee of Privy Council are entirely dependent upon the pleasure of the Sovereign; he did not tell us that every one of those Judges might be struck out of the list to-morrow. If such a Court as that is to be made an ultimate Court of Appeal, it would indeed be the most unconstitutional tribunal that could well be imagined. It does not follow that because a number of gentlemen, eminent indeed for their great abilities and extensive learning, are acquainted with Dutch law, with Spanish law, with Indian law—if there be any such—they should be the best tribunal to discuss and decide questions of criminal law—political cases—great cases of equity. The hon. and learned Gentleman assumed, but he did not prove, that the two Courts of the House of Lords and the Judicial Committee of Privy Council were co-ordinate tribunals. When was that fact discovered? It is true that they both take cognisance of cases in which personal property is the subject of dispute; but it is a strong assumption that, because they both decide a certain class of cases, their jurisdiction is co-ordinate. Nor is it the fact that there is any danger of the Committee of Privy Council conflicting in opinion with the House of Lords; for that very question was inquired into in the House of Lords, and I find it stated by a very eminent authority that when there was the least danger or the least chance of their coming into conflict in consequence of similar cases being before the House of Lords and the Judicial Committee of Privy Council, the latter Court stayed all proceedings until the House of Lords had pronounced an opinion on the case, and they then took the law as affirmed by that tribunal. It is therefore entirely an assumption that the Committee owe a great deal to the circumstance of some of its members being Judges of other Courts, because I have shown that they decide in conformity with the opinion of the House of Lords. I now come to the practical question—and I give the House of Commons credit for not indulging in abstractions, but at all times attempting to solve difficulties in a practical manner—what are we to do in the present instance? Now, I must say, it seems to me that there has been a want of generosity in the way in which my hon. and learned Friends have spoken of the House of Lords. They have represented the jurisdiction of that House as having failed for many years. What is the fact? All the seventeen witnesses examined before the Lords' Committee, and among them were the foremost men in this country, declared that never was there a tribunal which commanded more perfectly the respect of the Bar and the confidence of the country. It has given laws to half the civilised world. American lawyers and writers have passed the highest eulogiums upon it; and it was asserted by all the witnesses that at the time when Lord Cottenham, Lord Brougham, Lord Campbell, and Lord Lyndhurst sat together under the Chancellorship of the first named noble and learned Lord, no tribunal was ever more distinguished for dispatch of business, for ability, or for learning. They discharged their duty to the country with a grasp of intellect, a power of language, and a display of legal acumen, admirable to behold. Is it just, then, that because one of those learned men can no longer attend, and another is obliged to absent himself in consequence of illness, you are to say, "this tribunal is no longer what it was, it is unworthy therefore to exist." Every gentleman who was examined before the Committee has stated that until the last two or three years that tribunal was one of unequalled excellence. An inconvenience has arisen—and it has arisen from the conduct of the Government in attempting to confer a peerage in an irregular form upon an individual whose learning and ability must have been found of great advantage in the other House of Parliament. But however that may be, we have no power of dealing with it here—in this House we must deal with the matter as we find it. But with what justice can the hon. and learned Gentleman say that it is proposed to appoint two miserable persons to preside in a miserable court, and dispose of causes in a miserable manner, at a miserable rate of remuneration. If I held that opinion I certainly would vote, not for referring this measure to a Select Committee, but for relinquishing it altogether. But the fact is, that it is not proposed to do anything of the sort. The principal argument made use of by the hon. and learned Gentlemen who have opposed this measure is, that the cases will be decided by three persons. But what becomes of that argument when we find that, during the period of which all the witnesses spoke as being a period when the House of Lords was considered a tribunal of unexampled excellence, seldom more than three attended; and no one will deny that when Lord Campbell attended, before he was Chief Justice, Scotch appeals were admirably disposed of. Still but three persons attended. Well, an Act of Parliament passed to constitute the Judicial Committee of Privy Council—which tribunal, because it was new, was cried up against the House of Lords because it was old. What did that Act do? It made three Judges a quorum. If, then, the cases in the popular court of the Judicial Committee of Privy Council were decided by three Judges, and if the cases in the House of Lords, when that tribunal was one of acknowledged excellence, were decided by three Judges, where is the objection to the cases brought before the new court contemplated by this Bill being decided by three Judges? Some of the witnesses have pronounced an opinion in favour of five instead of three being the quorum. I have no objection to that. A great point in a Court of last appeal should be to have an unequal number, so that in case of difference of opinion there should be a casting vote; and if such a gentleman as Mr. Pemberton Leigh could be induced to enter the other House for that purpose, he would doubtless be a great addition to the learning and ability of that tribunal. But the number of Judges is a question of detail and not of principle, and this Bill, which is one of the strictest moderation, has only proposed two. To the principle of the Bill I see no objection. Indeed, I can speak from my own experience, with reference to cases which have come from Ireland, as to the feeling in that quarter in favour of the House of Lords being the Court of final appeal. Those cases have been political, equitable, and criminal—they have involved the highest interests and questions of the deepest importance; but the fruit of my experience is, that nothing should induce me to give up the right of appeal to that House. It would ill become me to speak of O'Connell's case, because in that I was counsel; but I appeal to the great case of the Presbyterian Marriages, which affected the interests or the feelings of thousands of persons, and I ask whether in that and similar cases the greatest confidence was not felt by the public in the House of Lords as a court of appellate jurisdiction? The House of Lords has always had a right to call in the assistance of the Judges of the land, and the Bill does not deprive them of that right. The assumption of the hon. and learned Member is, that the noble Lord at the head of the Government, instead of searching for men of the first ability and greatest eminence to place in the high offices created by this Bill, will look out for men of inferior ability, and be influenced by other considerations. I do not believe in that assumption. I would also mention that the Court of the Lords Justices really consists of three, because, although only two Justices are appointed, in case of difference of opinion the Lord Chancellor is called in and assists them. Now on this point I will just refer to the evidence given by the hon. and learned Member for Wallingford (Mr. Malins) before the Lords' Committee. He says:—

"An appeal to the Lord Chancellor sitting alone is not satisfactory; an appeal to the Lords Justices is not quite satisfactory. It is not because I think the decision is not correct, but because I study the way in which the public look at the matter. I think there ought to be four or five Judges; five would be a convenient number, but four would do."

And in another place my hon. and learned Friend stated his opinion that three would be satisfactory. The hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for Dundalk (Mr. Bowyer) expressed an opinion that there ought to be, at least, one Scotch Judge among the number. I do not object to that; but I confess I was surprised at the candour of the Scotch witnesses, who, instead of asserting their right to have a Scotchman in the House of Lords as one of the Judges of Appeals, expressed an opinion that the decisions on Scotch questions were very much better without them; and gentlemen of such eminence as Mr. Hope and Mr. Bellenden Ker expressed an opinion in favour of leaving the appellate jurisdiction with the House of Lords. The Writers to the Signet state—

"That this society fully recognises the great benefits which have resulted to the law of Scotland from the exercise of the appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords; and would deprecate any alteration by which its judicial functions would be vested in any other body. That, in the determination of appeals from the Scotch Courts, it is of great importance to maintain the benefit derived from the application of the English judicial mind, and also to obtain the assistance of an eminent lawyer, thoroughly acquainted with the whole range of Scotch law and practice."

They therefore suggested the propriety of having a Scotch Judge in the Court of Appeal, and I should be sorry to say anything in favour of the exclusion of learned individuals of the Scotch nation from this Court of Appeal; but, at all events, the practical grievance resulting from the absence of a Scotch Judge is very little, according to the testimony of the witnesses. What do those who object to the present measure rely on? The hon. and learned Member for Plymouth, and almost all the able and learned men examined before the Committee, expressed their anxiety that the appellate jurisdiction should be retained by the House of Lords. I also am anxious to retain it in the House of Lords for the very best possible reason, because it possesses it, and that is a good Conservative argument. The House of Lords has had an appellate jurisdiction for a long period of time, and if there are any defects it is our duty to improve but not to destroy it. If, at any time, in consequence of infirmity or length of years, three Judges are not able to attend in the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, it is our duty to replace them, and such is the principle upon which this Bill is framed. The hon. and learned Member says that his objection to the House of Lords being a permanent tribunal of appeal in the last resort is, because it depends entirely on the volition of individual Lords whether they will attend or not. That is to be cured by the appointment of two learned persons as assistants to the Lord Chancellor, to attend constantly to hear and determine cases. But, it is alleged, that in public opinion, such a tribunal will not carry the weight and authority of the House of Lords. I believe it will, for I believe that the Members composing the House of Peers will always have such an influence over the Judges constituting that Court as to impart to their decisions the dignity of the whole House, while they will always be able to check any approach to irregularity. It is of the greatest consequence that the appellate jurisdiction of the House should be vested in, and discharged by, the whole body, which it will be in the persons of these Judges. Surely the hon. and learned Gentleman does not expect to get more perfect, more brilliant, more luminous judgments than had been delivered in that House during the last half century, when Lord Redesdale and Lord Eldon sat there? Is the House of opinion it will get better men? I think not. Nor will they be miserable Judges because they are moderately remunerated for devoting their talents to the country. So far from objecting to the Bill, I think that the hon. and learned Gentleman should vote for its second reading, and show us in Committee how it can be improved. It is said that life peerages would be created. That is true; but you hear the opinion of eminent authorities, that if limited in number the adoption of that principle may be beneficial; there is no likelihood that the House of Lords will be deluged with life peerages. You must give way to the exigencies of the time. You have reformed the Court of Chancery—you have created the Judicial Committee of Privy Council—you have established the Court of the Lords Justices; and I think there is no ground either for surprise or alarm in this proposition. By adopting it you will get eminent men, who will not only increase the judicial strength of the House of Lords, but who will suggest good laws, and more, correct those laws sent up to them by this House. Considering that almost all the amendments of the law which we have had of late years originated in the House of Lords, I am the more confirmed in my opinion that I am right in giving support to this measure.

SIR JAMES GRAHAM: Sir, I always listen with the greatest respect to gentlemen of the long robe, but, as the House has been addressed by four learned Gentlemen in succession, I hope, conscious as I am of my own incompetency, that they will allow one not learned in the law to address them upon a question of the greatest gravity, and, I must add, of the greatest constitutional importance, which has been discussed in this House for a long time. The hon. and learned Gentleman who has just sat down has passed a glowing eulogium upon the House of Lords, which, I presume, he meant to apply to it in its judicial capacity as a Court of ultimate appeal. He has referred to great names, to Eldon and to Lyndhurst, not going further back, however, as he might have done, to times when there were giants in the law. I shall not differ from him with respect to earlier times; but I ask him, if, indeed, the House of Lords be so strong in its legal powers and in its efficiency to deal with great questions in the last resort which are brought before it, whence arises this Bill sent down to us from the other House? Is the House of Lords, I would ask, of the same opinion as the hon. and learned Gentleman that, as at present constituted, it is a tribunal which is satisfactory or such as to inspire the public with confidence? The Attorney General, who proposed the second reading of this Bill, if I mistake not, told us that the defects of that tribunal were glaring, and that it was on account of those defects that the Government proposed this Bill. I am bound to add that there were several observations made by the Attorney General which filled me with amazement and fear. The hon. and learned Gentleman told us that the defects of this tribunal were glaring; that a better course might possibly be adopted than that proposed by this Bill; and he added, as a reason for passing this Bill, that the House of Lords would not surrender its appellate jurisdiction. I said some of the hon. and learned Gentleman's observations filled me with fear and amazement. Have we arrived at that point that we, the Commons of England, if we shall be satisfied with the judgment of the House of Lords itself as to the inefficient mode in which it now exercises its judicial functions, are to be told, when called upon to supply a remedy, that, though a co-ordinate branch of the Legislature, we are not to exercise our own right of decision with respect to the remedy, and that we are to be coerced by the assertion of Her Majesty's Attorney General that the House of Lords will not surrender its appellate jurisdiction, and consent that a new tribunal shall be erected which, it was admitted, is not one that will fulfil all the requirements of such a Court? Have we arrived at such a pitch of degradation? What is the meaning of that assertion of the Attorney General that this is not the best measure which can be proposed? A noble Friend of mine (the late Lord Melbourne) said he could well understand not proposing any change in cases of doubt, and he could well understand also changes being proposed greater than he might think safe, and greater than he might be ready to assent to ; but he was always filled with apprehension when it was said that "something" must be done—an indefinite change must be made, not supported by reason, but pressed on as being cogent from necessity, without any distinct idea of what the change should be. Yet I heard from the Attorney General this evening that the defects in the appellate tribunal are glaring ; that the best remedy was not the remedy proposed by this Bill ; that the House of Lords would not surrender its appellate jurisdiction—and yet that something must be done. The hon. and learned Gentleman opposite says that it is our duty if we reject this Bill, to propose a better one. It may be possible for us to do so ; but before we do so, as the House of Lords has inquired, is it very unreasonable that the House of Commons should ask for a little time to inquire likewise ? I turn now, however, Sir, from that which has been said by those who have preceded me to the view which I myself am disposed to take upon the subject. The Bill presents itself to us under a double aspect. It seeks to dispose of a controversy as to peerages for life, and it seeks also to remedy the deficiencies in the appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords. With regard to the first, a compromise was a matter of necessity. Her Majesty's Government found themselves unexpectedly involved in a difficulty with respect to the creation of peers for life, from which they sought to retreat, and their opponents in the House of Lords, having the command of a majority, found themselves also in a great difficulty, inasmuch as, having given a vote against peerages for life, they were involved in and embarrassed by a struggle with the Crown on a question of prerogative. A compromise, under such circumstances, between the two contending parties was natural and inevitable. The compromise in this case has been admitted by the noble Lord at the head of the Government. It is the nature of this compromise to release the Government from their difficulty as to the peerages for life, and to release the Opposition from their difficulty in respect of their struggle with the Crown. But is there nothing extraordinary in this state of affairs ? The unanimity with which this Bill has been sent down to us, in my opinion, ought to excite the jealousy of the House of Commons. In these matters the graves principum amicitiae are more formidable than the array of hostile parties, and I think the House of Commons ought to view with jealousy a compromise based on the mutual convenience of contending parties. There is nothing new in this. My hon. and learned Friend who seconded the Amendment referred to the last occasion on which the question of peerages was discussed in this House. It was in the year 1719. Then, also, a Bill came down to this House which had received very general support in the House of Lords. It was moved by the Government, and it was supported by their opponents. It was met in the House of Commons by Sir Robert Walpole, who found himself on this question united with his oldest opponents, and opposed to his warmest partisans, with signal success, both in this House and out of it. He published a memorable pamphlet upon that occasion, in which there is a passage which I will read to the House, as it is an admirable illustration of the present state of affairs with respect to this Bill. He says—

"Amid all the numerous objections to this worthy scheme, I am free to own that there is one thing in it which deserves commendation, for it has produced a never-before-known unanimity among our great men. It has yoked the lion with the lamb."—[I don't know whether we may not say the same of this Bill after the speeches of the hon. and learned Member for Enniskillen and the hon. and learned Attorney General—which is the lion and which is the lamb it may be difficult to say]—"the Whigs with the Tories, men in power with those they have turned out of it." [The hon. Member for Enniskillen sees some analogy already, I imagine.] "Ministers of State are become patriots, and join with their professed enemies in lessening that prerogative they have so often occasion for."

I am almost ashamed to quote a passage from another pamphlet, because it is not a pamphlet of Walpole, but of Sir Richard Steele, who took part in that great struggle, and who wrote a pamphlet called The Plebeian. He mentions a suspicion that certain great influences were afloat to carry the Bill, which had come down as a compromise from the other House, and he describes some nameless Member under the designation of Esau, whom he denounces as—

"The greatest traitor to civil society that ever yet appeared, who shall contend for such a Bill in the Commons with the assurance in his pocket of being a Peer as soon as the Bill passes."

I know not whether that passage is at all applicable to the present case, but there are suspicions which will, of course, be afloat on all such occasions, and it is certainly suspicious to see such unnatural unanimity. I only put it as an instance of there being nothing new under the sun. Even if it were admitted that it was not a compromise, every line of the Bill which we are now discussing is marked by feebleness, obscurity, and that impotent indecision which is inherent in middle measures. The principle upon which the Bill is framed is clear. If the House will permit me to read it, I have a passage here from the speech of Lord Derby, which in the plainest and most explicit manner gives you a clue to the labyrinth, and shows you the precise basis on which the Bill rests. The noble Lord said—

“Can we frame the Bill in such a manner as not to call upon the Ministry to pronounce a condemnation of the policy they have upheld; and, on the other hand, not commit the body of the Peers to a proceeding inconsistent with the stand made by them in defence of the hereditary character of the peerage?”

That is a most frank and open avowal of the principle on which this measure is framed, and it leaves no doubt, not only as to the existence, but as to the object of this compromise, and as to the mode in which it is worked out in this Bill. Either the prerogative of the Crown is compromised by the limitation which this Bill contains, and by the appeal to legislative sanction for the issuing of a writ of summons to a Peer for life to sit in the House of Lords; or, if there be no such limitation, the precedent of peerages not of inheritance is established by the Bill now before the House. What is most remarkable is that such is the ambiguity and obscurity of this Bill, such is the care with which it has been framed with words in collocation bearing a double meaning, that we have reason to know that on the third reading it was viewed in an opposite sense by each of the two sets of authors from whom it emanated. The Lord Chancellor and the Lord President of the Council declared that they would never have given their consent to the Bill if it had limited the prerogative with respect to the creation of Peers for life; while the Lord Chief Justice of England and Lord St. Leonards declared that they would not have consented to it if it had contained a recognition of the prerogative of the Crown to create such peerages. Of two things one—either the majority of the House of Lords is deceived with respect to this measure, or Her Majesty's servants who have advised it have unintentionally betrayed the prerogative, of which they are the guardians. It is a dilemma from which there is no escape. For us there is an escape, and that is by the rejection of the Bill, and by giving time for the framing of a measure on this important subject which shall not be ambiguous, but of which the meaning shall, on the contrary, be clear and patent. I have said that the measure is studiously obscure. Let any hon. Member turn to the fourth clause, which I have myself repeatedly read. The uninitiated would certainly say that it conceded to the Crown the absolute power of creating four peerages for life. It commences by giving the Crown power to grant peerages for life to two Deputy Speakers, and by providing that a writ of summons shall, with the consent of Parliament, be issued to them; but the words at the end of the clause go much further. They provide that there shall not be more than four persons holding peerages for life at the same time. The plain meaning of that would be that it would be quite open to the Crown to make two Deputy Speakers and to fill up two other peerages, the holders of which should be chosen, not from the legal profession, but from any other class from which the Sovereign should be advised to make the selection. But I believe that the right construction is, that it is in the first instance strictly limited to two Deputy Speakers, and the provision for the existence of four life Peers is made that these Deputy Speakers may retire and fresh ones may be appointed with the same rank, the gross number of Peers for life at no time exceeding four. But, then, what is the position of Lord Wensleydale? Unless he shall be selected by the Crown to fill one of the Deputy Speakerships, he being and remaining a Peer for life, his position will be most ambiguous and most anomalous. The petition which he has presented to the House this evening cannot fail to receive our attentive consideration. He understands the precise bearing of this clause, for the ambiguity of which he is not responsible, and he says that it will seriously damage his case in regard to that legal claim which he seeks to urge to its greatest possible extent. I think that, out of deference to that noble Lord, who has every claim upon our consideration, we ought not to decide without referring the question to a Committee, or else summarily rejecting a Bill which prejudices his claim. It is a strange inconsistency that the champions of the peerage by inheritance only are now, as it were, the authors of this proposal of peerages for life. If the prerogative be limited, it is contrary to the sense of duty of the Queen's advisers, as is avowed by Her Majesty's Government, that henceforth no Peer for life, not a Deputy Speaker, can be created without the consent of Parliament. If it be unlimited, then it is open to abuse for party purposes, and dangerous to the independence of the House of Lords. This Bill has one remarkable characteristic. In this assembly there are, I dare say, very conflicting opinions with respect to the general policy of the creation of peerages for life; now, this Bill is so framed that there ought to be a general concurrence of those who favour and those who are opposed to the creation of such peerages to reject it, because it leaves in uncertainty that great branch of the prerogative. I, for one, entertain the gravest doubts with respect to the policy of the creation of peerages for life. I look at the colonial senates, and see there the nominees of the Crown holding their appointments in the Upper Chamber, which are quasi peerages, for life. Nothing could have been more injurious to the colonies generally than this system of nominees. Speaking broadly, I should say that an hereditary peerage—an independent peerage—and I would use these terms as almost synonymous—an hereditary and independent peerage is the characteristic of the mixed kingly form of government. And there is no alternative. If you have not an independent hereditary peerage, you must come to elective members of the Second Chamber, which is the mark and designation of the republican form of government. Now, what is the evil alleged? The alleged evil which this Bill seeks to counteract is, that there is in the House of Lords too much of a law origin; and that the sons of great lawyers inheriting peerages are without adequate means of sustaining their dignity. The cure suggested by this Bill is the most extraordinary one that I ever saw. Instead of running the risk of a comparative want of means on the part of the sons of law Peers created with inheritance, it seeks to introduce the Peers themselves into the House for life, before they shall in their noble profession have earned means sufficient to sustain the independence and the dignity of their station. Poverty is for the first time avowedly to be one of the ingredients in the qualifications for life peerages. What will be the effect? Poverty is to be one of the ingredients, and it will be a brand of dependence and a mark of inferiority. It will engender in the mind of a Peer for life, who feels himself, as it were, degraded, the constant hope of working out his own independence and obtaining from the Minister of the day the more honourable station of an hereditary Peer. It will have another effect. What is the title of Peers? The very title of Peers, "Pares," implies equality. But here will be a degraded class, unequal in its position, looked down upon by the hereditary Peers on that very ground, on account of their poverty, as well as of their inequality. What has the law done to deserve this indignity? I cannot conceive any position to be worse than one in which favour is to follow fawning, and where they are to hang upon the skirts of a Minister to obtain a more independent station, and to become really equal, pares, with that body into which they have been so unworthily introduced. If this Bill should pass, no Chancellor will ever obtain an hereditary peerage—he will never reach the position which was filled by Clarendon, by Hardwicke, by Camden, by Eldon, and by others whose names it is needless to particularise, but whose descendants are among the most revered and most respected members of the House of Peers, because they owe their origin to men who in their day rose to pre-eminent station by pre-eminent talent. The only chance that a Lord Chancellor will have of obtaining an hereditary peerage will be, not that he is pre-eminent in his profession, but that he is rich and childless. Lord Somers has been mentioned. Lord Somers was a poor man when he had become a most eminent one, and such was his noble spirit that he was content to sit as Chancellor in the House of Lords virtually deciding causes by his learning and his influence, yet really without a vote, because in his early days he had not acquired that independent fortune which he thought necessary to entitle him to take an hereditary peerage. Did he ever dream of a peerage for life? He never thought of such a thing. He never dreamed of it. Together with his pre-eminence he earned an independent fortune; he was raised to the peerage, and his heir still adorns that noble assembly. The Attorney General said—

"This is an efficient remedy to cure the evil; it is not the best measure that we could hope to carry if the House of Lords would yield to reason; but that House will not part with its jurisdiction;

you must take this, and, upon the whole, it is a very good thing."

By this Bill you limit the number of peerages for life to four. From the nature of the choice the Deputy Speakers must be aged men who have long occupied a prominent station. Age and infirmity will tell upon them, and it is possible that from age and infirmity they may cease to be able to perform their judicial functions; yet they will remain peers for life, though no longer Deputy Speakers, and, unless you legislate again, you will be reduced to the precise position in which you stand at this moment. Your remedy fails; your measure is useless. I feel satisfied that you cannot stop here—that you will find it indispensably necessary, if this precedent is established, to go on and extend the creation of peerages for life not only to the law, but to the army, the navy, and to politicians. I am sorry to say that poverty is not confined to the law; on the contrary, I believe the law to be a much more lucrative profession than that of arms. Your admirals, your generals, usually do not make £10,000, £15,000, or £20,000 a year; and I must be permitted to say I very much doubt whether the leaders of the bar at this moment are not in receipt of a larger income than their predecessors enjoyed at any period of the history of the profession. Their talent is pre-eminently great. I need only look on both sides of this House to be justified in saying that the Bar was never more distinguished. I doubt whether at any period were the receipts of the Bar greater than they are now. If, then, they are prudent and able, like their great exemplars in an earlier history of our free constitution, in a profession which is the safeguard of that free constitution—if employing their talents fully they have that self-command, that thrift combined with industry which leads to the accumulation of ample means, then, I say, they have no need of this paltry measure, limiting the enjoyment of the great reward of their exertions and their great fame to the short and narrow limits of their own lives. But if this Bill be necessary for the profession of the law, then, a fortiori, it is applicable to other professions, and you are establishing a precedent that will not stop where you profess to limit it. Then, I say, you touch the mainspring, the noble mainspring of human action. All our highest aspirations in everything that is really worthy of genius are connected with a longing for immortality, and a desire to immortalise and perpetuate our name. Let me say in passing—

"— ipsos quamvis angusti terminus ævi

Excipiat

At genus immortale manet, multosque per annos
Stat fortuna domus, et avi numerantur avorum."

That is the motive which actuates the noblest spirits, and animates their hopes and their exertions. Then take the case of politicians: I say a life peerage in the House of Lords may be regarded as a shadow from the heat, as a refuge from the storm; but it is a miserable thing for a man who has occupied a prominent position in the House of Commons, as history has taught us by examples. Look at the very period to which I have referred, to the case of Mr. Walpole and Mr. Pulteney. At that time Mr. Pulteney had an opportunity, having overthrown Sir Robert Walpole, to form an Administration, but he shrunk from the responsibility and would not accept the highest office, but asked for an earldom. Walpole, whom he had humbled, had great influence with the Crown—the King was unwilling to grant the earldom; but Walpole out of office had sufficient influence to obtain the grant for his opponent from his reluctant Sovereign, and, having succeeded, Horace Walpole records that when he went home he used this expression—suing the action to the words—"I have turned the key of the closet upon that Gentleman." Lord Chesterfield, commenting upon the transaction, says of Pulteney, that "he sank into the insignificance of an earldom." And Walpole himself having, after twenty years of triumphant power, been raised to the peerage by the title of Earl of Orford, we are told that when he entered the House of Peers he went up to the Earl of Bath, his old rival, and taking him by the hand said, "now here we are, the two most insignificant fellows in all England." Yet those were hereditary peerages. Consider, then, what will be the effects of this retreat into the House of Lords for decrepit politicians, by means of peerages for life. How miserable and degraded will be their position! And I tell the House that if it passes this Bill, many years will not elapse before the precedent will extend from lawyers to admirals, to generals, to politicians; and the most serious consequences of all will be, that we shall find our veteran statesmen standing in the marketplace, like the labourers in the parable, crying at the eleventh hour of the day—

"No man will hire us!" Political degeneration and turpitude will be extreme. I therefore entreat the House to pause before it passes this Bill. There is one reflection which I wish to make in passing: hereditary peerages, from the abstinence of the Crown in respect to new creations, are rapidly diminishing, and if you come to granting peerages for life the independence of the House of Lords will be incurably swamped. I have here an account of the state of the peerage at the beginning of Sir Robert Peel's Administration in 1841. Since then, I find that twenty-nine peerages have become extinct, and up to January of the present year only fourteen new creations had been made. Since January, I believe, there have been two new peerages created, making sixteen in all; but still leaving a diminution of thirteen since 1841. The independence of the body, unless you tamper in this way with it, is sustained both by the course of nature and the constitutional forbearance of the Ministers of the Crown from unduly augmenting the number of hereditary Peers; but if you break ground in that direction, I am satisfied that for a very paltry object—paltry in respect to the object you have in view—you will inflict a great blow, and run the greatest risk of seriously impairing the value of a co-ordinate branch of the Legislature. Turning, however, from this point to that which is of the greatest importance—the court of appeal and the jurisdiction of the House of Lords—I find that there is a fiction and a reality. The fiction is as to the jurisdiction being in the House of Lords. The reality is, that that jurisdiction is in the Lord Chancellor, chosen with the fluctuations of party, partly on account of his abilities, but still more on account of his activity as a partisan, and in three or four other ex-Chancellors, who have been chosen in the same way in their own day. What is the description given of that House by the Queen's Attorney General? He said—I do not know that he used the expression "dummies," but he said they were ciphers, or mutes and ciphers. Now, the fiction is that these mutes and ciphers exercise the jurisdiction, while, in fact, I believe the tribunal, which at last to its honour has avowed its incompetency, consists at the present time of the Lord Chancellor sitting alone. I admit there have been times when, as I have said, "there were giants," the Lord Chancellor sitting alone was the best possible tribunal; but we have passed from the days of giants to those of pigmies. I cannot think that one Judge, unaided, yet reversing the decisions of the highest tribunals throughout the United Kingdom, can be regarded as adequate to the performance of his high duties. There were such things at the common law bar as sham pleas, but those fictions have now been discarded as worse than useless. Shall a delusion be maintained in the highest tribunal itself, when all such worthless fictions are abolished in the lowest Courts? What were the objections admitted in the Lords' Report? The principal objections were two—first, that the tribunal was uncertain, sometimes the Lord Chancellor sitting alone, sometimes sitting with one, two, or three ex-Chancellors; but the client never knew until the morning his case was opened what was the tribunal he was to appear before and who was to constitute it; and, secondly, that the Scotch appeals were not satisfactorily heard. Now, what are the remedies which are proposed to meet these evils? Two Deputy Speakers are to be appointed, but still the objection remains to the uncertainty of the tribunal. This Bill contains no ouster of the jurisdiction of the ex-Chancellors. There are three or four of them floating about in the House of Lords, sometimes present, sometimes absent; but, if they should all think fit to attend, I believe there are three ex-Chancellors and the Lord Chief Justice who can do so. I remember, too, the time when my noble Friend Lord Devon was held to be a law Lord, and I believe the great case of "Small and Atwood" was decided during his attendance. Then, there is an Emeritus Master in Chancery in that House, and he, too, may be regarded as a law Lord. There is no ouster against them, and they may safely claim the privilege of voting as law Lords, and the vote of each will be equal with that of one of the two Deputy Speakers, whom you are now invited to appoint at salaries of £5,000 or £6,000 a year each. A sham, whatever care may be taken to conceal it, is always transparent at last; and the fiction which confides the appellate jurisdiction to the House is so flagrant that it escapes through all disguise, even in this very measure. The Bill admits it to be indispensable that this tribunal, reconstituted as proposed, should sit during prorogations. What is the meaning of such a provision? It means that the House of Lords will delegate certain powers from themselves as an integral part of the Legislature to three Peers, or to three Peers and the law Lords when Parliament is not sitting. And it appears that four Ministers of the Crown voted in the Committee that these powers should be delegated during dissolutions as well as during prorogations—a proposition which was only defeated by the independent voices of Members of the House of Lords not connected with the Government. Again, it turns out that pay has become necessary to ensure the discharge of these judicial duties. Now, while the House of Lords maintained their dignity by exercising their judicial powers without receiving salaries, I could understand that the continuance of this jurisdiction might strengthen the position of the learned body to whom they intend to entrust it; but when you tell me that they are to be hired journeymen, paid for their work by the House of Commons, I cannot say that there is either dignity or honour in such a position, and the strength of the position of the House itself will not be the same as it was when they performed their old hereditary office in the old hereditary way, to the satisfaction of the people, without fear, without favour, and without pay. In the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council—which you all agree in commending—you have unpaid Judges, performing with dignity the duties confided to them, to the entire satisfaction both of the profession and of the country. I will now make a few comments upon the second clause. Observe that by the limitation in that clause the Crown is confined in its selection of these new Judges within a very narrow space. The qualification is having held certain judicial offices for a specified time. In 1840, when the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council was appointed, and when, if ever a measure of this kind ought to have been proposed, the right moment for its introduction had arrived, this limitation would have excluded Lord Campbell, Lord St. Leonards, Dr. Lushington, and Lord Rutherford; even at the present moment it will exclude one, I believe, of the Vice Chancellors, Sir W. P. Wood; Mr. Pemberton Leigh, on whom such deserved encomiums have been bestowed; the present law officers of the Crown, and the law officers of Lord Derby's Government—men equal in character, in learning, in independence, and in ability to any gentlemen who ever adorned the legal profession. And this is the Bill which we are asked to pass without inquiry, because the House of Lords will accept nothing else; because they will take no other means of satisfying the expectations of the people; because, if it is not passed, they will allow things to remain as they are! Again, by the common consent of all the witnesses of authority examined by the Committee, three is an inadequate number of Judges for the new tribunal; yet three is the number named in this Bill! I will not trouble you with the evidence upon this point; it is sufficient to observe that the Solicitor-General, Sir Fitzroy Kelly, Mr. Roundell Palmer, the Dean of the Faculty, Mr. Napier, and the Lord Justice General of Scotland concur in the opinion that five is the smallest number of which the Court of Appeal ought to be composed. Then, if you wish to make these Judges in the last resort, small in number but pre-eminent in power, adequate to the discharge of their duties, you ought to hold out some inducement in the shape of salary larger than that of the puisne Judges; yet the salary it is proposed to give them is £5,000, exactly that of a puisne Judge. I am now about to touch upon a point which, considering the number of gentlemen of the legal profession who are present, will, I am afraid, be unpleasant to the House; but my love of truth compels me not to pass it over. This Bill, if it passes, will, in my humble judgment, debauch both the Bench and the Bar. Puisne Judges are now very rarely indeed promoted to be the chiefs of their Courts. There is an old saying, that the Common Pleas is the pillow on which the Attorney-General reposes; it is his natural promotion, and no doubt, generally speaking, it is better that the chief of the Common Law Courts should be selected from the Bar than from the Bench. What will be the effect of this Bill? Why, the Crown will have the power of looking along the row of puisne Judges, and holding out to them the appointment of Deputy Speaker, a peerage for life, probably the expectation of an hereditary peerage in reversion; the tenure upon which they hold office, quamdiu bene se gesserint, will be very well understood, and if a Deputy Speaker is complaisant, a good voter in the House of Lords, always with the majority, and in favour of the Minister of the day, he may hope to obtain an hereditary peerage. The Government will then give the vacant place to some elderly gentleman of the bench, who will not occupy it very long, but will make room for an eligible successor, also taken from the bench. I repeat that the effect of placing such patronage in the hands of the Executive Government will be to debauch the bench of Judges. What will be the effect upon the Bar? It will not be so direct, but it will not be less palpable. The vacant places on the bench will be filled by leaders, the business of those leaders will either be engrossed by a few persons, or divided among the Bar, whose interest it will therefore be that the leaders should be promoted. The measure will thus, I think, operate unduly and unfairly, both on the dignity and honour of the Bench and on the independence of the Bar. I have made this observation, I hope, without giving offence. No man living honours more than I do the independence, the learning, the character of the Bar; they have heretofore been, as they are at present, the champions of liberty, and I regard with pride and gratification their honourable and fair promotion in the career of just competition; but when attempts are made to throw temptations in their way inconsistent with their honour, I think these attempts ought to be resisted by the House. Now, let us see what is the business which will be transacted by the new tribunal to be constituted at this great cost. We have before us a return moved for by the hon. and learned Member for Devonport (Sir Erskine Perry), from which it appears that the causes taken before the Court of ultimate appeal in the course of a year do not average more than seventy, and do not occupy more than four months of the year in their consideration and decision. Now, I think it would be wise, before you constitute a new tribunal as a Court of ultimate resort, to consider whether additional business ought not to be transferred to it. A grave question arises with regard to the Lords Justices, a still graver question with regard to the Committee of Privy Council. I doubt whether the arrangement of a concurrent appeal or a double appeal, if your tribunal in the last resort is really satisfactory, ought to be maintained. These are grave considerations, not to be decided in the middle of July, and by a declaration of the House of Lords that they will take this measure or nothing. If there is the least spirit in the House of Commons, they will reject the proposition and take their own time and their opportunity to consider the important questions it involves. In the next place, has the appellate business for a considerable time been satisfactorily transacted by the House of Lords as at present constituted? Upon this point we have the authority of Lord Brougham, of Lord Cottenham, of Lord St. Leonards, of Lord Campbell, and of Lord Langdale, who at different periods have all recorded their strong and deliberate opinions against the jurisdiction of the House as now exercised. Most of these learned Lords, too, have proposed remedies for the evils they have pointed out, any one of which is, in my humble judgment, preferable to the measure we are now discussing. Observe, this was at first a usurped jurisdiction on the part of the House of Lords, and it was so characterised by Lord Hale and by Lord Nottingham. And let me also say, in passing, that it was not by the House of Lords that it was originally exercised, but by the King in the Great Council of State, His Majesty, by writ, summoning his Privy Councillors to attend him, and then, under their advice, deciding the causes in the presence of the Lords, but not through the Lords. I should be wandering far beyond my proper sphere if in any detail I sketched what should be done; but of this I feel certain, that, of two things, one must be done—either the House of Lords, without legislation, and proprio vigore, must endeavour to amend their jurisdiction; or, failing that, let them frankly, openly, nobly, and with a single eye to the public good, entirely abandon a duty which they cannot satisfactorily discharge. This is no suggestion of mine; it has been made by some of the high authorities whom I have enumerated. It is quite competent for the other House, without our intervention, to amend their jurisdiction. I believe they have the power of summoning to their aid, not only the common law Judges, but the equity Judges and the members of the Judicial Committee of Privy Council. Why, at the commencement of each session, should not all the causes entered for hearing be classified by the Lord Chancellor, the common law appeals be sent to a committee of common law Judges and certain Privy Councillors, the equity causes to the equity Judges and also certain Privy Councillors, the Scotch appeals distributed to certain Judges and the Lord Justice General and the Lord Justice Clerk, both of whom are now Privy Councillors? and even two more of the Scotch Judges might with great propriety be made Privy Councillors. The delegation must be outside the House of Lords —in the Painted Chamber, for instance—the Lord Chancellor always presiding, and a certain number of Judges hearing the causes and having voices. Lord St. Leonards says that nothing can be more derogatory to the science of the law than debates upon the law itself, in public, between the Judges. What takes place in the Painted Chamber in regard to the report need not be known except from the report itself and the conclusion come to; it should be reported to the House from the wool-sack as the judgment of the Court of Appeal, and when adopted by the House it would stand the final judgment of the House of Peers. Some such measure as I have thus faintly shadowed out is within the competence of the House of Lords without new legislation. If that is not sufficient, I know of no remedy within themselves likely to lead to a more satisfactory solution, and nothing therefore will remain for them but, as I have said, to surrender their jurisdiction. Of this, however, I am sure, this matter cannot continue to go on as it does now—the public, the profession will not allow it. The House of Lords is an assembly of politicians, and your Lord Chancellor and ex-Chancellors come together every evening to debate, and that, too, sometimes with great bitterness; your keen law Lords are often as keen politicians; and it would be really curious to see how they meet each other, after an angry debate in the House of Lords, to agree the following morning on their legal judgments. We know how they agree—they have come together to debate their judicial decisions in the presence of the public. Even Lord St. Leonards—who in his most able work on real property gives it as his opinion that to the science of the law nothing is so injurious as open debates among Judges on the law—was the first to break through his own rule in a learned argument which he himself conducted in the House of Lords with singular ability and remarkable astuteness. I cannot consistently with my duty forbear to mention certain prominent cases, although some of them have already been alluded to, wherein the action of political influences was quite apparent. There was the celebrated O'Connell case, to which the hon. and learned Member for Enniskillen referred, having himself been counsel in it for Mr. O'Connell. The opinion of nine of the common law Judges was taken on that case. Seven were in favour of a conviction, two were against it. The question came to be decided by the law Lords alone. I do not see the hon. and learned Member for Suffolk (Sir F. Kelly) in his place, but he was also counsel for Mr. O'Connell. I will not trouble the House by reading the evidence he gave before the Committee of the House of Lords. He gave it as his deliberate and confident opinion that, if that case had been the case of any ordinary individual—an operative mechanic, for example—judgment would have been pronounced the other way. Vice-Chancellor Stuart, in his evidence, also stated the opinion of my late lamented and sincere Friend, Sir William Follett, who once expressed his conviction that the House of Lords had impaired their jurisdiction to a degree which could never be restored, by the law Lords failing on that occasion to put aside every political bias which might have existed in their minds, and to do what he believed was their duty—namely, to sustain the decision of the majority of the Judges. Another remarkable case was that of the Irish mixed marriages. It was argued in Ireland, and ten out of twelve of the Judges pronounced their opinion. It was brought to the House of Lords; the English Judges were called in, and they unanimously concurred with their ten Irish brethren. What happened in that case? By a mere chance—a pure accident—that judgment, so sustained by the concurrence of the English and Irish Judges, was upheld indeed by the decision of the House of Lords; but how upheld? There was an equality of voices on each side, among the law Lords, and no judgment was delivered at all. So that literally that decision was a matter of chance. A more recent example was the decision in the Bridgewater will case, which was heard before the Lord Chancellor. Eleven of the Judges were called in to hear the appeal, nine of whom agreed with the Lord Chancellor; yet the judgment which that noble and learned Lord, the head of the law, delivered in his own court, although it was supported by a most able argument and backed by such an array of judicial authorities as I have named, was ultimately reversed by the voice of four ex-Chancellors. The Scotch cases are more remarkable still. And this Bill does not profess to provide any remedy whatever for them. An hon. Friend of mine has presumed that a Scotch Judge will be elevated—if elevation it can be called—to a life peerage, and made one of the Deputy Speakers. But, if you are reduced to that necessity, what will English and Irish suitors say to this Scotch-law deputy, trained in a law other than that which he will have to administer, deciding, with a voice equal to one-third of the highest Court of Appeal, on the law of England touching property, and touching property, too, in its most sensitive parts, and in the last resort? This Bill leaves it open for the Crown to appoint a Scotch lawyer; but with that single and, I must say, doubtful exception, it wholly passes by the question as to Scotch appeals. What, then, is the mode in which justice is administered in regard to Scotch cases? It is well known that Lord Erskine, in his place in the House of Lords, and from the wool-sack, when he had been elevated to the great seal, frankly and openly avowed before the assembled Peers, and in the face of the country, that he knew about as much of the law of Scotland as he did of the law of Mexico. I do not believe a more honest, upright man, ever filled the seat of justice than the late Lord Truro. He possessed that quality—more precious even than learning in a Judge—the strongest possible love of justice. He was not ashamed to do what few men had the moral courage to do—namely, to own his imperfect knowledge of certain branches of the Law, when justice was at stake. He sat alone, by a sad compulsion, for a whole Session to hear Scotch appeals; and it is recorded of him, that when he first sat to hear a question relating to Scotch entails he wished to take home an elementary treatise to inform his mind on the branch of the law on which he was called upon to decide, having practised all his life at common law. [An hon. MEMBER: It was an Irish, not a Scotch case.] Even if that were so, the argument to be drawn from it was much the same. Lord Truro was sitting in equity, and all his life he had been a common lawyer. Lord Truro for an entire Session heard all the Scotch appeals, and such was his sense of justice that he never pronounced a single judgment. What is the bearing of this on the administration of justice in this class of cases? The Lord Justice General—the highest authority—says that the appeals mainly rest on speculation as to the chances of the tribunal at the particular time. The Lord Advocate told the House of Lords' Committee that he had heard stated at the bar of that House, as being the law of Scotland, that which would never have been uttered by the youngest counsel at the Scottish Bar; and the Dean of Faculty says, that when he is consulted by Scotch clients on the propriety of an appeal to the House of Lords, he does not look in the least to the merits of the case, but speculates on the light in which it will be viewed by English lawyers. Rabelais relates that there was a certain Chancellor who for twenty years pronounced judgments to the entire satisfaction of the people, which were regarded as perfectly consistent with justice and redundant with learning—that he kept his own counsel, however, about the peculiarity of his procedure; but the mode in which he had administered justice at length transpired, when it was found that, having always retired to his closet before delivering his decisions, he there fixed arbitrarily upon two numbers to correspond with each view of the case, and then, taking a dice-box into his hand, he would cast the die and give his judgment according to the numbers that he turned up. This is the mode in which appeals have been virtually conducted in the House of Lords, and which we are this day asked to sanction. They certainly do not decide appeals by lot, but a tribunal in which chance or party feeling thus prevails, in these days is disgraceful to the country in which we live. I am ashamed of the extent to which I have occupied the time of the House. Hitherto the inquiry has been instituted by the House of Lords alone, but I am one of those who think that a reformatory process can seldom be safely intrusted to those who have to reform themselves. The case is one in which the intervention of a second body will be most useful, and I do think that inquiry into the appellate jurisdiction in the last resort will most profitably employ our attention. What evil can result from the rejection of this Bill? The Session is drawing to a close, and this jurisdiction will not be exercised until we meet again. There is, therefore, ample time for further consideration. I have not only resisted the measure, but I have presumed, not on my own authority, but on the authority of those by whom I think I have been well advised, to sketch a mode by which the House of Lords themselves may, without the intervention of this House, improve their appellate jurisdiction. But again I say, if legislation is necessary let us begin de novo, and carefully investigate how an efficient and satisfactory tribunal can be constituted. Either for rejection or delay I cannot hesitate to was the traditional respect in which the jurisdiction of the House of Lords was held so utterly baseless that no advantage whatever was to be derived in the administration of justice from the high dignity with which it was associated by being united to one great branch of the Legislature? Did the independence of the judicial system gain nothing by having its root and fountain-head in the House of Lords, where unquestionably it was unassailable by corruption or by the influence of the Crown, and where it was brought into immediate and close contact with the legislative power, so that the same Judges who administered justice in the House of Lords, might also suggest acts of the Legislature to correct any defects or errors in the law? He confessed he could not divest himself of the notion that the administration of justice did gain something in dignity, independence, and stability from its association with the House of Lords; and he believed, also, that the opinion which had so long prevailed was not unfounded, which supposed that the House of Lords gained something of dignity, honour, independence, and stability from its association with the administration of justice. And, without pressing that consideration for one moment to a point which would make it interfere with the due administration of justice, he was unable to prevail on himself so far to disregard it as to avoid asking this question. If it be possible to establish a satisfactory court of final appeal in the House of Lords, consistently with constitutional principle and the interests of the country, would it not be as well—would it not be better—to do so, rather than to annihilate all the prestige of centuries and all the traditional respect which the country had been accustomed to feel for the jurisdiction so exercised, for the sake of attempting some new experiment the success of which no one could foretell? He thought it better to try improvement in the House of Lords, rather than venture on a course of mere experiment without any necessity which he was able to perceive. His right hon. Friend (Sir J. Graham) had addressed the House in a very powerful speech, full of topics calculated to affect its decision. He was not quite sure that all those topics were equally germane to the essential merits of the question. His right hon. Friend had urged objections to details, many of which were well founded; but he thought it was not necessary to refer to them upon the question of giving this

Mr. Roundell Palmer

Bill a second reading. His right hon. Friend objected, in the first place, to the manner in which the question of life peerages was dealt with by this Bill; and, in the second place, he objected to the measure as giving a legislative recognition to the fiction involved in the present jurisdiction of the House of Lords. Some hon. Gentlemen had objected that the prerogative of the Crown, with regard to the creation of life peerages, would be invaded by the Bill, while others maintained that the measure would open the door to the creation and extension of such peerages. The right hon. Baronet had, for the purposes of his argument, used both these objections, but he seemed to throw his own opinion into the scale in favour of the second. He (Mr. R. Palmer) had not been persuaded by anything which had occurred in the House of Lords or elsewhere to entertain a doubt that the Crown did possess the prerogative of creating life peerages. Indeed, until the recent discussion of the question in the House of Lords, he was not aware that any doubt on the subject had been expressed by any high legal authority, but numerous writers of authority, both ancient and modern, had affirmed that the Crown possessed such a power; while as for the distinction of a peer with, and a peer without, a right to take his seat and vote in the House of Lords (no personal disability being in question), such an anomaly was never heard of before the case of the creation of Lord Wensleydale. One noble Lord, whose voice had not been least loud in the debate against the creation of Lord Wensleydale, had, when exercising a function which he (Mr. Palmer) supposed he ought to call judicial, in the case of the Devon Peccage, affirmed with the most undoubting and decided conviction that the Crown had the power of creating life peerages, and he went on to say that there was great reason for believing that the Crown had the power to create a peer during another man's life. That noble Lord had unquestionably changed his opinion; but down to the time when the Crown was advised to exercise the prerogative in the case of Lord Wensleydale, he (Mr. R. Palmer) was not aware that either the noble Lord to whom he referred, or any other legal authority of eminence, had ever entertained any serious doubt upon the subject. There was great doubt whether the passage which had been referred to, as expressing the opinion of Mr. Hargrave, did embody the views of that gentleman; but, at all events, much higher authorities had affirmed without hesitation the existence of the prerogative. He thought it was impossible for any one who had studied the history of the prerogative of the Crown, with regard to peerages, to arrive at the conclusion that the Crown did not possess the power of creating life peerages. The late Marquess of Londonderry sat in the House of Lords as Earl Vane, and what was the nature of his title? It was an earldom, limited to him for his life, with remainder not to his eldest son, not to heirs male of his body, but to heirs male of his second marriage; and if the present dowager Marchioness had died during Lord Londonderry's life, without leaving male issue, Lord Londonderry would either have been excluded from the House of Lords upon the principle which had lately been laid down, or he would have been an instance of a person holding a peerage for life which could not by possibility devolve upon any of his descendants. That was not the only example of the same kind. Whatever might have been the policy or prudence of the advice given to the Crown in the case of the Wensleydale Peerage, he thought no one could doubt that the Lord Chancellor, in giving his advice, had been influenced solely by a desire to apply a remedy to the very evil which this Bill was intended to meet. He (Mr. R. Palmer) might be asked whether he did not object to this measure on the ground that the prerogative of the Crown was invaded by the limitation which the Bill by implication, though perhaps not expressly, placed upon the exercise of that prerogative. He did not think that, because a prerogative existed, it should not be in the power of Parliament to limit that prerogative, or that it might not be wise on the part of the Crown to consent to such limitation, when the measure might be deemed politic, or for the public advantage. The difference of opinion which had arisen upon this subject, and the absence of any known legal remedy which the Crown could apply to assert its prerogative against the decision of the House of Lords, seemed to him to reduce the practical question to this—whether, if there were any substantial objects, beneficial to the public, for which the prerogative ought, within certain limits, to be supported and maintained, and if both Houses of Parliament could concur in maintaining that prerogative within such limits, there was any valid reason why the Crown should be advised to object to the limitation of its prerogative. The very novelty of the question, and the doubts which existed on the subject, were reasons why the limitation of the prerogative might advantageously and expediently be declared by Parliament. No one who maintained the existence of this prerogative on the part of the Crown had, so far as he was aware, thought that it would be for the public advantage to exercise it in such a manner as to invade, to subvert, and to undermine the hereditary character of the peerage. The Crown had been advised to exercise the prerogative, with the view of meeting a practical difficulty, and it was only on that account that any importance was attached to the question. When the union between Great Britain and Ireland took place, the prerogative of the Crown with regard to the creation of Irish peers was limited by Act of Parliament, and that was also the case when Scotland was united with this country. The law with respect to the right of Bishops to sit in the House of Lords had, of late years, been altered, and Bishops who, formerly, when they were appointed by the Crown, could, by virtue of their appointment and consecration, take their seats in that assembly, were, by an Act of Parliament, deprived of the privilege. There was, therefore, nothing unconstitutional in dealing with a question of this nature by act of Parliament. If the House considered that the practical value of the prerogative was to enable the Crown to supply the House of Lords with an adequate amount of judicial power, while it was not desirable that the prerogative should be exercised in such a manner as to destroy or undermine the principle of an hereditary peerage, he thought it would be wise and salutary to uphold the prerogative within some such limits as those contemplated by this Bill, and to put an end to all further dispute by restraining the prerogative for the future within those regulated limits. Such a course seemed to him to meet the objection of the right hon. Baronet (Sir James Graham)—that the Bill would tend to undermine the hereditary character of the peerage, and to introduce the novel practice of creating life peerages. The right hon. Baronet said, that when lawyers were created life peers an onward movement would take place, and that naval and military officers and politicians would be elevated to a similar dignity. He (Mr. R.

Palmer) thought that the right hon. Baronet was not justified in assuming that this Bill which limited, regulated, and restricted the prerogative, preventing its assertion except in the case of persons called to the House of Lords to fill certain judicial offices, and which they were told would confer an unenviable honour upon men, at whom the finger of scorn would consequently be pointed, would induce persons who might attain distinction in the army, in the navy, or as statesmen, to desire the position of peers for life. He (Mr. R. Palmer) believed there was no cause for alarm on that ground. If there was any danger that life peerages would be extensively created this Bill was a most salutary measure, for it restricted the exercise of the prerogative. It was his conviction that no persons would accept life peerages except upon the ground that such peerages were more desirable for themselves than hereditary peerages. He thought no man—whether a lawyer or a person in any other position—was justified in accepting an hereditary peerage merely because it was the object of his ambition to “build up an immortal name,” if with that name he could not transmit to his children and descendants adequate means for supporting its dignity and honour. Unless those means existed the descendants of such a man would not look back with gratitude or respect to the founder of their family, but they would wish that his ambition had been more moderate, and that he had been content with honours which he might himself have supported with becoming splendour, but which they were unable properly to sustain. A court of appeal must be composed substantially of lawyers, and if that court was to be in the House of Lords, as he thought it should be, then means must be taken to remove every impediment to the supply of lawyers of adequate attainments and numbers. But did experience warrant them in believing that they could always command the adequate number of lawyers in a condition to accept hereditary peerages? He agreed with his right hon. Friend that it was probably not true that the legitimate emoluments of the profession were less in the present day than in former times. The habits and tastes of society now were perhaps more expensive than formerly, and therefore there were not the same chances of accumulation; but one reason why enormous fortunes were made in former times and were not likely to be made now was, that in other days they were not solely made by the legitimate emoluments of the profession. Those were the days of large and extraordinary emoluments, when Lord Chancellors and other high judicial officers enjoyed very great salaries, and when immense fortunes were made in a short time in very irregular ways. All these irregular ways were cut off now, and all that was done must be by the regular road of honest labour. This was an improvement of our times, but one consequence of the improvement was that we did not find many professional men building up fortunes adequate enough to sustain the expenses and dignity of the hereditary peerage. If there were cases of persons with sufficient means there was no reason against giving them hereditary peerages; but who could count up the number of legal peerages that had been created during the last sixty or seventy years, and say that there were adequate fortunes in connection with them? Who could fail to see that it would have been a better thing for many of those families if their ancestors had not been raised to the hereditary peerage, and that it was no advantage to the hereditary peerage to have such members among them? In very recent times only one colossal fortune had been made by a lawyer—he meant that of Lord Eldon. The result was that wise and moderate men, who acted best for themselves and their posterity, though they might be possessed of means ample enough to support their personal dignity in their lifetime, and who might be the ornaments of their profession, would always be found, in such a state of things, reluctant (if they were likely to leave successors behind them) to accept the hereditary peerage. If we were to have the choice of the best men in the profession, some means must be found of obviating this difficulty; and that was the reason why a remedy was lately sought. But he took the liberty of saying that the remedy, even if Lord Wensleydale's creation had been accepted by the House of Lords, must have been imperfect, because we wanted not only the presence in that House of a greater number of persons conversant with the law, but also persons who would be bound to give a constant, regular, formal, official attendance in the House of Lords for the performance of the required duties. That could not be done unless the principle of salary was adopted, and that was included in the principle of the measure before the House. The Bill he regarded as defective in its details. For instance, the number of the fixed judicial body appeared to him too small, and their salaries inadequate. He thought if they were going to do the thing at all, it should be done well. They should not have a petty measure that would make it necessary to come to Parliament again. He did not hesitate to say that if the Bill passed with only two Judges, whose salaries were not to exceed those of puisne Judges, it would run a great risk of proving a miserable failure. He supported the second reading on this ground—that the Bill went on the principle of forming in the House of Lords, and as an integral part of that House, and therefore no fiction (or not more a fiction than the existing jurisdiction), a tribunal which should be found sufficient to perform all the duties of a final Court of Appeal. That was the principle in which he concurred, but he objected to some of the details. Those who framed it thought, and he did not, that two Judges would be enough. They thought, and he did not, that salaries of £5,000 would be enough; but these were points to be considered in Committee either in the present or in another Session, and therefore this was not the time to enter minutely upon those points. He took the main principle of the Bill to be that they should retain, and improve, and provide for the efficiency of, the Court of Appeal in the House of Lords; and on that ground alone he gave it his support.

MR. COLLIER said, until there was a responsible Minister, and Government came forward with a definite policy of law reform, by which they would be willing to stand or fall, it would be in vain to expect any measures of law reform that would be perfectly satisfactory. The opposers of the Bill had shown themselves remarkably barren of suggestions of improvement. None of the opponents appeared to be agreed as to what ought to be done. They admitted that matters were intolerable, but they totally disagreed as to the fitting remedy. The proposition of the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. Bowyer) was quite untenable, as he proposed to take Common Pleas and Exchequer Judges, and with their aid to form a Court of Appeal. The hon. and learned Member for Tavistock (Mr. R. Phillimore), was too sagacious to adopt such a scheme, and he contented himself with saying that the House of Lords ought to reform itself; but he did not state how. That was the whole case of the opposition. Here, however, in the Bill was a practical remedy for an admitted grievance. At present they had an uncertain tribunal, and one that could not be depended upon. This Bill constituted three Judges, whose attendance should be regular, and whose attendance might be depended upon by suitors—an improvement of the greatest practical importance. The Bill proposed that the Jurisdiction of the House of Lords should be co-extensive in duration with the sittings of the courts from which the appeals were made—that was also another most important improvement. He quite admitted that the Bill was capable of still further improvement, and if the Solicitor General's opinion had been attended to, the Bill would have been made more perfect. The Solicitor General's suggestions before the Committee ought to be embodied in the Bill, and if no one else made the proposition, he should propose that those suggestions be embodied in it in Committee. It was not too late to embody the suggestions of the Solicitor General with reference to a permanent Committee, and to the power of summoning all the Judges of law and equity, in case of need. The Solicitor General had grappled with all the difficulties, and had shown it was possible to deal with business transacted not only by the House of Lords but by the Privy Council. If these suggestions were adopted the Bill would work well, and be found a practical remedy for existing grievances. He should support the second reading of the Bill, and propose Amendments in Committee.

MR. J. G. PHILLIMORE said, he considered the Bill to be both dangerous and unconstitutional, and containing a compromise which rather eluded than met admitted evils. If there was one argument stronger than another against the Bill it was the necessity of separating the judicial and legislative functions; but this union had been put forward by one hon. Member as the strongest argument in favour of this Bill. This power of exercising an appellate jurisdiction was a mere usurpation on the part of the House of Lords. In the time of Charles I. the House of Lords made a desperate attempt to acquire the judicial function in the case of "Skinner against the East India Company," but in that attempt they were defeated. In the time of Charles II. the power of appeal to the House of Lords was resisted, and by no man more earnestly than by Lord

Hale, and it was not finally established till his death. The way in which the power of appeal became vested in the House of Lords was this:—After the death of Lord Hale the Crown issued a writ to certain members of the House of Lords—members of the Privy Council—authorising them to decide upon certain cases. The jealousy of the House of Commons was thereby aroused, and, rather than that the King should have the power of appointing a Court of Appeal, they acquiesced in what was undoubtedly a usurpation on the part of the House of Lords. The same objection had been made in the reign of Queen Anne. Sir W. Temple said that he had not heard any part of the British constitution so much complained of as the judicial functions exercised by the House of Lords. The same power was complained of by Sir Edward Sugden (the present Lord St. Leonards) in 1841; and now it was even complained of by the House of Lords themselves, who had reported that they were inadequate to the discharge of their functions. In his opinion, the only effectual remedy would be to remove the appellate jurisdiction from the House of Lords, and to constitute a supreme court of appellate jurisdiction, composed of the most consummate lawyers, which would command the respect and confidence of the country. To show that there was no peculiar sanctity in the claim of the House of Lords, he would refer to the opinion of Mr. Hallam, which directly negatived the claim of the House of Peers. They had a measure before them adequate for its purpose, and if the House of Lords neglected its functions, it was no reason why the House of Commons should neglect theirs. The House of Commons, though willing to give any sum of money for an efficient tribunal, objected to spend money for an inefficient object. If you took away the functions from lay Lords which they did not really possess, they would only be taking away that which they could not properly exercise. It was the duty of the House to constitute a tribunal that should be efficient, not for a few years, but for all time. With regard to the power of the Crown to create life peerages, he did not consider that to be the proper time for discussing the question. He would, however, observe that if James II., in his time, had asserted the power of creating life peerages, in all probability the House of Lords would have been swamped and his crown would have been saved; but notwithstanding the arbitrary power generally exercised by that monarch, he never assumed the prerogative of creating life peerages. He thought it most impolitic and unwise to empower the same men to exercise both the judicial and political functions—for it must be remembered that these life Peers were also to vote in the legislative chamber—and he said it was a dangerous temptation to hold out to Judges, thus to mix up the judicial and legislative functions.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: I confess I could have wished to hear from the Solicitor General some other reasons in support of this Bill than those which I have as yet heard. Indeed, it appears to me that two very great authorities who have spoken in favour of the Bill have, by their speeches, rather tended to increase the doubts of those who are unfavourable to the measure than to confirm those who are anxious to hear reasons in favour of it. My learned Friend the Attorney General almost made an apology for introducing the Bill. He said it was not what it ought to be, and that what he desired was a Bill which would erect a tribunal of appeal quite independent of the House of Lords. The hon. and learned Gentleman pointed out how much better such a tribunal would be than that devised by the present Bill, and he did not state to the House any reason against such a measure, except that the House of Lords were determined to go against reason, to overbear all the motives of justice and expediency, and to stand by their appellate jurisdiction, however mischievously it might work to the country. I must confess that would give one a very bad notion of the House of Lords, and I cannot but think it would give the country a bad notion of the House of Commons if, acknowledging the measure to be bad—knowing that it has been recommended to us as a bad measure—we were, nevertheless, to accept and adopt it in its present shape. Then we were told by the hon. and learned Member for Plymouth (Mr. Collier)—and I was glad to hear his remarks, because they coincided with the opinion which I had myself formed—that if the proposed tribunal were to be created, not only would £5,000 a year be an inadequate salary for the Judges to be appointed, but more than two Deputy Speakers should sit in the House of Lords; and he added, that unless the salary was larger, and unless two more members were added to the tribunal, the Bill before us would be a miserable failure. But we must take the Bill as we find it, and it does not propose to give either larger salaries or to appoint a larger staff than that which the hon. and learned Gentleman deprecates as insufficient. The hon. and learned Gentleman, however, wishes to amend the Bill in Committee; but I know not that the Government would be prepared to adopt the alterations which he proposes. I am told, however, that the Bill is the result of a bargain—that the two sides of the House of Lords have agreed to the Bill, and that the House of Commons has nothing to do but to assent to it. Now, I must own that that argument does not at all incline me to acquiesce humbly in the Bill. It gives me some suspicion of the measure to be told that it is a compromise between the opposite parties. In the first place, in spite of the learned authorities which have been quoted before the Committee, I have considerable doubt whether the proposed remedy is absolutely required. I am told that the House of Lords is unfit to exercise the functions of a Court of Appeal, because very frequently the Lord Chancellor sits alone; because at all times the attendance of the law Lords is uncertain; because there may be present two ex-Chancellors, or only one, or none at all; and, because the members of the Court do not appear in judicial costume. Why, Sir, the greater part of these allegations refers to a state of things which has always existed, even when the country was most satisfied with the constitution of the House of Lords as an appellate tribunal. We have heard the names of Lords Hardwicke, Mansfield, and Eldon, more recently of Lord Cottenham, as well as of Lords Lyndhurst and Brougham, who are still alive; and I think no one can say that there has not been, from Lord Hardwicke downwards, almost a perpetual succession of periods in which men of great intellect, of very powerful understanding, and with vast treasures of acquired legal knowledge, have presided in the House of Lords. If that has been the case, I am disposed to think, when you are told by competent witnesses—men, too, who complain of the existing system—that when Lord Lyndhurst presided in the House of Lords and Lords Cottenham, Campbell, and Brougham attended, it was a most powerful tribunal, and one satisfactory to the country, you are endeavouring to provide a permanent remedy for a temporary evil; that those disadvantages which you are informed exist in 1856 may in two or three years hence utterly disappear; and that the tribunal may then be as much an object of veneration and confidence as it has hitherto been. I agree with the hon. and learned Gentleman who spoke last, that in the days of Charles II. the House of Lords in its judicial capacity was a new tribunal, and that Lord Hale was opposed to its appellate jurisdiction; but, when so much time has passed since the beginning of the reign of that monarch, I must be content to take things as they are now, and unless that appellate tribunal is quite unsatisfactory—unless I am forced to look for a remedy—I must endeavour to be satisfied with its constitution as it exists at the present moment. At the same time, it appears to me that there is great force in what is stated by several of the witnesses with regard to the Lord Chancellor sitting alone; but I think, with the Lord Justice Clerk in Scotland and the Master of the Rolls in England, that an accomplished and able man giving his full attention to a case, even though it may not relate to the particular law with which he has been most conversant, is likely to come to a better decision than a tribunal composed of inferior men, though they may be more conversant with the precise question in hand. The instance which has been quoted by the right hon. Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Napier) is rather a proof than the reverse of the truth of that observation. Examine it for a moment. The right hon. Gentleman says that Lord Truro, coming to sit in the House of Lords, was so ignorant with respect to a particular Act of Parliament referring to Ireland—the Irish Registry Act—that he asked for a common text book to take home with him, in order that he might learn the A B C with regard to that law bearing on the case. But the right hon. Gentleman does not stop there, for he goes on to say that Lord Truro, having mastered the case, having made himself perfectly acquainted with that Act of Parliament, came down to the House of Lords and delivered a most luminous and satisfactory judgment. Therefore, Sir, it appears to me that if that were the case, your practice of selecting the ablest man in the legal profession who belongs to the party which happens to be in power, of placing him at the head of the House of Lords, and of confiding to him the appellate jurisdiction, is not so utterly a failure or so entirely disgraceful an arrangement as some hon. and learned Gentlemen at the present day seem to imagine. I admit that there are many things with respect to which we might blame both the Lord Chancellor and some of the ex-Chancellors who sit with him; but they are matters of arrangement which, with a little more care and attention, and with a little more respect to the public, the noble and learned Lords themselves can manage. Thus in the instance of a case of which we have been told instead of two noble Lords delivering an elaborate judgment, and a third saying that he was not aware the case was coming on that day, and was not prepared to give his decision, I think it would have been respectful to the public and decorous to the parties whose interests were to be adjudicated upon if the case had been adjourned to another day. Again, Sir, great fault is found with respect to some defects of manner, in some of the noble and learned Lords—for instance, a noble and learned Lord, whose qualifications as a Judge no one will question—Lord St. Leonards—is much blamed because he has been seen to slap the table with his hand. Now really, Sir, are we going to alter the whole jurisdiction of the court of last resort because one of the Judges slaps with his hand upon the table? These are matters which should be remedied by the noble and learned Lords themselves. They should agree to sit together, and wear an official costume, if necessary; they should do some things far more essential than those to which I have adverted; they should, above all, very much diminish the expense of those printed copies and of all those preparatory proceedings which are now necessary before a case can come into the House of Lords. Why, Sir, these are vestiges of the time when lay Lords gave their opinions in the House, and I have no doubt that three-fourths of the expense might be saved. There is another point, to which the right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle has adverted, and which I know engaged the attention of Lord Cottingham. The noble and learned Lord thought of recommending that a Judicial Committee of the House of Lords should sit during the recess of Parliament; that at the opening of the Session they should make a report upon the several cases they had heard; and that then the House of Lords should be moved to confirm their report and deliver judgment accordingly. Why, Sir, that would remedy a great part of the evil complained of. It is complained that, during a period of two or three months, most useful for judicial purposes in other courts, the House of Lords does not sit. I have shown how that might be remedied without any such alteration as that proposed by the Bill now before the House. But, Sir, if I were disposed to yield to the learned authorities which have been quoted in favour of a change, I should still remain of opinion that the proposed remedy must result in making the tribunal worse than that which now exists. The Attorney General spoke of the mischief and impropriety of a Lord Chancellor sitting alone in the House of Lords and overruling decisions which the Superior Courts at Westminster, or the Lords Justices, or any other tribunals, much respected in the country, have arrived at. Let us suppose another case. Let us suppose the Lord Chancellor, a very eminent man, thoroughly qualified for the duties entrusted to his charge, sitting in the House of Lords with two puisne Judges, or persons holding the rank and receiving the pay of puisne Judges, and those two individuals overruling the decisions of the Superior Courts of common law, and of the Lord Chancellor into the bargain. It appears to me, Sir, that such a tribunal, instead of being an improvement, would be worse than the one now in existence. I can well conceive the advantages of a Court such as that which the hon. and learned Member for Suffolk (Sir Fitzroy Kelly) has proposed—a tribunal of five persons—the Lord Chancellor presiding at its head, and four Judges receiving £6,000 or £7,000 a year each. Such a position being made an object of ambition to men learned in the law, I can understand that we might have a better Court of Appeal than that which we possess at present. If a change is to be made, I should be in favour of such a change; but what I say is, either leave the Lords' appellate tribunal as it is—either leave that Court of justice to make some improvement in its own constitution and procedure—or, if you have a remedy to propose, let us have a complete and efficient remedy. Let us have a Lord Chancellor, with four of the ablest men you can have, sitting as an appellate tribunal. If you can secure such a tribunal, trustworthy and efficient, I am ready, for one, to vote the necessary funds, and I might go along with the proposal of the hon. and learned Member for Suffolk if a change is to be made. But, I say, do not fall between the two; do not have a tribunal which is neither the House of Lords nor a good appellate tribunal chosen from the best men who can be found, but a hybrid creation which partakes of both and does not satisfy any of the conditions which the country desires. The tribunal which is to be formed is to sit in the House of Lords; and that appears to me to be the only thing in which it can be said to be the House of Lords deciding appeals. The House of Lords, as the Attorney General said, are very anxious to retain their appellate jurisdiction; but what is it they are wishing to retain? We all know that eighty years ago the lay Lords assisted in the judgments of the Court of Appeal. On the famous Douglas case some lay Peers sat on the twelve days during which the case was heard, and they gave their votes upon it. Indeed, I happened to stumble the other day upon a speech of the Duke of Chandos, in which he claims merit to himself for having attended the legal as well as the political business of the House of Lords. At that time, then, the Court of Appeal was either a good or a bad tribunal, but it was, at least, a reality; it was really the House of Lords presided over by such men as Lord Camden or Lord Mansfield, and therefore could not be said to be uninstructed, with regard to the law, in deciding on these cases. So matters went on until the time of Lord Eldon; but then, all on a sudden, the House declared that two lay Lords should attend, day by day, in order to make a quorum. Two Lords, therefore, often attended at the beginning of a case, two more at the middle, and two more, who had not heard either the beginning or the middle, attended at the end. Why, then the mystery was unveiled—the arcanum imperii was at once discovered. Nobody could then pretend that these were lay Lords, hearing and deciding appeals; it was obvious that no one but the Lord Chancellor and the law Lords gave their opinions on such subjects. Well, then, having got over this, the Upper House propose to go a step further, and they say, "Leave these lay Lords out altogether; let only the ex-Chancellors attend; let the Lord Chancellor sit with two other persons," who are not to be, as the ancient Peers were, Judges because they are Peers, but Peers because they are Judges. Why, that completely alters the nature of the tribunal. The Lord Chancellor sits in one room with two Lords Justices, and that is the appellate tribunal of the Court of Chancery.

He sits in another room with two learned Lords as Deputy Speakers, and, because he sits in the same room in which the House of Lords sits in the evening to discuss political matters, that is to be called maintaining the appellate jurisdiction of the Lords. Sir, I hope the House will not give its sanction to such a sham. I really think the House of Lords, if they had not been intent upon this bargain—this compromise, of which the Bill is the result—they would themselves have been ashamed of proposing such a scheme as this, calling it the preservation of their appellate jurisdiction. I have mentioned that there is another question concerned in this Bill, and it is a question upon which I am sorry to touch at all; but it is impossible to avoid it, because the House of Lords have sent down a Bill in which that subject is touched upon. I mean the creation of Peers for life. Well, that is a very grave question, and I own that I very much regret the course which both the Government and the House of Lords have taken. The learned Personage in question might have been made a Peer in the ordinary manner, and he would have had the respect of everybody as an hereditary Peer. I say I am sorry that so unnecessary a step was taken for the purpose, as it were, of trying the question, and I am very sorry that the Lords immediately caught at it as a matter of dispute, and decided in a Committee of Privileges that the noble Lord so created could not take his seat. Sir, I do not think we yet see the end of that decision. We know very well that in the time of Charles II., as the hon. and learned Gentleman who spoke last reminded us, there was a decision of the House of Lords—in fact, several resolutions were passed—to the effect that they possessed original jurisdiction. That they have long since entirely given up. We also know this House decided, and decided upon full authority, that Mr. Wilkes had no right to a seat; and in spite of an immense majority of the freeholders of Middlesex the House of Commons persisted in giving the seat to a gentleman who had a minority of votes upon the poll. These resolutions, however, after being stoutly maintained, were, as we all know, expunged from the Journals of the House, and are now universally acknowledged to be a precedent that ought never to be followed; indeed, when a case afterwards occurred something like it, we pursued a directly opposite course. So I trust that that Resolution of the House of Lords upon the Report of their Committee of Privileges in respect to Lord Wensleydale will some years hence be rescinded. There is, indeed, a decision by them upon a peerage question, with regard to which such a course has been pursued. They decided, soon after the Union, that a Scotch Peer could not sit in the House of Lords by virtue of an English peerage; but after the lapse of some sixty or seventy years they found they were mistaken in the law; they reversed their decision, and admitted to take his seat another noble Lord who was a Scotch Peer, and had no more claim than the one they had formerly refused to admit. In the same way I trust this decision on the subject of life peerages will not be permanently retained on the Journals of the upper House. The question is a grave one, and has been decided, as I venture humbly to think, without sufficient argument. Everybody knows the doctrine held by Lord Coke, that the Crown possessed the prerogative of making Peers for life; the same doctrine is stated by Judge Doddrige as one which did not admit of doubt; it has been stated over and over again by various text writers, who have all copied this dictum of Lord Coke and Judge Doddrige. It so happened, in a case solemnly heard before the House of Lords, that Lord Brougham, when Chancellor, having occasion to refer to the assertion of Judge Doddrige, went on to dispute another dictum of this Judge upon peerage law, but he did not notice as a subject for dispute that the Crown might create Peers for life. Lord Wynford followed the Lord Chancellor, and stated he should be very sorry to see the King make Peers for life, as he thought it would do great injury to the constitution; but neither Lord Brougham, nor Lord Wynford, nor anybody who ever mentioned the subject—except Mr. Butler, in a law work—ever positively, and with any authority, contradicted the opinion of Lord Coke. I do not say that that opinion is to be accepted without dispute; but what I do say is, that when the House of Lords had to consider the subject they should have made some further inquiry, and should have heard at their bar some persons to defend the exercise of the prerogative of the Crown. I own I was somewhat surprised that the learned Attorney General did not appear at the bar of the House of Lords in order to defend the Crown in that exercise of its prerogative. But let us see the position in which the question now remains. Contrary to the authority of Lord Redesdale, the House of Lords have refused to allow Lord Wensleydale to take his seat. Do they mean that the Crown is to be deprived of that power which Lord Coke and many great authorities have declared it possesses? They find themselves, as my right hon. Friend (Sir J. Graham) says, in some embarrassment at setting themselves so positively against the prerogative of the Crown. What, then, have they done? They have agreed that a certain number of persons, not more than four, shall hold peerages for life; they have mixed up that important subject of life peerages with the appellate jurisdiction, with which it has nothing whatever to do; and they have laid down that no more than four Peers of this kind shall sit in the House of Lords. Do they intend in this way to take away or circumscribe the prerogative?—a question you may well ask. My Lord St. Leonards, the Lord Chief Justice, and some other Peers, said, that it did take it away; Lord Lansdowne said that it did not. A noble Peer proposed to insert words which would make it clear. But that would have left no subject of dispute in the House, and neither side would adopt it. Then, the House of Lords sent the Bill down here, and we are asked to accept it with its ambiguous phraseology, and to make an Act of Parliament for the convenience of these two parties in the upper Chamber. I will venture to say that, whatever different opinions persons may entertain with regard to the prerogative of the Crown in the creation of Peers for life—and my own views upon that subject may not coincide with those of my right hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle—a more indecent measure, or a more unfit mode for Parliament to deal with the prerogative of the Crown, has never been brought forward. Well, Sir, I will now state, and I will state very briefly, my own opinion upon the subject of the creation of life Peers, as my right hon. Friend has so fully stated his. My own opinion is, that there are so many authorities in favour of the ancient prerogative of the Crown to create life Peers, that, as it is stated over and over again, by the very highest authorities, that Peers have been created with very great limitations, and, among others, with a limitation for life, there can be no doubt as to the ancient prerogative of the Crown. That prerogative, however, not having been exercised for so long a period—not having been exercised during the good times of the constitution—not having been exercised since the Revolution with regard to any person who has taken his seat in the House of Lords, I am willing to admit that I think that, if such a prerogative were now to be exercised, it would be fitting to lay down, by an Act of Parliament, the exact limits within which it might be exercised. But, then, I think that the question is a very serious one, and one which ought to be dealt with by a Bill relating to that subject alone—a Bill which would require the most mature consideration. I believe that, if we are to have Peers for life, it would be advantageous not to confine those peerages to the profession of the law. There may be gallant admirals and gallant generals whose services are deserving of the approbation and admiration of their country, although they may not be so brilliant as those of Wellington or of Nelson; and such men might, I think, be very fitly placed in the House of Lords as Peers for life. I think, likewise, that if the number of life Peers were fixed at a certain limit, we should not be introducing any anomaly into the constitution, because at the present moment there are in the House of Lords more than seventy Peers who sit for life, or for a term less than life. There are the Irish Peers, who are elected for life; the Scotch Peers, who are elected only for the Parliament; and the Bishops, who hold their seats for life; and I believe that the creation of another set of life Peers, limited in number, selected from men of eminence at the bar, in the naval and military professions, and in statesmanship, would not only not tend to diminish the authority of the House of Lords, but would, on the contrary, tend to give it strength, and would be in conformity with the general spirit of the times. I may be told that there is no necessity for such a course at the present moment. Well, I dare say not; but it is true with regard to the naval and military professions, more so than with regard to the law, that there are not the same means which used to exist for members of that profession to obtain fortunes sufficient to enable them to sustain the dignity of an hereditary peerage. They have no longer those means by which a general in Flanders, or an admiral in the East or West Indies, or in the Pacific, might obtain a fortune sufficient for that purpose; but still we cannot wish to exclude those men from honours which Wellington and Nelson were proud to gain, and upon them we might confer a peerage for life. I think, therefore, that we should derive great advantage from the creation of life peerages; but I must say that, to confine such creations to four persons in the profession of the law, to say that they shall be life Peers, and that no others shall be admitted to that distinction, would be to place those persons in a most invidious position;—I will not say in a degrading position, but still in a position which many men who are eminent at the bar would not wish to occupy. I come now to my last objection to the Bill, and that is, that I think that its tendency is to offer to the puisne Judges a temptation which ought not to be placed in their way. When once placed on the bench they do not expect promotion, and they are rarely raised to the head of their courts, whatever changes may be made; therefore, practically, there is no temptation in their case. But by this Bill a temptation is held out, especially to the puisne Judges; they are told that they will have easy work, and that instead of being employed the whole year they will, if they obtain one of these seats in the House of Lords, be employed for only a small period of it, and at the same time they will suffer no diminution in their salary. Well, Sir, I say that that is a considerable temptation, and will, I think, tend to deteriorate the constitution of our Courts. It is a great merit, with regard to our courts of justice, that the puisne Judges do not look any further than to the retiring pension to which, after many years' labour, they are entitled. Upon the whole, I have come to the conclusion that, although I see no immediate or pressing urgency, however much I may differ from others in that opinion, for any great reform in the appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords—for I believe that the House of Lords could themselves make such changes as would render their Court of Appeal satisfactory to the country; still, if a change is to be made, I say, let us have a change which takes away the tribunal of appeal from the House of Lords altogether; and let us establish a tribunal which shall be complete in itself, and which shall consist not of the puisne Judges, but of the most eminent men that can be found in the profession. If it be necessary to introduce a Judge from Scotland, although I must confess that I have never been convinced of the advantage of so doing, then let one be introduced; but, at all events, let us make the tribunal complete—let us provide an effectual remedy for the defects that exist; but, above all, do not, while you are amending the tribunal of last resort introduce another very grave and serious subject into the Bill; do not at the same time attempt to fetter the prerogative of the Crown in a manner which may be injurious to that prerogative, and which may at the same time be mischievous to the country. If we were at an early period of the Session I might perhaps be content to say, let us send the Bill to a Select Committee; but it is quite obvious that to send it to a Select Committee in the month of July would perhaps be a more polite but not a less effectual mode of getting rid of the Bill during the present Session than by directly negating it. For my own part, I approve the more direct manner of getting rid of it, and I shall, therefore, give my decided vote against the second reading.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, he would trespass very shortly upon the time of the House, but he could not help expressing the regret and pain with which he had observed the tone which the debate had taken. It would be impossible to adequately express the pain which every one who was anxious to amend the judicial institutions of the country must have felt in listening to the aspersions and criticisms of the right hon. Member for Carlisle. The House of Lords, the Bench, and the Bar, had been equally disparaged, and dirt had been thrown upon them by the right hon. Gentleman. He was sorry also to say that he could not concur in many of the observations of the noble Lord, from whom he should have expected much sounder and more constitutional doctrines. He had not been surprised at the observations of the right hon. Baronet, because that right hon. Gentleman acted up to the maxim sibi constat; but he had certainly been much amazed at the observations of the noble Lord. He would beg the attention of the House while he addressed to them a few remarks with regard to the manner in which the House of Lords obtained and exercised their appellate jurisdiction. The House had been told that the authority of the House of Lords as an appellate tribunal was a mere usurpation. Now, it was impossible to imagine a greater mistake. There was not a greater mistake in point of history which could be committed by any hon. or right hon. Gentleman in that House. The House of Lords had always possessed a jurisdiction upon writs of error, and it had certainly been a Court of last appeal in all questions of law carried up from the courts of common law at Westminster. It was undoubtedly true that, after the jurisdiction of the Court of Equity was fully established, a difficulty had been felt with regard to an ultimate appeal from the Lord Chancellor sitting in the Court of Chancery; but ever since 1685 it had been settled, without any question whatever, that the House of Lords was the depository of that appellate power, and had the right to exercise it, and that right had been conceded to them ever since. In Queen Anne's time the right was not questioned, though there was some dispute between the Commons and the Lords, but it never proceeded further than a few words. Now, he asked the noble Lord the Member for London whether he was not content with the constitutional character of an authority which had been exercised, without dispute, from the time of the Revolution? Unquestionably the noble Lord was; but what was meant, then, by challenging the authority of the House of Lords in judicial matters, and by the revolutionary doctrine that the admitted privileges of that House should be called in question? He should like to ask what opinion would have been entertained by that great man by whose side the right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle sat so long on the Ministerial bench if he had heard the opinions now broached by the right hon. Baronet? He thought, therefore, that he might call on the calm and considerate portion of the House of Commons to address their attention to the consideration of the Bill, with an acknowledgment of the unquestionable constitutional right of the House of Lords, and with the conviction that it would be doing something revolutionary if it interfered with that right, and remembering that the best security they could have for their own privileges was to respect the privileges of the other branches of the State. Such, then, being the right of the House of Lords, all that the House of Commons had to consider was, whether any assistance should be given to the Lords in the exercise of their appellate jurisdiction. It was unquestionably the character of the people of this country to endure sufferings very long; and it was unfortunately the temper of a great number of Gentlemen in the House of Commons, when a remedy was proposed for some acknowledged evil, immediately to quarrel with the remedy, not remembering that they could not have any unmixed good, and consequently the grievance for a long period remained unredressed. The House of Lords had been recognised for the greater part of the time during which it had exercised this jurisdiction as a high judicial authority; it had had the confidence of the people in the wisdom of its decrees and judgments, which were unimpeached and unimpeachable; but with respect to the mode in which the jurisdiction was exercised there were great inconveniences. One objection was, that the Lord Chancellor was frequently the only Judge in the House of Lords, and as he had sometimes to attend the Cabinet meetings, and sometimes was occupied in other official duties, the result was that, in consequence of the Lord Chancellor's absence, a less portion of the day was devoted to the hearing of a cause in the House of Lords than otherwise would be appropriated to that purpose. Appeals too to the House of Lords came there upon every variety of subject and from every inferior Court of judicature, and it could not be expected that the Lord Chancellor, or any one, or any two men, could with propriety be trusted with pronouncing sentences having reference to the decisions of other Courts, or to a state of law of which they had neither knowledge nor experience, but which, like the laws of the Medes and Persians were irreversible? Was it wise to commit to any one or two individuals this absolute power? Let the House take the analogy of the common law tribunals. In the Court of Queen's Bench four Judges were always sitting in banco; the same was the case in the Courts of Common Pleas and Exchequer; and in all, plurality of voices was recognised as the leading characteristic. Now it was proposed to adopt the same rule with regard to the Court of Appeal in the last resort. Undoubtedly, up to the present time this want had not been felt; but that had arisen from accident. He agreed in the eulogies pronounced on the administration of justice in the House of Lords at the time when Lord Lyndhurst, Lord Brougham, Lord Cottenham, and Lord Campbell were in daily attendance at that house, and combined to administer justice there. At that time there was no necessity or call for altering the tribunal; but circumstances altered, and now the advantage of the attendance of more than one or two law Lords could not be obtained. This evil had been felt in former times. It was complained of when Lord Eldon sat alone, though that noble and learned Lord was always most anxious to have Lord Redesdale constantly with him. In like manner, in the time of Lord Hardwicke, Lord Mansfield frequently acted as his assessor. But the evil had never been felt so strongly as during the last year, and the House of Lords, at the present time, failed to give satisfaction as the great Court of appellate jurisdiction; and all the judicial institutions of the country must be in an unsatisfactory condition when the appellate tribunal—the keystone of the arch—was not constituted so as to give satisfaction. The necessity of a change was therefore obvious: but were they to alter the system by pulling down the authority of the House of Lords, or should they not rather try to provide a remedy for the defects that had been pointed out? Deputy Speakers used, in former days, to be appointed from time to time to supply any deficiency in the judicial strength of the Upper House, and it was now desired to make that perpetual which had been previously resorted to only on a few occasions; and what was it that those who wished to pull down the present tribunal intended to set up instead? The House had had a most impossible and most absurd sketch presented to it by the right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle, and the noble Lord the Member for London eulogised the time when lay Lords—namely, those Peers who had not devoted themselves to the study of the law—were invited, solicited, and induced to take a part in the determinations of the judicial tribunal of the House of Lords. Was not the noble Lord aware of the scandal created by the practice? Does the noble Lord never remember reading that in those times persons who were parties to appeals who had handsome wives or daughters, used to send them to present petitions to Peers, in order to enlist their favour, and obtain a favourable judgment? The House was now asked to reject the present Bill, in order that it might pave the way for the introduction of some revolutionary measure. Was the House prepared to do that? Some hon. Gentlemen, who had not properly attended to the subject, said that the appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords might be transferred to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. But the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council was open to the same objections as the House of Lords; and it was a tribunal gathered from all quarters at great inconvenience to the Courts whose Judges were taken away to sit in it. At the present moment the Court of Appeal in Chancery was shut, and had been for the last eight or nine days, to the great inconvenience of all the suitors, because the Lords Justices were sitting with the Committee of the Privy Council; there was the same inconvenience felt in the Privy Council as in the House of Lords; the suitors never knew of whom the tribunal would consist, they never knew when it would sit, nor was it certain that all the Judges would remain collected together until the business before them was disposed of. These were evils which would only be augmented by transferring the appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords to the Privy Council. There would be merely the satisfaction of putting down an ancient tribunal—an old established right existing in the House of Lords—in order to transfer it, for the sake of change, to a tribunal of yesterday; and which it would be necessary to reconstruct in the same manner as they were now desired to reconstruct an old-established institution. Surely, it was better to improve, than to pull down merely for the sake of change. Some hon. Members had spoken of the Bill as being a miserable measure. That was the complimentary language applied to it by the right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle and by the hon. Member for Tavistock. If objection were taken to any of the details, to the number of the tribunal and the remuneration to be given to its members, no Gentleman who voted for the second reading of the Bill would be prevented from discussing any improvements in the Bill in Committee. Speaking for himself, he should be very glad if the basis of the tribunal could be enlarged, and if, in point of emolument, it could be rendered a greater object of ambition for the members of the law. With regard to the injurious allusion made by the right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle, that this Bill was promoted by members of the Bar from some idea of advantage to themselves, it seemed to be forgotten that the Bill carefully provided that no one should be transferred to the judicial tribunal of the House of Lords who had not already filled some judicial office; and members of the Bar, therefore, who were Members of that House, might discuss the Bill without being open to any such imputation. In fixing the number of the tribunal the House of Lords seemed to contemplate that they might always expect in their body one or more ex-Chancellors, who would attend to hear appeals: but he was not quite so certain that that expectation would always be realised, and therefore it was that he should be glad to see the constitution of the tribunal enlarged. From the observations which had been made in the course of the debate on the question of prerogative—which, however, had no real connection with the Bill—it was clear to him that there was a great deal of confusion upon that point. Nobody questioned, or ever had questioned, the prerogative of the Crown to create Peers for life. The question simply was, whether Peers for life were entitled to sit and vote in the House of Lords; and, therefore, what the noble Lord the Member for London referred to—the dictum of Coke and of those who repeated it after him—might be taken as an assertion of the acknowledged right of the Crown to create Peers for life, without any reference to the constitutional right of a Peer so created to take his seat in the House of Lords. It was the constitutional right of the House of Lords to determine who was entitled to take his seat in that House. That was recognised by a proceeding with which they were all familiar. Upon the death of every Peer, and upon the transmission of every Peerage, the House of Lords sat in judgment as a judicial tribunal—in the form of a Committee of Privileges—and determined whether the claimant had proved his constitutional right to take his seat as a member of that body. This Bill, though it might be open, he confessed, to a difference of construction in some points, did not affect the question of prerogative at all, except where, in a manner perfectly constitutional, it put a limit, for the purposes of the Bill, on the number of persons to be created Peers for life, with the right of becoming members of the House of Lords. To put such a limitation upon the prerogative was not unconstitutional. The prerogative had been limited already in the Act of Union with Scotland and in the Act of Union with Ireland; and if matters had come to this predicament that there was a question between the Crown and the House of Lords upon which those who conceived that the Crown had an unbounded prerogative were met by those who held, on the contrary, that the prerogative was limited, was it wrong that there should be some expressions of limitation of the prerogative in a Bill of this description? The noble Lord the Member for London and the right hon. Baronet the Member for

Carlisle urged the House of Commons to pronounce that upon this question they were right, and the House of Lords, who were by the constitution the proper exponents of the prerogative right upon this subject, were wrong; and because it contained this limitation clause to reject the Bill altogether. Such a course would be rash beyond all measure. Was the House in a situation to pronounce an opinion upon this question? Were they to reject a measure which would be of such service to the appellate tribunal in the last resort because it contained a limitation of the prerogative which the House of Lords believed to be perfectly legal and constitutional, and to which the assent of the Crown must be given before it could pass into law? Was the House of Commons to prevent this concord between the House of Lords and the Crown, and to re-open this question, which was now about to be settled? This was a course which he thought the House of Commons would shrink from. They would not, he thought, feel themselves called on to refuse this Bill, which was the result of an agreement between the Crown and the House of Lords, simply because it contained a clause which limited the prerogative in a perfectly legal manner. The unanimous testimony of those who had for the last fifteen or twenty years practised in the House of Lords was that this would be a great boon and a great advantage to the people of England. He hoped that their evidence, which was perfectly disinterested, would have some weight with the House of Commons, and that that House would not signalise the last days of its present Session by the rejection of this amendment of the law, which came from the other House of Parliament, which was sanctioned by the Crown, which would unquestionably remove a great and long-standing grievance, and to which there was no rival, because no intelligible and rational scheme had been brought forward in competition with it.

Main Question put, and agreed to.
Bill read 2^o.

INCUMBERED ESTATES (IRELAND) BILL.

Order for Committee read; House in Committee.

MR. WHITESIDE moved the addition of a new clause, limiting the number of the Commissioners to two. The evidence given before the Select Committee had shown that it was quite impossible for the present Chief Commissioner of the Incumbered Estates Court to transact the business of that office without neglecting his duties as a Baron of the Exchequer. At present a great portion of the time of the Commissioners was taken up in listening to appeals from the decision of each other; and, as those appeals would, according to the terms of a Bill to be brought before the House to-morrow, be transferred to a new appellate court, two Commissioners would be sufficient to dispose of the business of the Incumbered Estates Court.

Clause brought up, and read 1^o.

MR. J. D. FITZGERALD objected to the clause as unwise and inexpedient. The Crown could now, if it chose, reduce the number of Commissioners to two without the aid of a new Act of Parliament. The Court had existed for seven years, had given great satisfaction, and it was desirable that it should be continued. Owing to the want of judicial strength arrears had accrued, and now the hon. and learned Gentleman proposed to reduce the judicial strength of the Court. He (Mr. Fitzgerald) did not say that it was advisable to retain Mr. Baron Richards in the double capacity; but it was perfectly consistent with relieving that learned personage of the extra duties to continue the same number of Commissioners as there were at present.

MR. WHITESIDE said, that no answer had been given to the case he put, because the Commissioners were doing less than nothing.

SIR JAMES GRAHAM regretted that they had to discuss the question in the absence of the Report of the Committee. He regretted that the Bill was only a continuing Bill for one year. Why should it not be a continuing Bill for a longer period? It had been discussed in Committee, whether the power of the Court should not be extended to unencumbered property, but no decision had been come to. The Real Property Commissioners were considering the whole question, and he thought it would be advisable to continue the powers of the Court for at least two years, and till the end of the next Session of Parliament. They were about to give an appeal from the Court itself to an independent Court, which he thought was most desirable. He thought that by increasing the staff of the Court, two of the Judges would be able to clear off all the arrears of business. He did not think that an inferior officer should be appointed. He was of opinion that Baron Richards should return to the Exchequer Court and circuit, and they had the opinion of the other two Judges of the Court that they would be able to transact double the amount of business with an increased staff.

MR. J. D. FITZGERALD said, he expressed in the Committee the opinion that it was desirable that Baron Richards should return to his Court and his circuit, and he believed the Government were of the same opinion. But whilst that was his opinion, he wished to say that Baron Richards was called on to undertake the duties of Chief Commissioner of the Incumbered Estates Court at a time of great pressure, that he performed his duties with great ability, and he believed he had no personal desire, but the contrary, to continue a Judge of the Incumbered Estates Court. For his own part, he should have no objection to increase the term of this Act to two years. He had, in fact, limited it to one to meet the objections of many members of the Committee which sat upon this subject.

MR. NAPIER supported the Amendment.

MR. HENLEY said, that the evidence taken in the Committee proved that two Commissioners, with an adequate staff, would be sufficient to discharge all the duties of the Court, more especially as it had been relieved from its appellate business.

MR. VINCENT SCULLY trusted that, whatever arrangement was come to, no slight would be cast on Baron Richards.

MR. J. D. FITZGERALD, explained, in answer to Mr. Henley, that the Incumbered Estates Court would still have to exercise an appellate jurisdiction of considerable extent.

Motion made and Question put, "That the clause be now read a second time."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 48; Noes 83: Majority 35.

MR. WHITESIDE said, he should raise the same question on the third reading.

The House resumed.

THE CRIMEAN BOARD OF INQUIRY — REPORT OF THE COMMISSIONERS — QUESTION.

THE EARL OF LUCAN asked the Secretary of State for the War Department, when Her Majesty's Government would lay before Parliament the Report of the Chelsea Board of General Officers? He was aware that the Report had only been signed by the Commissioners on Friday last, and that it had first to be laid before Her Majesty for her approval; he was also aware that some little time must elapse before it could be laid upon their Lordships' table. Still, when he recollected that they were then in the middle of July, and that it was expected Parliament would be up in the course of another ten days or a fortnight, he did not think it unreasonable to expect of the Government that they would use all the despatch possible in considering this important paper, and presenting it to the House. He was sure he spoke the feelings of the House and of the country when he said that much disappointment would be experienced if the noble Lord were not prepared, at all events, to state some early day on which the Report would be ready to be presented to Parliament.

LORD PANMURE said, it was impossible for him to name any day on which he could undertake to lay the Report before Parliament. As the noble Earl had stated, it was signed only on Friday last, and he (Lord Panmure) knew from private information that it was at present in the hands of the Commander in Chief. He deeply regretted to say that he feared the sudden illness of that gallant officer might prevent the Report going to Her Majesty for some little time. After that the Report would for the first time be in the possession of the Government, and he quite agreed with the noble Earl that as soon as it was in the possession of the Government, and they had had an opportunity of forming an opinion upon it, they ought to lose no time in laying it before Parliament.

THE EARL OF LUCAN could not say that the answer of the noble Lord was a satisfactory one. What he wanted to know was, whether the Report had or had not been presented to Her Majesty?

LORD PANMURE: It has not.

THE EARL OF LUCAN: It is generally supposed that it was presented to Her Majesty yesterday.

LORD PANMURE: It has not been presented to Her Majesty, at least so I am informed.

THE EARL OF LUCAN said, I understand that it was presented to Her Majesty yesterday. But, be that as it might, I am not satisfied with the answer of the noble Lord, and will renew my question on Friday.

ADVOWSONS BILL.

THE EARL OF SHAFTESBURY moved the Second Reading of this Bill, which had passed through the Commons without opposition, and was intended to remove a great and growing evil. The immediate object of the Bill was to facilitate the sale of advowsons. As their Lordships were all aware, in many parts of this country advowsons were in the hands of large numbers of lay owners, and the presentations being generally by popular election scenes occurred which were very disgraceful. In fact, at these elections everything that was most scandalous to the Church, the good order, and the decencies of society, was perpetrated. He held in his hand a letter from Bilston, giving an account of the last election for a presentation that took place there. The election lasted five days, and 3,123 electors voted—every inhabitant, whether a householder or not, being entitled to vote. The letter stated that the cost to the unsuccessful candidate was about £1,600, and to the successful one about £5,000; that during the whole period of the election all the public-houses were open, and that drunkenness prevailed to a fearful extent. The writer added, that the whole thing was as bad as it could be, and that the moral effects remained for a very considerable time afterwards. This was but a repetition of a similar scene in 1813, and as the value of the living was increasing, at any future election a still more disgraceful scene, if such were possible, might be expected. Some time ago an election of this kind took place in Clerkenwell parish, in this metropolis; and so disgraceful, blasphemous, and indecent, were the expressions made use of by parties who took part in the proceedings, that he could not think of repeating them to their Lordships. All the indecent jokes and badinage that were uttered at elections for Members of Parliament, or any other public election where large masses were brought together, were exchanged amongst the crowd at these presentation elections; and surely such scenes on such occasions were in the last degree scandalous. The number of livings in this state of suffrage was about 150. The incomes attached to most of them were very small; in the majority of cases not reaching £150 a year. In 100 instances there were no parsonage houses. As the value of these livings was much too small to allow of a private Act of Parliament in each instance, it was now proposed to deal with the whole by a public Act. The Bill provided that the owners of these livings, or those in whom the right of election was vested, should meet and determine by a majority whether or not the advowson should be sold; that if sold, it should be absolutely vested in trustees for sale, and the money appropriated in paying the costs of sale, in providing a parsonage house where no such accommodation existed, or repairing the parsonage if dilapidated, in raising the value of the living to £150 a year, in providing for the maintenance of the fabric of the church, in the erection of schools, and increasing the amount of church accommodation in the parish.

The Earl of Lucan

Bill read 2^a, and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Thursday next.

INTESTATES' PERSONAL ESTATES BILL.

EARL FORTESCUE said, that the object of this Bill was to establish an uniform administration of the estates of intestates by abolishing the customs of York and of London, which in the provision for widows and in some other respects differed materially from the disposal of intestate property, under the statute of distributions, and often led to doubts and difficulties, especially the custom of London, extending as it did to all freemen, even honorary ones of the City, or of any of its Companies, though their residence and their property might be ever so remote from it. The Bill had passed the other House without opposition, and he believed was approved of by noble and learned Lords on both sides of this House.

Bill read 2^a, and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Thursday next.

THE SCUTARI MONUMENT.

THE EARL OF HARRINGTON, on rising to address some queries to Her Majesty's Government on this subject, remarked that the object of the monument was to commemorate the character of the British soldiers, their toils, their endurance, their sufferings, and their heroic deeds. To execute such a work the first sculptor of the day should have been selected. The gentleman actually chosen was Signor Marochetti, an artist of considerable talent, peculiarly famed for massive equestrian statues; in other branches respectable, but not like Mr. Gibson, and some others, holding a first place in art. As an architect, Signor Marochetti was not known to fame; but, indeed, it would be difficult, if not impossible, to find one person equally skilled in architecture and sculpture, as in the days of Michael Angelo, yet it would have required the skill of both those arts to produce a proper monument in the style of that which had been produced. There was nothing very remarkable about the Scutari monument; we had many in this country of the same description. It was very defective in its proportions, inasmuch as the pedestal was as high as the superstructure, whereas the base of Cleopatra's Needle was only one-third the height of the pillar itself. Many obelisks in England were superior to Signor Marochetti's Scutari monument, in point of taste, beauty, and design. One point about it was very remarkable—the four unfortunate weeping angels could not possibly stand; or if they did, they must be standing either upon their wings, which extend considerably below their feet, or in a flying position. The observation had been made with regard to the statue in the Parthenon—that if it had attempted to stand its head would have gone through the roof. Marochetti was in a similar state with regard to his four weeping angels. The sculptors of this country did not wish to disparage the talent and genius of Signor Marochetti, whom they all highly respected, but they complained that a system of favouritism had been adopted, and that equal justice had not been done to the sculptors and architects of this and other countries. Entertaining the same opinion, in justice to those sculptors and architects he would put the following questions to the Government:—1. By whose authority the Scutari Monument had been undertaken? 2. Who had selected Signor Marochetti to undertake the work? 3. From what fund the payment was to be made? 4. Why the work had not been subjected to public competition, so that the sculptors of England, France, Italy, and Germany, might have sent in models, and an obelisk have been produced that would have immortalised our warriors and the sculptor for ages to come.

LORD PANMURE, in reply to the questions of the noble Earl, said he might observe, in the first place, that the noble Earl had mis-stated the objects of the monument to be erected at Scutari. It was not a monument intended to commemorate the heroic achievements of our soldiers during the late war, but to be a tribute to the memory of the sailors, the soldiers, and the marines, who had sacrificed their lives in the defence of their country. It was a tribute offered by the nation to the memory of those men. With reference to the source from which the idea proceeded, he might say generally that it was undertaken by the Government in accordance with the public wish, that such a monument should be erected at Scutari, and that the money for the purpose had been voted by Parliament. As to the selection of the artist, if there were any fault in this respect, that responsibility rested with the Government. As to the question of competition in those matters, the noble Earl would permit him to observe that the sculptors and artists of this country were much divided in opinion as to the propriety of submitting the plans for public monuments to general competition, so much so, indeed, that in several cases many of our first artists had declined to offer plans for public buildings. The Government selected Baron Marochetti, as being famous for some colossal works he had already produced, and the work he had designed for the monument of Scutari had so far commended itself to public favour that he had not before heard the design condemned as the noble Earl had condemned it. Indeed, he thought that little fault could be found in it. So far as his own opinion went, he believed that the monument about to be erected at Scutari would be one of the finest the country had produced, and an honourable and handsome tribute by this nation to the memory of those brave men whom it was intended to commemorate. He thought that Baron Marochetti should not, at all events, be considered a foreign artist, for he had gained for himself a reputation in this country, and was looked upon more as an artist of this country than as a foreign artist. But even if he were viewed in the light of a foreign artist, the noble Earl could have no reason to complain of him, because it was his wish that the work should be competed for by the artists of England, Italy, France, and other countries. He (Lord Panmure) was quite certain that in Baron Marochetti's hands the work would be executed in a manner satisfactory to the country as well as creditable to the artist.

PUBLIC HEALTH BILL.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made and Question proposed, “that Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair.”

MR. KNIGHT, in moving as an Amendment that the House would upon that day three months resolve itself into the said Committee, said, that when the Public Health question was brought forward in 1848 it was considered to be virtually settled by the Bill of that year, and the present Bill, differing as it did so materially from that measure, was a breach of faith with the public. The Bill now before the House differed not only from the Bill of 1848, but also from that which was introduced in 1854. All the stringent clauses of the Act of 1848 were retained, while all the remedial clauses proposed by the Bill of 1854 were omitted. That was his first objection. His second objection was, that it repealed the 145th section of the present Act, which gave the public a right of appeal against the Board of Health; and his third objection was, that it doubled the amount of money allowed to be raised on mortgage of the property of the ratepayers wherever the Act was enforced. Now, that duplication, he contended, was unnecessary. The fact was, a great many of the towns where there were local Boards of Health had spent all the money they were empowered to raise under the Act of 1848, and yet the works were not completed. That had arisen in consequence of the engineers of the General Board of Health having been exclusively employed to make the estimates, the towns themselves not being allowed to employ their own men. Those towns had been assessed at the rate of 1-16th of the yearly value of the property; it was now proposed to subject them to another assessment to the same amount; making the rate 1-8th of the value, and that without giving them any voice at all in the matter. Now he therefore submitted that those parties should be heard before any such tax was imposed upon them. It was his belief that the repeal of the 145th clause would be most injurious. All reasonable protection ought to be afforded against large companies supplying water and gas; and the right of appeal which the 145th clause gave afforded that protection. Many of the local Boards formed themselves into those large companies, and they had the power to oppress the neighbouring districts, and it was only by the right of appeal that those districts had any check upon such local Boards. To show how that portion of the Bill would work, he would mention the case of the town of Luton, with a population of 10,000 or 12,000 inhabitants. It used to be drained by cesspools. There ran by the town the river Lea, which was from twenty to thirty feet wide, and capable of being used for all sorts of domestic purposes, and it was always full of fish. A Board of Health was established at Luton, and they immediately drained the town and emptied their sewers into that river, rendering it a most horrible nuisance. The river was turned into a filthy open sewer; the fish all died; the water was unwholesome for drinking purposes; the sheep that were washed in the river came out dirtier than they went in, and the bottom of the river was covered for full thirty inches deep with decomposed matter, having only fifteen inches in depth of water running over it. Nothing could be more disgusting, or more contrary to the rules laid down by the Board of Health themselves, who, in their Report on the use of impure water, had shown that cholera and other disease were greatly increased by persons drinking bad water. The people of Luton, by virtue of the 145th clause of the existing Act, took proceedings before the Vice Chancellor to obtain redress, when the local Board promised that the nuisance should be abated. It was very natural therefore that the Board of Health should wish to get rid of this the only security which the public had against them. Should the present Bill pass it would confirm every abuse which the people had so much struggled against. He should, therefore, press the Amendment of which he had given notice.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House will, upon this day three months, resolve itself into the said Committee," instead thereof.

MR. PALK said, that when the Government thought it their duty to bring forward a measure which interfered with property of every description—with property in land, in water, in canal shares, harbour shares, and with the administration of the local government of towns—they ought, at least, to bring it forward at a sufficiently early period to admit of the question receiving that due consideration which such important interests demanded. He was perfectly aware that hon. Gentlemen on the other (the Ministerial) side of the House had some very liberal notions of the rights of property which had never yet been acquiesced in by the House of Commons; and he trusted that, as long as the House of Commons existed, the rights of property would be maintained sacred, and that no interest would be suffered to be taken away in a morning sitting, at the close of the Session, by a Bill which professed to be one thing, but which in reality was of a totally different description. When the Government brought forward an amended Bill, purporting to contain certain saving clauses, they should be saving clauses, and not enabling clauses. It was a most unfair way, he considered, to attempt to obtain power by bringing in such clauses, pretending to be saving clauses, but which in reality gave to the President of the Board of Health a control and a jurisdiction over property which had never yet been conceded by that House. The question of the powers of the Board of Health had on various occasions been brought forward, but it had always met with one result—defeat—because it grasped at a despotism which the House of Commons, he trusted, never would sanction. As far as he was personally concerned, he thought it might be better not to reject the measure altogether, but to permit the Bill to go into Committee with the understanding that all the clauses which gave to the Board of Health powers which they did not at present possess—all the saving clauses which were in reality enabling clauses—should be omitted, and that the Board should be continued for a limited period. If the House did not take that step, great evils might arise and much injury be done to local interests.

MR. H. G. LANGTON said, he must confess that when he went into the Select Committee on the Bill he was greatly surprised at finding the most popular part of it withdrawn, and that clauses were introduced which had met with great opposition; but as the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Health had since withdrawn those clauses he should not oppose the Bill going into Committee. He had the honour to represent a very large population where the Public Health Bill was in operation (Bristol), and he thought it just to state that, under the management of the local Board, it had given general satisfaction.

MR. COWPER said, the hon. Gentleman who had moved the Amendment had gone at some length into particular clauses of the Bill, but as those clauses did not affect the principle of the Bill, he should not say more than that they formed part of the Bill submitted to the Select Committee, and that evidence had been heard both for and against them. Some of the clauses had been copied verbatim from the Bill which had been sanctioned by the Select Committee after every attention had been paid to local and private interests, and it was generally understood that those clauses were assented to by the canal and other companies. He apprehended the proposition of the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Knight) to be that the House should not consider any Amendments of the Act of 1848. He was exceedingly surprised that a Motion to that effect should come from such a quarter. If the hon. Gentleman were an admirer of the Act of 1848 he could understand it, but the singular fact was that the hon. Gentleman particularly objected to that Act. The hon. Gentleman appeared to say that, as the House could not adopt the Bill of last year, therefore they ought not to adopt any lesser Bill. The hon. Gentleman appeared to be reviving the cry which was very powerfully raised some years ago in reference to the Reform Bill; and he seemed to say that he would have "the Bill, the whole Bill, and nothing but the Bill." But such a cry, however useful it might have been when originally raised, was very inappropriate now, because there was no possibility of getting the whole Bill in the course of the present Session. Hon. Members must be well aware of the impossibility, at that late period of the Session, of attempting to discuss and carry a Bill containing between 200 and 300 clauses. Then came the question—would they have the instalment which he (Mr. Cowper) now proposed, or would they postpone the whole subject till next year? He had endeavoured, but in vain, to bring the whole subject under discussion at an earlier period of the Session; and he therefore thought the best way of dealing with the matter would be to propose a Bill that should contain clauses which would amend the Bill of 1848 in its practical details, and which the local Boards said prevented them from carrying on their work efficiently. There were many ambiguities in the law which it was desirable to get rid of. Alterations were also required respecting the power of purchasing land, the establishing of gasworks, and other such practical matters. He thought therefore that it would be better to make those Amendments in the law, and then proceed next year to deal with the other and more important branch of the subject, namely, those organic changes which were deemed necessary in the constitution of the Board of Health—such as the mode of voting, the qualification of electors, and other machinery connected with the more theoretical portion of the subject. He really thought that by thus separating the practical details from the theoretical part of the Bill he was advancing the object which the hon. Gentleman himself wished to accomplish. He was not aware that any part of the present Bill would give rise to any serious difficulty. But if any of the clauses should appear to require much discussion, he was perfectly willing to postpone the consideration of them to another year. He hoped the House would not shut the door altogether against the only Amendments of the Act of 1848 which he was now able to propose. There were 209 towns in which local Boards of Health existed. They were under local representative government, and they wished the Act under which they ministered to the health of the inhabitants to be amended.

MR. HENLEY said, it was his belief, that the Act of 1848 was not very popular, and had not been very successful. That Act was referred last year to a Select Committee. After much discussion that Committee produced a Bill, dealing with most of the difficulties proposed to be dealt with by the present Bill, and with many others besides. For some reason, best known to himself, the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Cowper) did not produce that Bill. He had given no reason why, except that it was more easy to take up a part of the subject than the whole. It would have been but fair on the part of the right hon. Gentleman, seeing that he had only taken a part of the Bill recommended by the Select Committee, if he had referred this limited Bill to another Committee, so that some reason might have been obtained why this small portion of the larger Bill should alone be submitted to the House. But the right hon. Gentleman said he wanted to clear up some doubtful points, make some Amendments, and supply some defects. But the right hon. Gentleman would not pretend to say that if the Bill now under consideration were allowed to pass there was the most remote chance, after the Board of Health should have obtained all the powers which the Bill would give them, of any of those grievances which the public now suffered under being attended to and redressed. That was the real question which was before the House. The right hon. Gentleman had got himself clear of light and water by withdrawing the clauses relating to the Water and Gas Companies; but that was, he supposed, because gas and water interests were somehow always represented in that House. The right hon. Gentleman, however, had treated very lightly the fact, that in different places the local Boards of Health had created intolerable public nuisances by draining towns into the small streams running through the country, and thereby killing the fish, poisoning the people, and ruining manufacturers. The great sanitary improvement of the country had resulted in a vast system of what was called pipe drainage. This vast system discharged all the filth of the towns somewhere. In the metropolis it was discharged into the Thames; and the Metropolitan Board of Works were now engaged in the undertaking of cleansing the Thames. There were clauses in the Act of 1848 which afforded some protection against this system; and the people were becoming awake to the evils with which they were threatened, and were prepared to say that the Board of Health should not poison the health of the neighbourhood by polluting their water. But by a very short clause in the Bill now before the House, it was proposed to do away with all power on the part of a Court of Law to interfere, and thus the owners of property would be left without any means of protection. That was a sample of what the right hon. Gentleman called an amendment of the law. It was an amendment of the law with a vengeance, but was it a just amendment? It was also proposed to extend the power of borrowing over fifty instead of thirty years, the only effects of which would be to produce extravagance in the expenditure of the money, because it would not have to be repaid for a very long time. Every grievance that had been complained of in the old Bill, and the jobbing that was carried on under it, were left totally untouched. He hoped that the valuable time of the House would not be wasted in a long discussion upon a measure that would be of no use when carried. Everybody knew that the object of the Bill was only to pass certain miserable clauses for the satisfaction of those parties who went roaming about the country putting their hands into the tax-payers' pockets, and creating work and expensive jobs for their own benefit. The Bill would give those parties double taxing power, and for that reason and because the measure was utterly useless, he should oppose its going into Committee.

MR. BAINES said, his right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Health, had consented to postpone any clauses to which objections of a serious nature were entertained; but there were portions of the Bill involving matters of great importance, as to which no doubt was entertained on either side, which it was desirable should be passed into a law. The first part of the Bill was to continue the General Board of Health. It was true that Board would exist to the 1st of July next, and to the end of the then next Session of Parliament; but his experience at the Poor Law Board convinced him that it was most important not to defer the renewal of an Act to the very last Session, because no one knew what would become of that Session. It might be cut short at the end of the next week after it met. That part of the Bill ought, therefore, to be passed. There were many other provisions also which would afford no matter for controversy in Committee.

MR. T. GREENE said, he would warn the House, that if it once allowed bit by bit legislation on the law in question, they would never have the law satisfactorily amended. There had not been the shadow of a reason assigned why the whole measure should not have been brought forward in the early part of the Session, so as to give the House sufficient time to consider all its provisions. If, however, the House confined itself to renewing the powers of the Board of Health for one Session he would not object to it.

MR. BARROW said, the House owed it to its own dignity to reject the Bill altogether. The Board of Health was limited in its duration by the Act of 1848. A Bill was brought in last year and submitted to a Select Committee. He (Mr. Barrow) had objected to certain clauses, which he was assured across the table should be abandoned. With the Bill which came from the Select Committee, however, it appeared the Government did not agree; and in the Bill laid on the table by the Government, the objectionable clauses which it had been promised should be abandoned were reintroduced into it. There was one clause, however, which was particularly objectionable, namely, that which gave to the temporary occupiers of property a right to tax the owners of that property for a period of fifty years, in a rate for the purposes of the Board of Health. The clause exempted the occupiers from payment. That clause, however, he was bound to say, was not in the amended Bill; but it showed the animus had been paid to local and private interests, and it was generally understood that those clauses were assented to by the canal and other companies. He apprehended the proposition of the hon. Gentleman (Mr. Knight) to be that the House should not consider any Amendments of the Act of 1848. He was exceedingly surprised that a Motion to that effect should come from such a quarter. If the hon. Gentleman were an admirer of the Act of 1848 he could understand it, but the singular fact was that the hon. Gentleman particularly objected to that Act. The hon. of the promoters of the measure; and under the circumstances he could not vote for the Bill going into Committee, because he wished to force the Government to reconsider the entire subject by next Session. He must also complain that the Bill was not introduced to the House at an earlier period, so as to bring it to a public discussion, and enable the public to become acquainted with its provisions.

MR. T. DUNCOMBE said, he was much of the same opinion as the hon. Gentleman who had just sat down. He could not give his vote for the Bill, even on the ground laid down by the hon. Member opposite (Mr. T. Greene)—namely, that the Board of Health would expire next year. The right hon. Member for Leeds (Mr. Baines) had endeavoured to alarm the House by representing that some dire calamity would befall the country if the Board of Health were altogether to expire. Before, however, the House or the country felt any alarm upon the subject it would be well to inquire what that Board had done, what it had cost the country, and what it proposed to do. During the present Session, he had moved for a Return, in order to ascertain what the Board was about. Since 1848 the Act was applied to nearly 300 towns during the five years for which that Act was passed. The Act was then renewed for another year, and to the end of the next Session of Parliament. In 1853 the Act was applied by order of the General Board of Health to six towns, and by order of the Privy Council to three towns, making together nine towns; in 1854 and 1855 the Act was applied by order of the Board to thirteen towns, and by order of the Privy Council to six towns, making altogether twenty-eight towns from 1853 up to the present year; and the expenses incurred amounted to £36,000, being a very pretty sum to be dealt with for those towns. It was now proposed to continue the Board for three years longer. The last Bill did not propose to renew the Board for more than two years, one of which had already expired. He did not know whether there was any Member present who was what was called an administrative reformer. He did not see the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck). That hon. and learned Member was going to reform the Administrative Reform Association itself, he ought, therefore, on such an occasion as the present, to be here. He is going to set us all to rights, not only in Leadenhall Street, but in New Palace Yard, at Somerset House, at the Admiralty, at the Horse Guards, and at Downing Street. But if the hon. and learned Gentleman would come down to this neighbourhood he would find in a corner of a street a little hole called the Board of Health, and where he would discover comfortably ensconced a near relation of the Prime Minister, a brother of a Cabinet Minister, and the relative of another Cabinet Minister—all very snug berths for Ministerial patronage to bestow. No wonder Ministers want to continue the Board of Health. The hon. Member for Lancaster (Mr. T. Greene) says, "Continue the Board for another Session." Why, he would undertake to say that before the discussion closed the right hon. Gentleman below him (Mr. Cowper) would jump at the proposition and be anxious to accept the boon for another year. But if the chairman of the Administrative Reform Association would just call in at the Board of Health he would find those three Gentlemen he had named sitting there, and if he were to ask them what they were about, and say to them—"You cost the country a great deal, and we have a right to ask you what you are about?" he was certain the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Hertford would reply—"That is the great difficulty. We have nothing to do; we want to know what we are to do, and how we are to humbug and delude Parliament, in order to get it to continue the Board. We have one plan in our head; we are going to adopt the cowpox throughout the country, and we mean to superintend it. We had also another plan, which we tried to accomplish; we proposed that the President of the Board of Health should be President of the new council of medical men." But that Bill has all of a sudden dropped; so that one of their supports is gone. But there is one more chance, and what, perhaps, the House will ask, is that? Why, the Home Department proposes to transfer the administration of the Burial Act to the Board of Health—a very pretty sequel! First, you superintend the general health of the people; next, you promote vaccination; then you would preside over the Medical Board; and then, when the curtain drops, you come to the Burial Board—the last shot you have. He was against all the powers which the Bill proposes to confer. Let the people do the work themselves. He should oppose the Board on any terms. It has got one year to live;

he hoped it would be its last, and that we should never hear of it again.

The House divided:—Ayes 61; Noes 73: Majority 12.

MR. COWPER said, as the decision had been adverse to him, he must fall back upon the suggestion made by the hon. Gentleman opposite, the Member for Lancaster, and he should therefore propose a continuance Bill for next year; his hon. Friend behind him (Mr. T. Duncombe) would then have the opportunity of again amusing the House with the proceedings of the Board of Health. He was himself much amused by the manner in which the hon. Gentleman stated the case, but he a little overstated it—for instance, a large portion of the money voted, was for the Medical Council. The only charge against the Board of Health was that they had a desire to do work, and that was not a heavy imputation.

THE COURT OF CHANCERY (IRELAND) (RECEIVERS) BILL.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

Clause 1.

MR. WHITESIDE said, he wished to propose that a limit should be put to the power of appointing a receiver by enacting that no receiver should be appointed where the debt did not exceed £150 a year.

MR. HENLEY said, the mischief and misery that had been worked in Ireland through the receiver system could hardly be exaggerated, and he did not think the Bill was of a nature to overcome those evils. He would suggest, however, that a limit should be fixed below which no receiver should be appointed, not only as to the amount of the debt, but as to the amount of the rental of the estate on which the receivership was appointed.

MR. J. D. FITZGERALD said, he was willing to adopt the right hon. Gentleman's suggestion.

MR. NAPIER said, he thought £150 was the lowest amount that could be adopted.

MR. WHITESIDE said, that in many cases receivers were appointed over an estate for a debt of £20, the costs incurred by such appointment being ten times that amount, while receivers were appointed in several instances also where the annual value of the estate was only £50. If the rental was limited to £100 a year, he (Mr. Whiteside) would accept the Amendment.

MR. M'MAHON said, that receivers had been the curse of Ireland, but the Amendment would compel the sale of estates, or of a portion of them, over which a receiver could not be appointed. The sooner the system of receivership was abolished, however, the better.

MR. DE VERE said, the receiver system in Ireland had been shown to be atrocious, and of benefit to no one but the receiver. The debtor lost his debt, the tenants lost their interests, and the owner lost his property by the deterioration of the land under that system. He was glad, therefore, to see the limitations proposed by the hon. and learned Member for Enniskillen, however indefensible on principle.

LORD NAAS said, he was very glad to hear that the House was going to place a limit upon the receiver system.

MR. HUGHES said, he thought that the limitation of the rental was more important than the limitation of the debt, and that in all cases where a petition for a receiver was presented, the Court ought, in order to prevent fraud and injury to creditors, to be satisfied that the property was applicable to the benefit of the party seeking the appointment. He should propose that the rental should be limited to £100 a year.

MR. J. D. FITZGERALD said, that he would adopt the sum of £150 of debt, but he thought the £150 rental was too high. Therefore he proposed to give the Court of Chancery a discretionary power to appoint a receiver without any limitation as to the amount of rental.

Amendment withdrawn.

Clause agreed to, as were the remaining clauses.

House resumed.

Bill reported, without amendment.

COURT OF APPEAL IN CHANCERY (IRELAND) BILL.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

Clauses 1 and 2 agreed to.

Clause 3.

MR. WHITESIDE said, he objected to the clause, all but that part of it which proposed the appointment of a new Judge. The ex-Chancellor Blackburne, one of the ablest men in Ireland, was receiving a pension of £4,000 a year, and he was doing nothing but amusing himself at the Privy Council. He (Mr. Whiteside) wished to obtain a pledge from the Government that this great lawyer should be the first Judge of the Court of Appeal, with his pension to count as a portion of his salary. He also objected to that portion of the clause which rendered the Judge of the Court removable at the pleasure of the Crown, thereby going back to the days of the Stuarts; and he objected likewise to the selection of Common Law Puisne Judges, which the clause proposed, to sit as Judges of Appeal in Chancery causes. Nor did he like the mode in which the salaries were proposed to be regulated, though it professed economy. The Judges were, in fact, to have £5,000 a year, the same salary proposed for the Deputy Speakers of the House of Lords. The Amendment he intended to propose was that, instead of confining the appointment of the other Judges of Appeal to the Puisne Judges of the Common Law Courts, the choice should be extended to the elder members of the Bar—say men of twenty years' standing.

MR. J. D. FITZGERALD said, that the clause had been framed in deference to the opinion of the majority of the Commission, to whom the subject had been referred. The clause had been printed last year, and had been introduced in the Report of the Commission of which ex-Chancellor Blackburne was one. Sir John Romilly and one of the Irish Chief Justices were also on that Commission; and he (Mr. FitzGerald) had adopted the recommendation on their authority, though it was rather contrary to his own opinion. Various propositions were brought before the Commission to create an Appeal Court from the Court of Chancery in Ireland: and it was pointed out that there were several Judges in Ireland from time to time available for the purpose of presiding over the Court. Ex-Chancellor Blackburne, however, was the party pointed at. But then it was suggested that that Judge might again be named Chancellor; and, therefore he, (Mr. FitzGerald) was cast back upon the Common Law bench and the Bar for a selection. The Commission had recommended the selection of the additional Judge from the Common Law department. The Judges were appointed during Her Majesty's pleasure, because the creation of the Court was an experiment, and it was not, therefore, known, how it would act. Besides, the Judges of the Court were only in the position of the Lord Chancellor in that respect who was removeable at Her Majesty's pleasure. He was, however, willing to adopt the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member for Enniskillen (Mr. Whiteside).

MR. HENLEY said, he did not understand that the Judges of the Common Law Court taken for the Appeal Court were still to remain Judges of the Common Law Court after their appointment to the Court of Appeal.

MR. NAPIER said, he thought the range of selection for Judges of the Court of Appeal should be perfectly free, and that any qualified person might be selected. It was like casting a stigma on the Bar to designate a particular person. There was no man who had a higher character than ex-Chancellor Blackburne; but the omission of the Judge of the Prerogative Court in Ireland from the Bill, though mentioned in a former Bill, showed that the wisdom of leaving the selection open was admitted by the Government.

MR. J. D. FITZGERALD said, he quite agreed with the modification suggested by the right hon. and learned Gentleman, and would adopt it in the Bill.

Clause amended agreed to, as were the remaining clauses.

House resumed.

Bill reported, as amended.

WEST INDIES GEOLOGICAL SURVEY— QUESTION.

MR. J. C. EWART said, he would beg to ask the right hon. Baronet the Secretary for the Colonies when the geological survey, now understood to be making, of the West India islands, would probably commence in Jamaica?

MR. LABOUCHERE said, in reply, that some time ago, on the application of the colonists, Government agreed to pay the salary of a scientific person to survey and ascertain the mineral resources of those colonies, on the understanding that the colonies were to pay all the other expenses of the survey, and that the colonies were to have the services of the surveyor in the order in which they applied for those services. Under that arrangement, an eminent scientific person had been appointed by Sir Roderick Murchison, at the request of the Government. The two islands which had made applications were Trinidad and Jamaica, and under the arrangement agreed to the survey of Trinidad had been commenced and was now in progress. He had given instructions that the survey should not be a complete one for scientific purposes, but only such a one as would ascertain in a general way the mineral resources of those islands, and therefore there was a hope that in a short time the survey of Jamaica would be commenced. If, however, the Government and Legislatures of that island were desirous of an immediate survey, the Government would have no objection to appoint another surveyor on the advice of Sir Roderick Murchison, but in that case the colony must pay both salary and expenses.

APPELLATE JURISDICTION BILL.

On the Motion that the House at its rising do adjourn till to-morrow, at Three o'clock, LORD JOHN RUSSELL said, he observed in the Orders of the Day the following:—"Appellate Jurisdiction (House of Lords).—Salaries and Retiring Pensions.—Committee thereupon." It was with great surprise that he had seen that notice placed on the Orders of the Day, after the discussion which had taken place on the subject the previous night, which had shown that a great portion of the House were opposed to the measure. He trusted that, although his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer had placed the Order on the paper, it was not his intention to proceed with a measure of which no notice had been given, and which it was impossible to discuss fairly under the circumstances.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, his noble Friend was aware that it was impossible to introduce a clause into a Bill coming from the Lords, to authorise the payment of salaries, unless there was a previous Resolution in Committee. That Resolution would not fix the amount of the salary, but merely give power to introduce a clause which would afterwards be discussed in a Committee of the House. He hoped, therefore, that no opposition would be offered to the Resolution.

MR. MONTAGU CHAMBERS said, he hoped that the House would not agree to the proposed Resolution, and was proceeding to discuss the question, when

MR. SPEAKER intimated that the hon. and learned Member could not make any observations upon the subject until the Order was before the House.

MR. DISRAELI said, he understood the Committee was to be taken on Thursday.

SIR GEORGE GREY: Precisely so; and it is to enable the House to go into Committee that we propose to take the Resolution to-night.

MR. CARDWELL said, he was apprehensive that if they went into Committee that night, they would bind themselves to the maximum salary to be paid.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he must beg to explain that the Resolution would only be a general one, and would not fix any specific amount.

NATIONAL GALLERY.

VISCOUNT DRUMLANRIG brought up the answer from The QUEEN to the Address of the House.

"I HAVE received your Address, praying that a Royal Commission may issue, to determine the Site of the new National Gallery, and to report on the desirableness of combining with it the Fine Art and Archæological Collections of the British Museum:

"AND, having taken the subject into consideration, I have directed that a Commission shall issue for the purposes which you have requested."

Motion for the adjournment of the House at its rising agreed to.

NAVAL OFFICERS.

CAPTAIN SCOBELL said, in submitting the Motion of which he had given notice relative to the disadvantageous position of certain officers in the navy, he should be very glad if the Admiralty would take the matter out of his hands, and save him the trouble of laying it before the House, for none could be more deserving of their consideration than the officers whose cause he was about to plead. He considered that the case of these meritorious men was a peculiarly hard one, and he hoped before he sat down to convince the House that it was one which demanded immediate redress. They were about to do honour to-morrow to brave men who had fought the battles of their country for two years, but the men whose case he wished to bring before the House had fought through a twenty years' war. All of those persons had been wounded several times—some had lost legs, some arms, and others the sight of their eyes. He would not indulge in any declamation on the subject, but confine himself to the facts, and he trusted, if any official reply was made to him, that the Government would do the same, and show that there were good and substantial reasons for refusing the request made by those officers who claimed, and he thought justly claimed, to be placed in the same position as the governor, lieutenant-governor, and chaplains of the hospital, and to receive their half-pay in addition to their residence in the hospital. It might be taken as a general rule that none but poor men would take the benefit of Greenwich Hospital. Many of them had large families, too, and it was a great consideration to them to get a residence free. They had to pay rates and taxes, however, and they had duties to perform which put them to a certain amount of expense in uniforms and the like. Those officers, eighteen in number, addressed a memorial to the Admiralty, praying for their half-pay, in the middle of last year, and to that the Admiralty replied that they had no power to grant their request. There appeared at that time to be some idea at the Admiralty that there was an Order in Council which did not allow of half-pay being given to these officers; but that was found to be a mistake. The officers memorialised again in January, and then the answer given was that it was not deemed advisable to comply with their prayer. Acting on his (Captain Scobell's) advice they memorialised again about six weeks ago, that time through their Governor, who himself backed their request by a letter to the Admiralty. To this memorial they received a very cold reply, to the effect that the Admiralty "could not comply with their request." Every step for securing justice had been taken in vain, and they now came to that House as a final Court of Appeal. The Governor and Lieutenant-governor had, as he had previously stated, their half-pay in addition to residences and large salaries. The chaplains had also their half-pay in addition to their salaries. The officers not receiving half-pay had been in active service from forty to sixty years, when the pay was less by fifty per cent. than it was now, and it was exceedingly hard that having, simply for the advantage of a residence in the hospital, given up their chances of promotion, that such an exceptional mode of dealing should be applied to them. He would read some documents which bore on the case of these officers. He would not, however, read the memorial of the officers, though some parts were very strong, and it was signed by the eighteen officers who conceived they were the subjects of the hardships complained of. According to a return, moved for by Mr. Hume, in 1854, the Governor of Greenwich Hospital got £2,266, including half-pay, and the Lieutenant Governor, £1,256 a year, including half-pay. The captains, including all emoluments, got £456; the commanders, £353; the eight lieutenants, £275; the masters, £245; but the two chaplains, who had not served for fifty or sixty years, and had not been wounded and so cut to pieces, £500 each; and the surgeon £650. If those arrangements had been intentional they would have been most disgraceful, but he believed that no such bad intention existed. The officers at Greenwich both above and below these had their half-pay, and it was but fair that these officers should be put on an equal footing with their superiors and inferiors. He had in his hand an account showing the services of each of these men. Of the four captains one was eighty-four years of age, and had served sixty-seven years; another, seventy-one years of age, had served fifty-eight years; another, seventy-two years of age, had served fifty-eight years; and the last and youngest, fifty-eight years of age, had served forty-seven years. The result of the account was that the eighteen men had, in the aggregate, served 1,000, or an average of fifty-five years each. They had among them forty-two wounds, including losses of legs, arms, and eyes; and had received thirty medals and clasps. The average period during which they enjoyed the scanty advantages of Greenwich was but nine years. In some cases men had died so poor that their widows had not been able to administer to their wills, or subscriptions had to be raised for the payment of debts which they had contracted in order to furnish their humble dwellings. They were all men with families, having children to educate; and they had not the means of showing to each other the common courtesies of life. Now, if the First Lord of the Admiralty doubted that statement, let him go and dine with one of them, and judge for himself. The sum which would be required to give those men their half-pay was not so much as the salary of the First Lord of the Admiralty. The right hon. Baronet (Sir C. Wood) may be an excellent First Lord, but he (Captain Scobell) did not see why thousands should be lavished on those who did duty at Whitehall, while those who had done their duty and had still to discharge duties at Greenwich were neglected. If it should be said that those gentlemen, when they went to Greenwich, knew what their emoluments would be, he would reply that during the time that the present First Lord of the Admiralty was President of the Board of Control, his salary was increased by about £1,000 a year. The memorial of these officers having been referred to the Commissioners of Greenwich Hospital, they said, in a letter to the Admiralty, that as the funds of the hospital were not affected, they had no opinion to offer, but stated, at the same time, their conviction of the justice of the claim and also of the value of the boon to the memorialists. The Lieutenant Governor had also written a letter in which he recommended that this small addition should be made to the pittance of these officers. Last year his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Christchurch (Admiral Walcott) brought forward the case of Captain Dickinson. That officer came up to him (Captain Scobell) in the lobby, and said that if the House refused his request it would be the death of him. The Motion was lost by a minority of one, and within a month the gallant captain was dead. There were civil service clerks, some of them connected with the Admiralty, who had £700, £800, or £1,000, a year retirement. What business had they to have more than these old men? Was that the way in which warriors—in which men who had fought and bled for their country, were to be treated? Many public situations were held by naval officers who received half-pay. It was received by Lords of the Admiralty being naval captains, by the Controller of the coastguard, by the Deputy Controller, by the Usher of the Black Rod, by the two Commissioners of Greenwich Hospital, by the captains, commanders, and masters serving under the Colonial Land and Emigration Commissioners, by the naval officers serving under the Board of Trade, and by those employed in the Customs. Captain Drew, the storekeeper at the Cape of Good Hope also obtained half-pay. Yet none of those gentlemen had nearly so strong a claim as the class of officers whose cause he was advocating. Their case was one of such hardship that he entreated the noble Lord at the head of a Government which called itself "Liberal" to do justice to these aged and meritorious officers. Coming next to the old commanders and lieutenants in the navy, their position was certainly a most extraordinary one. He had in his hand a list of retired captains numbering 100, to whom had been lately added about 144 more. Before being placed on that list they all received 10s. per day, and now 10s. 6d. was given to them. The first 100 of these officers, none of whom had served less than fifty years, were clearly entitled to rank with colonels in the army, each of whom received 14s. 6d. per day if in the infantry, and 15s. 6d. if in the cavalry. He would ask why was there that disparity of remuneration in favour of the army and against the navy? The fact was that the former service was more effectually represented in Parliament, and if such a grievance as he was describing existed in the army it would be rung in the ears of the House—and very properly so—until it was redressed. But, happening in the navy, the thing was not exposed; although it could not be supposed that the country begrudged fair and equal remuneration to the officers of both services, rank for rank. But what he had stated was not all. By the warrant of last year £60,000 per annum was apportioned among officers of the army to induce them to retire on full pay; while not a single man in the navy could retire on full pay. It was manifest, then, that the naval officers were grievously oppressed. The old commanders were in this position:—there were 551 on the active list, and of these 342 efficient men were unemployed. There were ninety-seven reserve commanders, who had all served upwards of forty years and been decorated with medals, now receiving 7s. per day—an allowance far below that paid to a major in the army, of corresponding rank. 100 retired commanders only received 8s. 6d. per day, being 2s. 6d. less than a major; while another list of retired commanders, 246 in number, only obtained 7s. The old naval lieutenants were not better off—indeed, the lower they descended in rank the greater they would find the hardship. Only thirteen out of between 600 and 700 retired lieutenants got 7s.; 150 of them got 6s.; and the remainder, though many had been wounded, and wore several medals on their breasts, got but 5s. That was the reward given to men who had bona fide the same rank as captains of marines and captains in the army, whose allowance was 7*s.* per day. He had calculated the service of twenty modern lieutenants, with such names as Rowley, Balfour, and the like, and found that when put together it only amounted to seventy-four years; while the service of the same number of old officers of corresponding rank amounted in the aggregate to 700 years. The latter twenty bore such plebeian names as Smith, Thompson, White, and Johnson, and were men who, of course, never got on, but were left half-starving. The twenty men who had been so rapidly advanced had only three medals among them; while the men who had been kept back had almost all medals a piece. Now, that was an illustration of the treatment received by the navy; and if the House, now that it had been made acquainted with the system pursued, did not see that it was speedily amended, it would be responsible for all the oppression which that system inflicted. The question was one wholly unconnected with party considerations, and might be impartially and dispassionately dealt with. If his Motion were not favourably entertained by the First Lord of the Admiralty, he should feel it his duty to divide the House. It was not enough for him to expose the injustice done to deserving officers; he must take the opinion of the House whether that injustice should be suffered to continue. He was actuated by no personal feeling, although his own name was on one of the lists. He had been kept on half-pay much against his own wish, and although he had used every exertion in his power to get afloat, he had not sufficient interest to accomplish his object. If he had had nothing to depend upon but the pittance he received as half-pay, he could not have worn a gentleman's coat on his back. He now committed the case of these old neglected officers to the decision of the House of Commons. The hon. and gallant Officer concluded by moving that the disadvantageous position of the captains, commanders, lieutenants, and masters of the Royal Hospital at Greenwich, and other officers of Her Majesty's navy, is worthy of the early and favourable consideration of the Board of Admiralty.

SIR GEORGE PECHÉLL, in seconding the Motion, said, that his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Bath had made an appeal to the First Lord of the Admiralty on behalf of the officers to whose case he had called attention; but the person upon whose heart it was necessary to produce an impression was the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who exercised control not only over the Board of Admiralty, but over all other boards. He (Sir G. Pechell) might remind the House that, although officers who were placed in the Royal Hospital at Greenwich, as a reward for their services, were deprived of half-pay, officers who held civil appointments were allowed to receive half-pay. For a series of years the naval Lords of the Admiralty, whose salaries were £1,000 a year, did not receive half-pay; but a very cunning and clever Secretary to the Admiralty found out an Act of Parliament, under the provisions of which the Lords of the Admiralty might receive their half-pay; and it was speedily arranged that they should not only enjoy half-pay for the future, but that they should receive the back-pay of which they had been deprived. He hoped the case of the officers to whom his hon. and gallant Friend's Motion referred would be taken into consideration by the Government. He (Sir G. Pechell) had brought the subject under the notice of the House on several occasions some years ago, and he had suggested that the amount received for the conveyance of bullion in Her Majesty's ships from South American ports, amounting to some £50,000, or £60,000, or £70,000 a year, might be applied to meet the claims of those officers; but he could never induce the First Lord of the Admiralty to turn his attention to the matter.

Motion made, and Question proposed—

"That, in the opinion of this House, the disadvantageous position of the Captains, Commanders, Lieutenants, and Masters, of the Royal Hospital at Greenwich, and of the Retired Captains under the Orders in Council of 1840, 1851, and 1856, and of the senior Commanders and Lieutenants of Her Majesty's Navy, is worthy of the early and favourable consideration of the Board of Admiralty."

ADMIRAL WALCOTT said, he had thought it his duty, when the gallant officer (Captain Scobell) placed his Motion on the paper, to go to Greenwich Hospital for the purpose of procuring the best information in his power on the subject. He then addressed himself to the Governor, Sir James Gordon, one of the most distinguished Admirals in the service, who, with a singleness of mind and sincerity of heart and purpose that did him the highest honour (characteristics which had endorsed him to his profession), freely communicated to him his own sentiments, and made him acquainted, as far as lay in his power, with all that he desired to know. In making one or two observations, he should set out with stating that the officers of Greenwich Hospital were paid out of the funds of the hospital, and received nothing from the Government; that in the year 1812 the salaries of the officers were arranged by the authorities of the hospital, and from that year up to 1829 the half-pay of those officers was paid into the Exchequer, the nomination of those officers being in the same year transferred from the hospital to the Admiralty. From that time to this he (Admiral Walcott) could gain no information as to what had become of this half-pay; but this much was certain, that it was not received by those officers. He contended that half-pay was given for good and meritorious services performed, and not in anticipation of future services, provided only, if called upon, officers were capable of service; in this case these officers were deterred from ever entering on actual service by an Order in Council of January, 1856, and therefore the Admiralty was not justified in withholding from them the half-pay to which they were justly entitled. The Governor of Greenwich Hospital told him that these officers obtained their nomination at a very advanced period of life for wounds received, or for gallant service. They had a house given them, but no furniture, and in order to furnish it they were generally obliged to go to their agents and borrow money. If they did not live sufficiently long to repay the agents, the consequence was, the furniture was sold, and their families left in a state of great distress. Because the funds of the hospital provided the salaries of the officers of the department, the existence of such a fund should not be considered a bar to their half-pay. On what plea did the Governor and Lieutenant Governor of the hospital receive their half-pay, when, as the Governor himself told him, they had no claim to it which those officers did not possess? It must not be supposed they had no duties to perform, as they were placed over some hundreds of old men, who require a great deal of care and attention. He would not go into any invidious comparisons of the difference of pay received by officers in the two services; but he would remind the House that the surest evidence of the decline of a nation was its neglect of those who had fought its battles in the hour of need, who with the promptitude of youth devoted their lives to the service of their country, and redeemed that pledge by the gallantry of manhood; to them assuredly is due all becoming testimony, and which ought to be dealt out in a free spirit and with an ungrudging hand; but if those in power will permit meritorious services to pass unrewarded, and favour to rule dominant in the bestowal of honours, promotions, and employment, then those who have a voice there will lift it against the decision of unreasoning judgment, for fear the absence of a decoration should be considered the credential of honour, and the insignia of distinction become the by-word of the brave. He earnestly implored the First Lord of the Admiralty to take the Motion of the hon. and gallant officer opposite into his favourable consideration, and he would only add that no circumstance of his life would give him more gratification than that he had raised his voice in the House of Commons in the support of the claims of those poor and meritorious officers.

SIR CHARLES WOOD said, he did not know whether it was owing to any change which had taken place in the constitution of Parliament, but when he first knew the House of Commons it exercised very considerable influence in checking the disposition of Governments to what was deemed unnecessary expenditure. That course, however, was now very much reversed, and in order to prevent an increase of expenditure, the Government felt themselves obliged to check Motions made in the House, from time to time, in favour of the claims of particular classes of officers or other public servants, and those often made entirely without reference to claims of others. The hon. and gallant Member for Bath, who introduced the subject, stated that officers of the navy of the same rank with those in the army did not receive the same amount of half-pay, but the hon. and gallant Gentleman apparently forgot that the officers of the army purchased their commissions, and that a great part of their half-pay must be regarded in the light of interest on the purchase-money of those commissions. It would doubtless be remembered that on one occasion an hon. Gentleman brought forward the case of the officers of marines as one of great hardship. He (Sir C. Wood) represented at the time that they were really better paid than the officers of the navy of corresponding rank, but the House was of a different opinion, and it was carried that every officer of marines ought to have a higher rate of pay; and now his hon. and gallant Friend (Captain Scobell) brought forward the hardship of the case of the navy officers as compared with the marines in their turn. In this way the House of Commons was every now and then taking up individual cases, one at a time, without taking a general view of the different branches of the service. With regard to the first class of officers whose case his hon. and gallant Friend had brought before the House, the captains and commanders of Greenwich Hospital, he could only say that he was quite disposed to agree in the well-merited eulogium which had been paid them. The Governor of that hospital was one of the most distinguished officers in the service) and had suffered much in the discharge of his duty to his country) and the Lieutenant Governor and other officers had served with great distinction. Sir James Gordon had received one of the few prizes in the naval service, and he should be sorry to see his emoluments reduced. But the hon. and gallant Member had forgotten the difference between the pay of active service and the retirement allowance for past service. The chaplains and surgeons of Greenwich Hospital were actively employed in the duties of their profession. The surgeon was not appointed for his past services, but for his surgical skill, and it was not quite fair, therefore, to compare the salaries and emoluments given to such officers of Greenwich Hospital with the pay for past services. The surgeon might not have been wounded or shed his blood in defence of his country, but he was paid for performing active surgical duty in the hospital. With regard to the naval Lords of the Admiralty, an Act of Parliament was passed twenty-four years ago regulating their salaries. It was then considered that the salaries they received as Lords of the Admiralty were low in proportion to their duties and position, and it was provided that they should receive their half-pay in addition to that salary. His hon. and gallant Friend appeared to be labouring under some misapprehension with regard to the amount received by some of the officers to whom he had referred. When he (Sir C. Wood) was told that those appointments were not worth having, he did not find that that was the view taken of them by the naval profession, by whom they were considered not at all bad places, and who were most anxious to obtain them. The hon. and gallant officer said that the officers of Greenwich Hospital were inadequately remunerated. Their duties, however, were of a light character, and if the hon. and gallant Member compared their half-pay and allowances with the half-pay of officers of much higher rank, he would find that they were not so inadequately remunerated as he seemed to think. The half-pay of a vice admiral was £593 a year. The captains in Greenwich Hospital were found in apartments. It was difficult to estimate the value of the apartments, but one of the captains was not provided with apartments, and he received £2 12s. 6d. per week in lieu thereof. Putting that estimate, then, upon the value of the apartments, the emoluments of the captains in Greenwich Hospital were £595 per annum, being £2 more than the half-pay of a vice-admiral, an officer of much higher grade in the service. He therefore could not honestly say that he thought that a very inadequate payment for a naval officer of the rank of captain. The half-pay of a rear-admiral was £456 a year. The allowance of a commander of Greenwich Hospital might be estimated at £492, being £36 more than the half-pay of a rear-admiral. The lieutenants of Greenwich Hospital received an allowance of £417, taking apartments into account, which was more than the half-pay of a captain, which was only £365 a year. He could not say, therefore, that such a retired allowance was insufficient for officers of their rank. His hon. and gallant Friend had complained of a letter in which the Admiralty stated that it was not in their power to give these officers half-pay in addition to their allowances. That was quite true, because the Admiralty could not give them half-pay without the sanction of the Treasury. When the Admiralty were again applied to they replied, "We cannot do it." He saw nothing discourteous in that reply, which was simply true. In considering the question the House were bound to regard it in relation to the general question of allowing half-pay to be received with other emoluments derived from the public. The hon. and gallant Member for Christchurch (Admiral Walcott) had declared that half-pay was a reward for past services, and not a retainer for future services, [Admiral WALCOTT: It is a retainer, I admit.] Then it was not simply a reward for past services, as the hon. and gallant Admiral seemed to think. [Admiral WALCOTT: That is still my belief.] He could assure the hon. and gallant

Admiral that he was quite mistaken; it was both a reward for past and a retainer for future services. It was in the power of the Treasury to allow half-pay, with other emoluments; but it was generally withheld when other emoluments of considerable amount were enjoyed. Considering the amount which the officers of Greenwich Hospital received one way or the other, he did not think the decision not to allow them half-pay so exceedingly hard, and if they were allowed it, a large class of officers in the country, who were receiving other emoluments, would also press their claims upon the Government. With regard to the old commanders and lieutenants, Government had, in the course of the present year, asked for an increased Vote of £11,000 a year, for the purpose of making additions to their half-pay. A considerable number of commanders had been given the rank of captains, with the lowest half-pay of captains; those who had not obtained that advantage would become entitled to it by seniority, as vacancies occurred; and on looking through the list, he could not see any great number not included in that number, who had any strong claims on the score of service. With regard to the old lieutenants, he could only repeat what he had said on a former occasion. Promotions were made largely in the years 1814, 1815, and 1816, and from the reduction of force consequent on the peace and it was perfectly impossible that any great number could afterwards be employed. The consequence was, that very few had seen much sea-service. Many of them had received half-pay for forty years; they now received a higher rate of half-pay, and a number had been promoted, the number of commanders having last year been increased. He quite agreed with his hon. and gallant Friend the Member for Bath, that it was unjust not to reward officers who had devoted themselves to the service of the country, and he did not believe Parliament would begrudge the application of public money to officers who had distinguished themselves; but he must say that a great number of lieutenants who had served in the late war had seen far longer sea-service than many of the old lieutenants, and there was no reason, in his opinion, why the House should vote a larger sum to the latter officers. He believed he had now replied to all the points touched upon by his hon. and gallant Friend, and he trusted that he had satisfactorily explained to the House why he thought there was no ground for giving still larger boons than had already been extended to those officers.

SIR CHARLES NAPIER said, he was sorry that the First Lord of the Admiralty had mixed up the captains' claims with those of the commanders and lieutenants. He quite agreed that a great deal had been done for the commanders and lieutenants, but he thought the officers of Greenwich Hospital were not treated with the liberality which the Admiralty ought to exhibit. The naval Lords of the Admiralty received half-pay, in addition to their salary; and if the united amount of salary and half-pay was only proper remuneration for the naval Lords, he should like to know how it was that the lay Lords did not receive £600 or £700 a year additional salary, to make their remuneration equal? All the members of the Board of Admiralty were in the same boat, and they ought not to make fish of one and flesh of the other. He did not think the comparison between Greenwich captains and vice-admirals a fair one, because the vice-admiral and the rear-admiral were both on the active list, while the Greenwich captains had totally retired from the service. The Greenwich captains could get no further, and whether provisions were dearer or cheaper their pay was exactly the same. They were in a most pitiable condition. They had formerly been forced to live, perhaps, in a small cottage in the country. They came up to Greenwich to good and large apartments. They were obliged to borrow money of their agents to fit out the apartments, and when they were removed by the hand of Providence their widows and families were left in a very precarious position. That was the case of nine out of ten of all the Greenwich officers, and he could not understand why they should not receive the same advantage as other naval officers holding different situations in the country. For instance, the Usher of the Black Rod received a large salary, and he also received his half-pay. He considered that the Board of Admiralty had behaved well in giving to wounded officers appointments to Greenwich Hospital, but at the same time he did not think those appointments were sufficient rewards. While the Governor, the Lieutenant Governor, and the Commissioners of Greenwich Hospital enjoyed their half-pay, he (Sir C. Napier) could see no reason for a distinction between them and the officers of lower grade, except, perhaps, that the higher officers had more influence and interest. The House had perceived the justice of representations made of the case of Sir James Gordon, whose salary as Governor was only equal to his pension and half-pay, leaving his house as the only benefit he derived from his appointment in Greenwich Hospital. In that case the First Lord of the Admiralty had no difficulty in persuading the Treasury to allow the increased emoluments, and it was to be hoped, after the discussion of that evening, the present First Lord would see the propriety of allowing the junior officers of the hospital to receive their half-pay.

MR. MONTAGU CHAMBERS said, he should be extremely sorry that a question relating to the English navy, of which they were all so naturally proud, should be summarily disposed of. He considered, in point of fact, that the entire of the money which was devoted to the pay of the officers connected with Greenwich Hospital was not voted by the country, but was defrayed out of private funds belonging to the institution itself. That being the case, he should wish to know if the nation was entitled to save the half-pay of those officers, for such, he contended, would be the result of refusing to grant them that half-pay, upon the ground that they received emoluments from other sources.

CAPTAIN SCOBELL, in reply, said, he was ashamed of the cold and callous feeling exhibited by the First Lord of the Admiralty for the position of those gallant officers. He (Captain Scobell) must declare that he would rather be what he was—an humble captain in the service—than the First Lord of the Admiralty with such opinions. The fact was, as the right hon. Gentleman knew, that the sweets of the service were given to political and family favourites, and that coldness, neglect, and insult were the only portion of the class on whose behalf the Motion had been made.

SIR MAURICE BERKELEY said, that the hon. and gallant Gentleman was not justified in saying that his right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty had treated the case of those officers with coldness. His right hon. Friend was as anxious as any other man to see naval officers properly rewarded, and to give them an increase of income in their old age; but he had a public duty to perform, and that public duty obliged him to look at the subject, not in an isolated point of view, but as a whole. It was not correct to say that those situations were not coveted, because there always were several applications for each one that became vacant. The present Governor and Lieutenant Governor were gentlemen who had risen by merit alone, and were not indebted for their position to those adventitious circumstances to which the hon. and gallant officer referred. He would again repeat, that he was just as anxious as any Member in the House for the good of the navy, but he must say that he did not think that the present claim was well founded.

Question put.

LIEUTENANT COLONELS IN THE ARMY.

COLONEL LINDSAY said, he rose to move that an humble Address be presented to her Majesty, praying that she would be graciously pleased to take into consideration the injury inflicted on those lieutenant colonels of the army who attained that rank before the 20th day of June, 1854, and who had been superseded by the retrospective action of the warrant of the 6th day of October, 1854. Previous to the warrant of the 6th of October, the principal if not the sole object was to obtain the rank of lieutenant colonel, from which all the higher ranks in the army sprang. Up to that rank all the grades of the army were purchasable, but beyond that they were obtained by brevet. The peculiar feature of the old system was this, that once an officer became lieutenant colonel, from that no officer could pass over his head to the higher ranks unless for the special cases of distinguished services or aide-de-camp to the Queen.

CIVIL SERVICE.

VISCOUNT GODERICH said, he would now beg to move that the House resolve itself into Committee on this subject.

Order for Committee thereupon read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair."

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that previous to the right hon. Gentleman leaving the chair, he wished to give such an explanation in reference to the question as might possibly induce his noble Friend not to proceed with his Motion for going into Committee. It would be in the recollection of the House, that at an early period of the Session his noble Friend moved a Resolution with the view of making more general the examination by open competition for admission into the civil service. A discussion took place, followed by a division, after which the question had been postponed until the present time. Since that discussion took place the system then in force had continued in operation, and a considerable additional number of examinations and appointments had taken place. He would state to the House the number of examinations and appointments since the existing system was introduced in May, 1855, up to the 30th of June in the present year. The number of candidates nominated was 2,390, and of these 1,055 were examined in London, and 693 in the provinces, making a total of 1,748 persons examined. Certificates were granted to 564 persons on the London examinations, to 445 persons on the provincial examinations, and to sixty one persons on the reports of heads of departments, making a total of 1,070 persons to whom certificates were granted. The number of certificates refused on the London examinations was 318, and on the provincial 238; making a total of 556 certificates refused against 1,070 granted. Therefore the result was as nearly as possible that two persons succeeded in obtaining certificates to one who failed. That had been the practical result of the existing system up to the present time, and the House would see that it had the effect of separating the worthy from the unworthy candidates. His noble Friend proposed to carry to a still greater extent the system of open examinations, so that whenever a vacancy occurred in a public office any persons might offer themselves as candidates without any qualification beyond that which appeared on the examination, and if they happened to be the best they should be accepted. The plan at present adopted in reference to the superior departments of the Government, such as those of the Secretaries of State and the Treasury, was that, whenever a vacancy occurred, several candidates were selected by the head of the department and subjected to competitive examination to determine who was the fittest person to fill the vacancy. Now, the head of a department, though holding office by the precarious tenure of political power, therefore being only temporarily in his department, yet always had a strong interest in obtaining efficient servants for the conduct of the affairs of the department. He was, moreover, surrounded by permanent officers, who, by their advice, confirmed him in that feeling. Any gentleman acquainted with the spirit which now animated the heads of the public departments would be satisfied that, in reference to the appointment to vacancies, it would be the study of those heads to present such a number of candidates as would enable the Civil Service Commissioners to select persons fully adequate to discharge the duties they would be called on to perform. The House, therefore, would see that the system now introduced offered satisfactory securities for proper appointments. He would now take the case of those civil servants who performed functions the least responsible and important. There is a numerous body of these persons in the Customs, the Coast, the Excise, and the Post Office. The House would understand that any system of competitive literary examination was wholly unsuited to civil servants of that class. To discharge the duties of a tidewaiter, who had watch on the deck of a vessel and prevent smuggling, a man of sobriety and honesty was required, and it would be absurd for Government to require any superior qualifications. Let the House consider the ease of a letter-carrier in the country. The wages of that officer, if engaged every day, amounted to 12s. or 14s. a week; and, if engaged for only three days out of the seven, his wages were not more than 6s. a week. Now, anything of an extensive competitive examination in respect to such a class of persons, with questions proposed by examiners, would have an air of ridicule attached to it, and the House must admit that such a system was not applicable to them. There was, besides, an intermediate class, and he very willingly admitted that the principle advocated by his noble Friend had great recommendations in respect to that class, comprising, as it did, many persons in the superior branch of the Revenue Department and clerks nominated by the Treasury. With respect to the Secretary to the Treasury, that officer, not being the head of the department for which his nominations were made, was not interested to the same extent as the head would be in obtaining efficient servants. Therefore that class of appointments required some additional security to that which now existed. Having communicated with the Civil Service Commissioners (Sir Edward Ryan and Mr. Shaw Lefevre), who were most excellent public officers, he could state that the result of their experience was that examination by competition, where the number examined was not considerable, did, on the whole, produce more satisfactory effects than any other kind of examination, and the candidates were more efficient in the performance of their duties. Their experience, however, was in favour of the gradual and cautious extension of the principle of appointments by competitive examination. The question, then, was by what means, and in what form, that principle should be extended? The House must see that there was a difficulty in laying down any universal rule, which would operate so that all candidates for office in the public service should be brought up to London in order to undergo a competitive examination. If the examination was merely for the purpose of ascertaining that the candidate possessed a certain prescribed set of qualifications—that he had attained a certain standard, that examination could be conducted in any part of the United Kingdom by proper arrangements. But if every appointment was to be made on the principle of competition, it would be necessary to bring every candidate to one place. They could not conduct an examination by competition in different places any more than they could have a race of different horses without bringing them all to one spot. Supposing that the three capitals—London, Edinburgh, and Dublin—were selected as the places for examination, a great advantage would thereby be given to persons living in or near those cities, but a person resident in Wales or Cornwall might not be willing to incur the expense of a long journey on the uncertainty of the result of the examination in his case. The consequence would be, that under such a system, a sort of monopoly would be given to persons residing in the vicinity of the three capitals. Therefore there was considerable practical difficulty in the way of laying down any universal imperative regulations on the subject. He thought that means might be found for having examinations in different parts of the country, and for affording facilities for candidates to come forward; but he did not think it would be fair immediately to lay down any such universal regulation as would impose on all candidates for public office the necessity of coming up to any one particular place. He quite admitted, however, that experience was in favour of the principle recommended by his noble Friend, and it would be the study of the Government, by gradual means, by feeling their way as they advanced, by avoiding those difficulties the existence of which experience might point out, to give as much extension as could with safety and propriety be done to the principle advocated by his noble Friend. He trusted that his explanation would satisfy the House that it was the sincere wish of the Government to carry into effect, and to give as much practical extension as circumstances would permit, to the principle of competitive examination for appointments in the civil service. That principle was adopted last year, and had afforded to the public the greatest amount of security for efficiency in all the branches of the civil service.

SIR STAFFORD NORTHCOTE said, he would submit to the noble Lord whether it would not be desirable, after the explanation made by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, that the Order of the Day for a Committee on the subject should be discharged? The position of the question was now satisfactory to those who desired to see the system of competitive examination further but cautiously extended, and it would be unwise, in his opinion, to press the matter too hastily. It would be better to leave the matter in the hands of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, with the understanding that the system would be carried out in the spirit indicated.

VISCOUNT GODERICH said, that if the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer had, on a former occasion, delivered such a speech as the one just made, he should have felt it his duty to have left the question in the hands of the Government. He felt bound, however, to say that nothing could be more gratifying than the right hon. Gentleman's speech on the present occasion. In the Address which he (Viscount Goderich) had moved on a previous occasion he took care to use terms calculated not to tie up the hands of the Government, because he felt then, as now, that they were of course far better judges on such questions than any private Member. He was most ready to thank the Chancellor of the Exchequer for the promises contained in his speech; and, though the measures Government proposed to take were not specified, yet he was glad to hear that the right hon. Gentleman adopted the principle enunciated in the Address as a sound principle, and was ready to act on it in those branches of the Civil Service to which he thought it applicable. He therefore did not propose to proceed any further with his Motion for going into Committee, especially as it would be useless to do so at the present period of the Session. He was willing, therefore, that the Order of the Day should be discharged, undertaking, however, to bring forward the subject again if he found that the Government did not act in the spirit of the Chancellor of the Exchequer's speech.

MR. TITE said, he entirely concurred in the course taken by the noble Lord in withdrawing his Motion. He thought the principle might be carried out quite as far as the noble Lord intended when he first brought forward his Motion, but at the same time he was always ready to accept the honest and earnest promises of the Government. What they wanted to get rid of, as far as they could, was the principle of nomination. The recent examinations by the Society of Arts had shown that properly qualified persons would be obtained from various parts of the country, persons who had been educated in Mechanics' Institutes, and other humble institutions of a like character, those being persons who would probably never obtain nominations. At the same time he was willing to accept the offer of the Government, and he quite agreed that any change of the kind must be carried out prudently, cautiously, and wisely.

MR. RICH said, he also was willing to accept the compromise of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, but he looked upon it as only a step in advance towards the attainment of the ultimate end—full and free competition. The Dean of Hereford, perhaps the highest authority on national education, in discussing the advantages of open competition for public offices, said, in his pamphlet on the reorganisation of the civil service, that—

“If established by legislative enactment, it will do more for the advancement of education than a Parliamentary grant of many hundred thousands a year, or than any Bill for the extension of it which the country is prepared to adopt at the present time; it will do this also on the best possible grounds, by holding out motives of an honourable kind to all classes of society to educate themselves, and will show them that good character, knowledge, industry, and fitness for the discharge of official duties, in whatever rank of life, will meet with their appropriate reward. It will be the very best Education Bill which Government can bring forward.”

He entirely concurred in those opinions, and hoped the day was not far distant when they would be adopted.

TENANT RIGHT (IRELAND) BILL.

Order for Committee read.

MR. G. H. MOORE said, he rose to move that the order for going into Committee on this Bill be discharged. Considering the late period of the Session, and following the advice which he had received from various Gentlemen whom he had consulted, he had come to the conclusion that he should not be doing justice to the merits of the question if he were to call upon the House now to go into Committee on the Bill. If the Session, however, had not been so far advanced he should not have been deterred by the singular expedient which the Government appeared to have adopted of calling upon the hon. Member for North Northamptonshire (Mr. Stafford) to go shares with them in the blame of rejecting the Bill. He had too much reliance on the shrewdness and sagacity of that hon. Gentleman to think for a moment that he would allow himself to be made the cat's-paw of the Treasury Bench in getting rid of a measure which they themselves were “willing to wound, yet afraid to strike.” He did not think that the hon. Gentleman was the man to lend himself to helping the Government out of the predicament into which their own intrigues had brought them. The interpolation of the Nawab of Surat Treaty Bill into the private business on two successive Wednesdays had prevented his bringing the Bill on before, and the abridgment of that day's sitting, coupled with the state of business in the House, did not allow the least hope that it could be satisfactorily disposed of during the course of the Session. He should therefore leave the Government in full possession of the advantage which they had so honourably achieved, though it was no great exertion of chivalry or generosity on his part to say that he did not grudge them one particle of the credit which their proceedings in this matter had gained for them in that House and in Ireland. Of the personal explanation which he had been fortunate enough to elicit from the right hon. Gentleman the Irish Secretary it would be superfluous cruelty to say one word, because, though it was most exceptional in tone and temper and was rather offensive than defensive, to attempt to refute it would be something like the undertaking of a well-known alderman "to put down suicide." If the right hon. Gentleman should on any future occasion feel it his duty to oppose any measure of his, he only hoped that he would accompany that opposition with arguments and statements such as those which he had advanced against the Bill now before the House. According to the explanation which the right hon. Gentleman had been ordered by the Government to make, the Government had voted for the second reading of the Bill because they acknowledged the justice of its principle; but they opposed its further progress because they wished to prevent that principle being carried into operation. It might be said that he had no reason to complain of that course, because it was precisely the course which the Government adopted with their own Bills; but, as nobody that he knew of took the slightest interest in their Bills, while a whole people took a deep interest in this Bill of his, he might be permitted to object to the parity of proceeding. The right hon. Gentleman apparently found ample satisfaction for his own intellectual shortcomings in dwelling on the state of destitution to which, he said, the Irish Tenant League had been reduced. Though the Irish Executive might be bankrupt in sense, the right hon. Gentleman found consolation in the fact that the Irish Tenant League was bankrupt in circumstances. That, he apprehended, was not a very strong argument at best, but its strength was very much diminished by the fact that it was unfounded. The statement made by the right hon. Gentleman on a former occasion was to the effect that the Tenant League was so bankrupt that six of its members were obliged to club together to guarantee the payment of £6, but he had been misled partly by a typographical blunder, and partly by his own wilful indiscretion. On the death of the Member for Meath (Mr. Lucas) a temporary suspension took place in the operations of the League, and it being found that two sums amounting to £54 and £60 (not £6) were owing, the payment of them was guaranteed by several of the members of the League, but at the next general meeting the whole matter was settled. How the right hon. Gentleman used the argument which he drew from the weakness of the League he could not see. If it was good for anything it was an argument against the second reading, and not in favour of it. The policy which guided the quantula scientia was, that when Tenant League was strong and active the just principles which it advocated must be paltered with, but if it was weak and inactive the principle might be trampled on. It was to be hoped that during the recess the right hon. Gentleman would devote himself to a study of the geography of Ireland and of the habits and wants of the Irish people, of which he seemed at present to be profoundly ignorant, and perhaps in the course of the next Session he would be able to furnish the House with some ideas of his own as to the justice of the principles on which this Bill was founded. Instead, too, of engaging himself in importing into Ireland a scheme of English legislation which was as unacceptable an importation as himself, he might well employ his leisure in devising some scheme for the reformation of those Irish Members by whom he was at once supported and besieged. He should conclude by moving that the Order for the Committal of the Bill be discharged.

SIR JOHN WALSH said, he felt himself called upon to condemn the anomalous course taken by the Government in respect to their support to the second reading of the Bill; and he would also enter his protest against the proposition that the true sense of the House was taken on that division on the principle of that most objectionable measure. He had been greatly opposed to the Bill, but all those who were in the same circumstances had waited for some exposition of the views of the Government on the subject. The consequence was that the Bill had a majority in its favour on a division taken early in the day in a very small House, when many hon. Members who intended both to speak and vote against the measure were not present. He protested, therefore, against the assumption that the deliberate sense of the House was recorded on that division.

MR. KENNEDY said, he considered there was a deeper and graver question connected with this Bill—namely, whether that House was the proper tribunal to redress an amount of grievance admitted to exist by tourists, writers, Englishmen, and every one who had taken the trouble to look into the question of Irish grievances. It was admitted on all hands that the question of landlord and tenant which had agitated so long the Irish mind ought to be settled. He objected to English and Scotch Members deciding questions which had reference to Irish wants. Was Ireland to be legislated for by Scotch and English ignorance? Were those Members the proper parties to legislate for Ireland? On a previous division there were not fewer than eight Irish Members to one in favour of the measure—that was with regard to the whole division; the majority on the other side being made up of English and Scotch Members. The retrospective clause was also defeated by forty-eight to nineteen Irish Members, the others being English and Scotch Members, the majority against the clause being only thirty-six. It was determined not to give justice to Ireland, lest a precedent should be set of doing justice either in principle or detail. It was high time for the Legislature to interfere, and to say how Ireland's opinion was to be expressed through their representatives the Irish Members.

MR. MAGUIRE said, he wished, as an Irish Member, to make an appeal to the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary for Ireland. He from the first had lamented that a private Member should have brought forward such an important measure. His hon. Friend was fully justified in bringing in the Bill, though he knew there was no possible chance of succeeding in even carrying it through that House. Such important measures brought in by private Members were only a sham, as every one knew they could not be carried by private interest. He would tell the Scotch Members that they had as great an interest in this measure as the Irish themselves, for the national weal could not be promoted without Ireland was made happy by just and wise legislation. It was admitted on all hands that this measure was essentially necessary, and he would advise the Irish Members to press on the Government the necessity of making it a Government measure, and announcing in the Royal Address at the opening of Parliament that some such measure would be immediately brought forward. He implored the right hon. Gentleman to give a promise to introduce such a Bill early next Session, so that the Irish people should not be driven from the country to seek foreign shores, as had been the case for years past. At the time this country was embroiling itself with Russia, thousands and tens of thousands of Irishmen were leaving their country. He entreated the right hon. Gentleman not to drive the people of Ireland to despair, as they almost despaired of justice being done in this direction, but to redeem the pledge which he had virtually given to see justice done in this case. The right hon. Gentleman had met with many mishaps in the course of the Session; but he would forget all the right hon. Gentleman's shortcomings, and many that were to come, if he would promise to lay on the table a measure early next Session that should deal equitably with the question. He wished to preserve the people of Ireland to the empire; for he believed if the Irish people were retained in their own land, they would do more to recruit the national army than all the Foreign Enlistment Bills that could be projected.

MR. M'MAHON said, the question of landlord and tenant was a question of life and death in Ireland, inasmuch as it was a question of self-preservation. He warned the Government that, when a new election took place it was not unlikely that the Members who would be sent to that House would be Members pledged to an equitable settlement of the question. The Bill was only a compromise, and he trusted, when a new Bill was introduced, it would be based on sounder principles of political economy, such as fixity of tenure and value in corn rent.

MR. VANCE said, he must deny that the entire of the Irish Members were in favour of such a Bill, and if the Irish electors did, as the hon. and learned Member suggested, study political economy, he was sure they would never vote for such a Bill, which, in fact, was originally only got up for an election cry. He had no objection to a measure being introduced that would consider contracts between landlord and tenant; but if such a Bill was carried as was advocated by Mr. Sharman Crawford, the hon. Member for Mayo (Mr. G. H. Moore), and other Irish Members, the only result would be to unsettle property and contracts, and to create business for lawyers.

MR. POLLARD-URQUHART said, it was his belief that the support given to the Bill was sincere. In all countries where tranquillity was enjoyed the tenants had received some security for their tenures, the only exception being Ireland. It was, however, more essential that that security should be given to Ireland, in consequence of difference of religion and other social estrangements, which were well known and admitted to exist. Whiteboys, oakboys, peep-of-day-boys, ribbon societies, and Orange societies, might all be traced to the want of security to tenants, and the anomalous state of the law between landlords and tenants. He would appeal to hon. and right hon. Gentlemen on the Treasury bench to consider how the question would affect the representation if the people returned Members pledged to this question and open to every other question. The noble Lord at the head of the Government had obtained great fame as the statesman who had been the first to stem Russian aggression; but would it not be as well for him to augment his reputation and his laurels by securing a measure of justice for the Irish people?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, the course which Her Majesty's Government have to pursue in regard to this question is, I think, sufficiently clear. My own opinion on the relations between landlord and tenant has never been concealed; it was plainly expressed in the Committee of which I was a Member some years ago, and it has also been fully expressed in this House on former occasions. On general principles I think it undesirable, and indeed highly objectionable, that Parliament should interfere with the transactions between parties who may make bargains with each other. There can, I imagine, hardly be two opinions on the proposition, that it is most hurtful for the law to interpose between landlords and tenants, or between buyers and sellers of any description, and prescribe to either on what conditions their mutual contracts shall be based. But Her Majesty's Government have felt and have avowed that, in the very peculiar position in which Ireland stands in regard to the relations between landlord and tenant, an exception might be made to that general and just principle. On that ground, dealing with this matter as an exceptional case, we last year undertook the charge of a Bill which—although we might not approve in the abstract all the arrangements it proposed—we were still led to believe would, if passed into law, put an end to those local disputes which have disturbed the tranquillity of the country and prevented that harmony which ought to prevail between different classes in the sister kingdom. We did our best to settle this question last Session, but we were disappointed in our expectations. Owing to the conflict of opinion between different parties as to the provisions of the measure, that Bill failed. We come, then, to the Bill now under discussion, which is certainly very different in its character and scope from the measure which we declared our intention last year to support. My right hon. Friend the Secretary for Ireland did not deem it his duty to oppose the second reading, in order that ample opportunity might be afforded for a full expression of the opinion of the House on the Bill; but I cannot regard the measure as one which ought to be passed into law, and, as we have now arrived at another stage of its progress, I shall certainly feel it right to— [MR. HORSMAN: The Bill has been withdrawn.] I was not aware of what occurred earlier in the discussion, having been detained elsewhere by other business; but, as I learn that the Bill has been abandoned, of course the debate upon it ought to close. The proposers of the measure are entitled to insist on the observance of the maxim, "De mortuis nil nisi bonum." If it is dead, let us be silent on the subject. One word as to the intentions of the Government respecting this question in the next Session. I have already stated our opinion on the general question; and although we do not think that in the present temper of Parliament there is any likelihood of any Bill on this subject passing which we might be disposed to bring in, we shall of course feel it our duty to give the most respectful consideration to any measure which any independent Member may introduce.

Order discharged.

JUDGMENTS EXECUTION, ETC., BILL.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair."

COLONEL FRENCH said, he should move that the House go into Committee that day three months; he trusted, however, that the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Craufurd) would withdraw the Bill.

MR. M'MAHON said, he would second the Motion on the ground that the Bill was of an objectionable character.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word "That" to the end of the Question, in order to add the words "this House will, upon this day three months, resolve itself into the said Committee," instead thereof.

MR. J. D. FITZGERALD, said, he had considered the Bill, and approved of its principle, as did also his hon. and learned Friend the Solicitor General for Ireland, the Attorney General for England, and the right hon. and learned Lord Advocate. The Bill had been fully discussed, and the opinion of the House had been unequivocally pronounced upon it. On those grounds he thought the House ought to go into Committee.

MR. NAPIER said, as great doubts had been expressed as to the mode of carrying out the Bill, he thought that was reason enough for asking the House to pause before they proceeded with it. He knew also there was a very strong feeling in Ireland against the Bill, and especially among the commercial communities.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he must oppose the Bill, because he knew it was unpopular in Ireland. The theory might be right, but the mode of applying it might be prejudicial. He did not think that the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland was quite entitled to claim the confidence of Ireland, either in respect to civil or criminal matters.

MR. WHITESIDE said, he trusted the House would see the impolicy of passing the Bill at that moment. It was one of those instances which showed how dangerous it was for individual Members to attempt to change the law of a country they knew little of. The Bill looked smooth enough on paper, but when they examined it thoroughly many faults would be found. It would give no jurisdiction to the Courts in Dublin by which relief could be granted from a judgment fraudulently obtained. As the course taken was not in the right direction, he should oppose going into Committee.

MR. CRAUFURD said, the hon. and learned Gentleman would lead the House to suppose that the Bill gave certain powers to creditors; but that was not so. All he asked was, that the House should go into Committee, and no doubt the Bill would be made perfect.

MR. M'CANN said, he should vote against the Bill. It was one of great suspicion, and in that light the commercial classes in Ireland viewed it.

The House divided:—Ayes 74; Noes 69: Majority 5.

Question again proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair."

MR. VANCE said, the hon. and learned Member (Mr. Craufurd) could not surely think of going on with the Bill when so small a majority was in favour of going into Committee. He should, therefore, move the adjournment of the debate.

The House divided:—Ayes 63; Noes 73: Majority 10.

Question again proposed.

MR. WHITESIDE said, he would ask the question, whether the hon. and learned Member for Ayr really intended to persevere with the Bill, which was one of great difficulty, if not impracticable? He thought the hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Craufurd) would only waste the time of the House by pressing his Bill now, and he would recommend him to postpone it until the next Session. The measure which the Attorney General for Ireland had intimated that it was his intention to introduce next year would probably effect the objects the hon. and learned Gentleman had in view.

THE LORD ADVOCATE said, he would request hon. Members on the other side of the House to allow Mr. Speaker to leave the chair. The only way to see whether the Bill could be worked out was to go into Committee. He could not imagine by what means the Bill could be considered an Irish Bill, as it applied both to Scotland and Ireland.

MR. HENLEY said, he thought it rather hard to ask the House to go into Committee when they had not seen the clauses in print which the right hon. and learned Member for Ennis (Mr. J. D. Fitzgerald) said he had ready to apply to Ireland.

MR. CRAUFURD said, all he would ask was that they go into Committee, and immediately report progress.

MR. MALINS said, he did not object to the principle of the Bill, but he certainly saw that it was too late in the Session to go on with it, as the details would require much revision. He would suggest going into Committee pro forma.

COLONEL FRENCH said, he objected altogether to going on with the Bill. The support given by the Government was most unreasonable, seeing that upon that very subject they had abandoned all their own Bills. So strongly did hon. Members on that side of the House feel against the passing of the measure, that they must refuse to proceed further. [The hon. Member was speaking when a quarter to Six arrived, upon which he was stopped by Mr. Speaker.]

THE ASSESSED TAXES ACTS.

House in Committee.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he had to move a Resolution, the object of which was to make an alteration in the duty payable by those who kept race-horses. The annual duty at present was £3 17s., and was paid upon all horses kept for racing or training; but a complaint having been made by some persons that this tax was unjustly levied, and that they were anxious to pay a tax upon their horses for every race run by them, the Resolution was proposed to enable the alteration to be made.

Resolution agreed to.

Resolved—"That from and after the fifth day of April, one thousand eight hundred and fifty-seven, in lieu of the annual Duty of three pounds seventeen shillings, now chargeable under the Acts relating to the Assessed Taxes for every horse kept or used for the purpose of racing or running for any plate, prize, or sum of money, or other thing, or kept in training for any of the said purposes, there shall be charged annually an Excise Duty of the like amount for every horse which shall start or run for any plate, prize, or sum of money, or other thing."

House resumed.

APPELLATE JURISDICTION (HOUSE OF LORDS) SALARIES AND RETIRING PENSIONS.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, he had now to move a Resolution, declaring that provision should be made out of the Consolidated Fund for the payment of retiring pensions to Deputy Speakers of the House of Lords.

Resolution agreed to.

Resolved—"That provision be made, out of the Consolidated Fund of the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland, for payment of the Salaries and Retiring Pensions of the persons who may be appointed Deputy Speakers of the House of Lords under the provisions of any Act of the present Session relating to the Appellate Jurisdiction of the House of Lords."

House resumed.

The House adjourned at one minute before Six o'clock.

SALE OF POISONS—QUESTION.

LORD CAMPBELL rose to ask his noble and learned Friend on the woolsack the question of which he had given notice respecting a subject of great importance. He would not now revert to the facts which had been disclosed during the trial of a recent case, as they must be well known to their Lordships; but, he was shocked to say, that for too many years past the crime of poisoning had become most alarmingly common in this country, and it was to be feared that the facilities which existed for the commission of the crime were what had led to its frequency. Many crimes of the kind had been caused by the institutions called burial societies, the members of which had in several instances been proved to be accessory to the death of their own offspring. Another class of these cases arose out of the present system of life insurance. Life insurances had been effected by parties who possessed no interest whatever in the lives of the persons insured, and this had been done with the premeditated object of committing murder by the administration of poison. Irrespective of anything that had recently been disclosed, he knew, from his own observation and experience on the bench, that many cases had been proved where insurances had been effected with a view to afterwards committing murder, and that on the consummation of the act, the money insured under the policy had been received. Until very lately there had been no regulation with respect to the sale of poisons, and accordingly arsenic could be purchased just as easily as Epsom salts. The consequence was, that poisoning by arsenic became alarmingly common, particularly in the counties of Essex and Norfolk; and the first case of capital conviction that he tried after he had the honour of a seat on the bench was that of a woman whose familiarity with the use of that poison was so notorious that it had procured for her the name of "Sally Arsenic." The Act which had passed for regulating the sale of arsenic had had a very beneficial effect, and arsenic had gone somewhat out of fashion; but, unfortunately, another poison equally deadly in its effects, nux vomica, had taken its place. A person might now go to any druggist's shop in England and buy a pennyworth of nux vomica; he had only to say that he wished to poison rats, and at once the nux vomica was sold to him without the smallest hesitation or reluctance. True, nux vomica was not so powerful a poison as the alkaloid of strychnia, which was extracted from it, but its administration was attended with the same results. In fact, however, they could not only buy nux vomica, but strychnia itself, from the druggists, without difficulty of any sort. It was a matter of serious importance, then, that some restraint should be put upon the sale of these poisons, and he thought it the duty of the Government to consider and decide what other substances besides arsenic there were, the sale of which ought to be restrained or prohibited. He should be happy to assist them in framing a measure for regulating the sale of poisons, and would be glad if his noble and learned Friend would inform him whether the Government intended to introduce a Bill for that purpose.

LORD RAVENSWORTH said, that, before the Lord Chancellor answered the question, he wished to suggest that it might be advisable to institute some further regulations with reference to insurance companies, which might have the effect of checking the crime of poisoning. He thought that in every case where a company had such reasonable suspicions with regard to the cause of death of a party insured as to conceive themselves warranted in giving notice to other insurance companies, it should also be incumbent upon them to give information to and lay the circumstances of the case before the Home Secretary, in order that due inquiry might be made by those whose duty it was to protect the lives of Her Majesty's subjects.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE said, the noble and learned Lord had committed a breach of the orders of the House by the course he had adopted in this instance. It was the rule of the House that the first quarter of an hour of their sitting should be devoted to the reception of petitions; but no sooner had the Lord Chancellor taken his seat on the woolsack than the noble Lord had risen and put the question of which he had given notice, although in the proper order of proceeding it should have come after the other business on the paper. He trusted the Lord Chancellor would not answer the question of the noble and learned Lord until the orders of the day were disposed of.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR: The question put to him by his noble and learned Friend had been followed by some observations from another noble Lord; and if putting the question had justified that noble Lord in observing upon it, it certainly justified him (the Lord Chancellor) in giving it an answer. The only answer he could give, however, was, that five years ago this subject was under the consideration of his right hon. Friend who was then, as now, Secretary of State for the Home Department, and the result of the investigation which then took place was the introduction of a measure confined to the sale of arsenic; and he understood from his right hon. Friend that the reason for that measure being confined to arsenic was, that there were difficulties of a serious nature in the way of defining the different poisons. He thought that a number of other ingredients might be put in the same category with arsenic; but it was the opinion of one of the most eminent medical men in the metropolis, that great evil might be done by furnishing the public with a list of seventeen other articles, all of which were quite as deadly poisons as arsenic; and this was the reason that the measure did not go further and include those articles. But there were now some other poisons—and strychnia amongst them which recent events had made familiar to the public, and he did not see, therefore, why they should not be placed in the same category; and his right hon. Friend the Home Secretary had authorised him to state that the question should have his careful and attentive consideration.

MUTINY OF AN IRISH MILITIA REGIMENT—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE drew attention to the fact that a statement had appeared in the public journals of that day to the effect that a militia regiment stationed in Nenagh, in the county Tipperary, had mutinied against its officers, and that regular troops had been employed to suppress the émeute. He wished to know if the noble Lord the Minister at War could give any explanation of the affair to the House?

LORD PANMURE said, that as yet he had no official information upon the subject, though he had received a private letter from the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, which stated that such an occurrence as that to which the noble Earl referred had taken place, but did not give him any particulars further than those which were contained in the public papers. It appeared that there had been a mutinous movement arising from some misunderstanding which existed with respect to giving up the clothing of the militia; but he trusted that the affair had been exaggerated, and that their Lordships would suspend their judgment respecting it until they had an opportunity of making themselves acquainted with the circumstances of the case.

DWELLINGS FOR LABOURING CLASSES (IRELAND) BILL.

On the Motion for the third reading of this Bill,

THE MARQUESS OF WESTMEATH objected to the seventh clause, which prohibited landlords who were magistrates from acting in matters in which they were personally interested. He had had the honour of holding Her Majesty's commission for fifty years, and he did not know of the occurrence of a single case of the kind. It was a libel on the magistrates of Ireland to insert such a clause. The clause further prohibited agents from acting in the causes of their principals. Now, what constituted an agent? An agent was one who did anything for another person, and the most nonsensical objection might be taken under such a clause. The clause was an insult, from whatever quarter it came, upon the magistrates of Ireland. He should move that the seventh clause be expunged from the Bill.

The Lord Chancellor

THE LORD CHANCELLOR intimated that the Motion could not be made upon the third reading of the Bill. It could only be taken before the Motion that the Bill do pass.

Bill read 3^a.

THE MARQUESS OF WESTMEATH then moved that the seventh clause be struck out of the Bill.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE, after suggesting some verbal amendments, said that as to the seventh clause, although he had the greatest respect for the Irish magistracy, who had done their duty in times of great uncertainty, yet he must say that the noble Marquess opposite was quite mistaken in supposing that no cases of magistrates sitting in judgment in their own case had occurred. He himself had been personally concerned in the removal from the magistracy of a magistrate for having done this very thing. There could be no doubt but that the thing was done. Still he did not think that this part of the clause was of any great importance. But the part which related to agents was of importance. The noble Marquess was mistaken when he said that an agent could not be defined. There could be no doubt as to the meaning of the term, and it was perfectly understood in Ireland. As to the insult on the magistracy, it was no more an insult than a precaution taken against offences by clergymen were insults on the clergy. These things were not insults; they were only safeguards against human frailty.

LORD CAMPBELL wished to preserve their Lordships from the discredit of passing such a clause as the seventh clause of this Bill in its present form. It was absurd to prohibit that which was actually illegal, and nothing was more certain than that it was unlawful for a judge of any degree to be a judge in his own cause. Any justice of the peace so offending could not only be removed from the commission, but would be liable to a prosecution at common law for a misdemeanor; and if a case came before a bench of magistrates, and any magistrate present was interested in such case, he was bound to leave the bench, and if he did not the Queen's Bench would quash the decision. He therefore considered the clause, so far as it related to landlords who were magistrates, was quite unnecessary. As to what was said about laws passed respecting the clergy, these laws were intended to prohibit practices which the clergy had previously done and considered lawful; but there was no instance of a law being passed against that which by law had been already declared illegal and void. If, however, its operation was restricted to agents of landlords, who might also be magistrates, he should feel inclined to support the clause. Their Lordships knew very well what an Irish agent was—one who often had a very strong personal interest in his principal's property, and who therefore could not be an impartial judge in any dispute affecting that property. There ought, therefore, to be a disqualification against his sitting where his principal was concerned.

VISCOUNT DUNGANNON regarded the clause as an uncalled-for reflection on the magistracy of Ireland, and would support the Motion of the noble Marquess for expunging the clause.

THE EARL OF DONOUGHMORE said, that there were no body of men who performed their official duty better than the Irish landlords. They had done so in times of difficulty and danger. However, he looked upon the measure as so useful a one, that he would not wish to see its progress through Parliament endangered by a division on an Amendment such as that moved by his noble Friend.

THE EARL OF WICKLOW hoped that his noble Friend would not withdraw his Motion. He looked upon the clause as unnecessary. No magistrate would act in the way contemplated by the clause.

THE MARQUESS OF WESTMEATH could not consent to withdraw his Motion, for he thought the clause offensive and unnecessary.

LORD DENMAN would vote with the noble Marquess if he divided the House, but he recommended his noble Friend to withdraw his Motion.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE said, he would adopt the suggestion of the noble and learned Lord (Lord Campbell), and would propose to amend the clause by confining its operation to the agents of landlords, instead of referring to landlords and agents indiscriminately.

VISCOUNT DUNGANNON objected to casting a slur upon the agent of the landlord any more than upon the landlord himself. Most agents in Ireland were magistrates, and their conduct as magistrates was, generally speaking, unexceptionable.

THE EARL OF WICKLOW presumed that if the landlord who sat in judgment upon his own case was violating the common law, the agent of the landlord, if he sat to hear the landlord's case, would be guilty of the same offence. Why, then, should the agent be prohibited by this clause if the landlord was not to be? If they omitted the word "landlord," which he thought they should, there was no reason for inserting the word "agent."

LORD CAMPBELL said, that the case of the landlord and that of his agent were not quite parallel. The landlord would clearly be sitting in judgment on his own case. There could be no difficulty about that. But could they say that the agent sitting on the landlord's case was sitting on his own?

Content 25; Not Content 13: Majority 12.

Amendment negatived.

The Amendment of the Marquess of CLANRICARDE was then agreed to, and the clause, as amended, ordered to stand part of the Bill.

Bill passed, and sent to the Commons.

BISHOPS OF LONDON AND DURHAM RETIREMENT BILL.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR presented a Bill to provide for the retirement of the present Bishops of London and Durham, and said it was perhaps known to their Lordships that two distinguished members of the episcopal bench were unfortunately in such a state of health as to disqualify them for the discharge of their several duties, and that they had signified their wish to retire from their respective bishoprics. Under such circumstances it was but reasonable that provision should be made for retiring allowances for those right rev. Prelates—he alluded to the Bishop of London and the Bishop of Durham. He therefore asked their Lordships to assent to the first reading of a Bill to effect that object. The measure was one to enable those right rev. Prelates to retire, and to make provision for them after the resignation of their sees. If their Lordships assented to the first reading, he would propose to take the second reading to-morrow (Friday).

LORD REDESDALE said, that the principle of the Bill was one that demanded considerable attention. It was no doubt desirable that some general measure should be adopted to meet such contingencies; but the policy of passing a particular measure relating only to two sees, he thought was extremely questionable. In his opinion it was a dangerous precedent to lay down, and might be acted upon whenever an occasion arose of a bishop desiring to surrender his see ; and it would be a far preferable mode of proceeding to introduce a general measure enabling members of the right rev. Bench, under certain restrictions, to retire when they felt themselves disqualified from performing their episcopal functions efficiently. He trusted their Lordships would not allow a Bill relating to particular sees to be brought hurriedly forward at a late period of the Session, and passed without that consideration which the magnitude of the subject required. If he were met by the argument that inconvenience would result from postponement, all he could say in reply was that the course which he recommended was open to less objection than, within a few weeks of the end of the Session, to pass a measure which ought to be maturely considered in all its parts ; and, for his own part, before being called upon to agree to the second reading, he should like to have an opportunity of communicating with others on a subject of so much importance.

THE EARL OF HARROWBY hoped that the noble Lord did not intend to offer any protest against the Bill. Even if the present Bill passed, he was quite sure that a general Bill upon the subject would be ultimately adopted. The present measure, however, was of an urgent character and demanded their Lordships' immediate attention.

LORD CAMPBELL thought that the right rev. Prelates ought to be placed in the same position in respect as to retirement as Her Majesty's Judges, holding their office while able to discharge their duties, a liberal provision being made for them when forced by age or other cause to retire. There was, however, no doubt that great care should be observed in laying down a general rule upon this subject. He should rejoice to see a general measure brought forward, but all their Lordships must feel that it was urgently necessary for the Government to pass the present Bill. The manner in which the two right rev. Prelates had voluntarily come forward to tender their resignations, must raise them in the estimation of the whole community. The most laudable disinterestedness and praiseworthy conduct had been evinced by those two right rev. Prelates.

Lord Redesdale

It would not be fair to oblige those Prelates to wait for a general measure, and the delay would be felt as a disappointment to the whole community.

LORD REDESDALE said, he did not wish to pledge himself to any particular course in respect to the present measure. He thought it would be most desirable that there should be time given to enable noble Lords who took an interest in the question to express their opinions upon the Bill on the second reading. There was much less evil to be apprehended from delaying legislation on the subject for six months longer than to pass without due consideration a Bill of this character, affecting only two particular sees. The result of this measure would, of course, be the placing the nomination of those sees in the hands of those who brought in the Bill. It was, in his opinion, most important that the object sought for should only be carried out by a general measure.

LORD DENMAN supported the Bill, which was but a measure of simple justice to the two right rev. Prelates who had made such voluntary sacrifices,

THE LORD CHANCELLOR hoped that the noble Lord would not press for delay in the second reading of the Bill. If the noble Lord intended to move for any alteration in the measure, he would have the opportunity of doing so in another stage. At this late period of the Session he did not think it reasonable to seek for a postponement of the second reading. He quite agreed with the noble Lord that a general measure would be desirable if the Session were not so far advanced. Their Lordships owed it to those distinguished Prelates to pass the measure as speedily as possible. There were facilities for the carrying out the objects of the Bill in the case of the two right rev. Prelates which did not exist in the case of other Prelates. The retiring allowance for the Bishop of London, for example, could be made without trenching upon any fund at all ; it would come out of the revenue which the right rev. Prelate was at present receiving. The Bishop of Durham was, to a certain extent, in the same position.

VISCOUNT DUNGANNON very much doubted whether the remedy now proposed might not establish a precedent of a serious character. He did not think that such a measure as this should be passed at so late a period of the Session.

THE EARL OF POWIS saw no reason why the second reading of the Bill should not be postponed until Monday, at all events.

Bill read 1^a.

Then it was moved, That the Bill be read 2^a To-morrow.

LORD REDESDALE said, he did object to the second reading being taken so soon. It was most monstrous for the Government to bring on a Bill at such a time as that, in the absence of so many noble Lords, and when there was not a single Prelate in the House. If he were to stand alone, he was determined to divide against the second reading being taken to-morrow.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR said, that the Bill would only be placed upon the orders of the day for to-morrow.

VISCOUNT DUNGANNON hoped that the Bill would be postponed until Monday.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, he was not prepared to pledge himself to the principle of the Bill without further consideration. He trusted that the noble and learned Lord would assent to the Bill standing amongst the orders of the Day for Monday.

Motion (by leave of the House) withdrawn; and Bill ordered to be read 2^a on Monday next.

House adjourned till To-morrow.

VACCINATION BILL.

Order for Committee read.

MR. COWPER said, the whole subject treated of by this Bill was one of great difficulty; three Acts of Parliament had been passed in reference to it, and it was generally admitted that, hitherto, legislation had been unsatisfactory, and the present law was in such a state that it could not continue as it was. The defects were obvious. Public vaccinators were appointed throughout the country, but there was no security that they should be skilful and competent to discharge their duties. There was no security provided that the lymph should be of a healthy character. The whole country was divided into districts, but some districts were too small to allow of the lymph being constantly provided and circulated from children vaccinated to children not vaccinated, and others were so large that parents were subjected to great inconvenience in bringing their children to be vaccinated. There was an elaborate system of registration for the purpose of detecting cases of omission; but the register was not complete. One of the provisions of the law was, that every surgeon should register all cases of vaccination successfully performed by him; but the private medical men were not remunerated for it, and in consequence neglected to return their cases. Those gentlemen were very ready to undertake labours for the benefit of their patients, but they were unwilling to occupy their time for the benefit of the public without remuneration. The law imposed a penalty for non-vaccination, but there were no means of inflicting it; no one was called on to prosecute, and there was no fund out of which the expenses of prosecution could be defrayed. It was urged upon the Government that such a state of things ought to be remedied, and last year a Bill was introduced by the hon. Member for Leitrim (Mr. Brady), which proposed to transfer the administration of the law of vaccination from the boards of guardians to the General Board of Health. He was strongly opposed to that proposition, because, although the Board of Health was supposed to be associated with an ardent and enthusiastic love of centralisation, before he succeeded to the post he now occupied he did not share that feeling, and he had not since been either inoculated or vaccinated with it. In his opinion, such a measure as vaccination could only be carried into effect by local machinery, and therefore he declined to adopt the Bill of the hon. Member. But, as it was evident that the law must either be altered altogether or made efficient, he had turned his attention to the latter alternative and introduced the present Bill. He thought to secure more careful and skilful vaccinators, by placing them under the superintendence of a body of medical men of eminence, and requiring a certificate of attendance at a smallpox hospital and of skilful performance of the operation. He thought to effect an improvement in the districts by making them co-extensive with the present registration districts. With regard to registration, he proposed to establish under the Bill a system which should be complete and satisfactory; and he also introduced a provision enabling the board of guardians to charge on the poor-rate the expense of prosecutions in those cases of obstinate non-compliance with the law in which they thought it necessary to proceed. Objections were urged against the compulsory clauses which he proposed to retain in his Bill. It was said that the Legislature should never compel people to do anything which they did not like; but the force of that objection was greatly weakened by the argument, that in compelling vaccination they were not obliging people to do anything disadvantageous to themselves, but merely to take precaution against a loathsome and terrible disease, which spread with great rapidity and destroyed a greater proportion of those attacked than perhaps any other known disease. It appeared that the proportion of deaths from smallpox of persons attacked, without the protection of vaccination, was one in three, or one in four. When such was the virulence of the disease and the extent of the mortality resulting from it, it appeared to him that there was no constitutional reason why parents should not be obliged to do what was necessary for the preservation of their own and their neighbours' children. A man was not allowed to burn down his own house, because it would endanger his neighbour's property; and if the only objection to the Bill had been to its compulsory character, he should not have hesitated to press it upon the attention of the House. But there was another objection far more weighty. It was asserted that a great number of persons did not admit that vaccination was a proper, safe, or efficient measure of precaution against the smallpox, and that certain disorders not merely followed, but were caused by vaccination. In 1806, there was an inquiry by the most eminent medical men of that day, and they reported that no instance had arisen of other diseases having been propagated by vaccination, and it was stated, that in no case out of 40,000 had any evil consequences resulted, and although medical science repudiated the notion that any other disease could be given by vaccination, yet they knew that medical opinions were not infallible, and he should be very sorry to be the means of putting on the Statute-book a compulsory enactment against the deliberate convictions of any large class of the community. He believed the great opposition which had arisen to that Bill was directed more against vaccination than against the Bill itself. It might be that there was something in the manner in which vaccination was performed among the poorer classes which prevented its being as safe and efficient a precaution as it was for the richer portion of the community. They were not, however, legislating for the higher, but for the lower classes. Under these circumstances, he had thought right to adopt a suggestion of the hon. Member for Finsbury (Mr. T. Duncombe) to move for a Select Committee next Session to inquire into the manner in which vaccination was practically performed, and to move now that the order for going into Committee on this Bill be discharged. The hon. Member moved that the order be discharged.

MR. T. DUNCOMBE said, he thought the course proposed by the hon. Gentleman was a judicious one. This was a difficult and delicate question, with which the House was very little acquainted, and in regard to which investigation should precede legislation. In 1840, Sir Robert Peel, being urged to make vaccination compulsory, expressed his opinion that such a course would be repugnant to the habits and feelings of the British people, and to that freedom of opinion and action to which they were well accustomed. In 1843, at a later period of the Session than that which had now been arrived at, a compulsory Vaccination Bill was smuggled through the House. Fortunately, it became inoperative by its own defects, and remained a dead letter. It was proposed to remove those defects and make the law more stringent; but, while he believed great good had resulted from vaccination, he did not think it would be encouraged by penal enactment. The course adopted by the hon. Member for Hertfordshire was most judicious, and he rejoiced at the question being ended for the present Session. He hoped also to hear that the right hon. Baronet the Home Secretary would follow this example with respect to the Burials Act Amendment Bill.

MR. HENLEY was very glad this Bill was about to be withdrawn. He believed that the endeavour to make vaccination compulsory had been most mischievous in its effects. Vaccination was quietly making its way; people were adopting it more and more, but from the moment it was made compulsory, they began to think that every evil which happened to their children afterwards necessarily ensued from it. He had no objection to the subject being referred to a Select Committee another year, but no report would satisfy him that it was desirable to make vaccination compulsory.

MR. MICHELL said, that smallpox, treated upon the hydropathic principle, would not, under any circumstances, be fatal to the extent of three per cent. And, since the authorities of the Smallpox Hospital returned the mortality as high as thirty-five and fifty per cent upon the number of cases, they should at least keep ambulances, and not encourage the practice of bringing patients to the hospital in public cabs. He had no objection to vaccination being tried as much as they pleased, but he believed it was one of the greatest humbugs the world ever produced.

MR. TOLLEMACHE said, if the Bill had not been withdrawn, he should have objected to any charge for prosecutions being thrown on the union fund, unless some more equitable mode of raising that fund than the present was adopted.

Order discharged.

APPELLATE JURISDICTION (HOUSE OF LORDS BILL—(SALARIES AND RETIRING PENSIONS).

Upon the report of the Resolution in Committee being brought up—

"That provision be made, out of the Consolidated Fund of Great Britain and Ireland, for payment of the Salaries and Retiring Pensions of the persons who may be appointed Deputy Speakers of the House of Lords under the provisions of any Act of the present Session relating to the appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords."

MR. HADFIELD rose to object to the Report being received.

SIR GEORGE GREY appealed to the hon. Member not to raise any discussion upon a formal Resolution, necessary for the introduction of a clause. It did not bind the House, and the question must be raised again in Committee on the Bill.

MR. HADFIELD felt that the prerogative of the Crown to create life peerages ought not to be surrendered or impeached in any way whatever, and that the rights of Lord Wensleydale ought not to be prejudiced. The object of this Bill was to limit and restrict the prerogative, and he had intended to divide the House upon the question that the Report be received; but, as a discussion would take place at the evening sitting, he would yield to the appeal of the right hon. Baronet.

Resolution agreed to.

FORMATION OF PARISHES BILL.

Order for Committee read.

House in Committee.

Clauses 9 to 24 agreed to.

Clause 25,

SIR GEORGE PECHELL moved a proviso—

"That when the patronage of any church or chapel to which a district shall have been assigned is vested by any of the Church Building Acts, or by this Act, or by any local Act, in the incumbent of the original parish, district, or place, out of which such district has been taken, the person holding the incumbency of such original parish, district, or place, at the time of the passing of this Act, shall not be deprived of the patronage of such church or chapel by any assignment of the same during his incumbency."

THE MARQUESS OF BLANDFORD said, a former clause provided that where an incumbent had mainly contributed to the erection of a church he should have the patronage, which met the case.

MR. BOUVERIE thought the proviso a reasonable one.

Proviso agreed to; the words, "Church Building Acts" being, on the Motion of Mr. HADFIELD, struck out.

Remaining clauses agreed to.

On an additional clause being moved, enabling grants to be made of lands for the site of a house or garden for any spiritual person serving any church or chapel, the Statute of Mortmain notwithstanding,

MR. HADFIELD objected to the exemption. Every sect in the country, every school, every charity, was subject to the Mortmain Act, and he did not see why the same law should not be applied to all classes.

THE MARQUESS OF BLANDFORD said, he could not agree to the Amendment.

MR. PELLATT supported the Amendment.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, if the quantity of land was to be limited to a site for a parsonage and garden, he thought the objection would be obviated.

THE MARQUESS OF BLANDFORD said, the real object of the clause was to enable the grantees to attach conditions to the grant, so that if land granted for a parsonage was devoted to another use, there might be pre-emption.

MR. DUNLOP suggested, that the quantity of land should be limited to one acre.

Amendment agreed to; and Clause, as amended, ordered to be added to the Bill.

The House resumed. Bill reported, as amended.

INDIAN APPEALS—QUESTION.

SIR ERSKINE PERRY asked the President of the Board of Control, whether he contemplated bringing in a Bill to provide a Judicial Tribunal in India, with appeal to the Privy Council in England, for the investigation and decision of such claims on the private rights of the Native Princes and grantees of Government as were now decided by the Executive Government without hearing and in the absence of the parties?

MR. VERNON SMITH replied, that he had no intention to bring in such a Bill, as he did not see his way to any satisfactory result. A measure of the kind would effect a complete change in the constitution of the Government of India, and would require great consideration.

NAVIGATION OF THE DANUBE—TREATY OF PARIS—QUESTION.

COLONEL DUNNE asked the First Lord of the Treasury, whether by the Treaty of Paris, which provided for the opening of the navigation of the Danube, any persons other than Austrian subjects would be allowed to possess steamers and navigate that river above the frontiers of Austria on the same terms as subjects of that empire?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, that by the Treaty of Paris the navigation of the Danube was to be rendered liable to the stipulations of the Treaty of 1815. By the provisions of that Treaty such rivers as divided or traversed different States were to be free to the navigation by vessels of all nations, subject only to such regulations of police and other matters as a Commission, composed of members from the riverain or border States, should establish. He should apprehend, therefore, that under the provisions of the two treaties it would be competent for the vessels of any country to enter the Danube from the Black Sea, and to ascend that river as far as it was navigable in its course, subject always to such regulations as were contemplated by the Treaty of 1815 to be established with regard to such vessels. He believed, however, that the question of the hon. and gallant Member applied to a certain monopoly given to an Austrian company by former arrangements with Austria. He apprehended the opinion of the Congress to be, that that arrangement could not stand against the stipulations of the treaty. The Austrian Government might give any immunities they pleased as affecting their own ships only, but they could not, by virtue of an order issued by their own authority, supersede the engagements of the treaty.

INDIAN CURRENCY—QUESTION.

MR. CHEETHAM asked the President of the Board of Control if his attention had been called to the great inconvenience at present sustained by the commercial classes in India from the scarcity of a metallic specie in that country, and whether it was the intention of the Indian Government to take any measures to remedy the same, by the creation of a gold coinage as a legal tender in addition to the silver coinage now current there; and if he was able to lay on the table of the House a Report of the extent of railway communication now in operation and in course of construction in India?

MR. V. SMITH said, that since he had been at the Board of Control he had heard no complaint of inconvenience from the scarcity of metallic currency. With respect to the second question, he stated that there was no Report on the whole state of railways in India in the possession of the India Board; but some correspondence had taken place on the subject. He should be ready to answer any specific question on the subject, or, if desired, to lay the correspondence respecting it on the table.

SITE OF THE NATIONAL GALLERY—QUESTION.

MR. GRANVILLE VERNON said, since Her Majesty had undertaken to issue a Royal Commission to inquire into the site of the National Gallery, he wished to put a question upon the subject to the noble Lord at the head of the Government. The Committee which sat in 1853 on the same subject felt itself impeded from recommending any sites which it really considered to be the best from a delicacy with regard to the nature of the tenure of those sites. Now he did not wish to trouble the noble Lord to state specifically what instructions would be issued to the Commission, but perhaps the noble Lord would be so good as to say whether the Commission would have full power to propose such a site as they might consider the best adapted to the purpose.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: I cannot tell my hon. Friend what the instructions will be, because the Commission has not yet been appointed; but of course it will be open to them to make such suggestions as may appear to them to be the best to make with regard to the site. I can only repeat, however, what I stated in the discussion of this question, that there are places—such as the Royal Palaces at St. James's, and Kensington Gore, and Marlborough House, which no Government would agree to have converted into the National Gallery, even though they should be recommended by the Commission, and for this obvious reason—that such places are the private property of the Crown.

MILITIA MUTINY IN IRELAND— QUESTION.

COLONEL FRENCH wished to put a question to the hon. Under-Secretary for War, relative to a statement which had been published with regard to the disbanding of the Tipperary Militia. It was stated that the men had refused to give up their arms except on certain conditions, and that they had taken possession of the town of Nenagh, where they used their bayonets and fire-arms, and the troops of the line had to be called in to quell them. By a telegraphic despatch since received, it was stated that the mutiny had been quelled, and the question he wished to put to the hon. Under-Secretary was, whether it really was the fact that the mutiny had been suppressed, but only with severe losses on both sides?

MR. FREDERICK PEEL: I have seen a telegraphic despatch from General Chatterton, which states that everything was quiet in the quarters where the mutiny had taken place. It added that one man had been killed and some ten or twelve wounded belonging to the line, but it does not allude to the losses on the side of the militia.

COLONEL DUNNE: Does the hon. Gentleman intend to go on with the Militia Pay Bill to-night?—because, if he does, I shall call attention to the important cause of this unfortunate occurrence.

MR. FREDERICK PEEL: I hope to pass it through Committee to-night.

CONSOLIDATION OF THE STATUTES— QUESTION.

MR. LOCKE KING, seeing the hon. and learned Member for Suffolk (Sir Fitzroy Kelly) in his place, he wished to ask him whether he intended this Session to bring in the Consolidation of the Criminal Law Bill, which he obtained leave to introduce on the 14th of February last?

SIR FITZROY KELLY: After what has passed in this House on the subject to which the question refers, I think the question should rather have been addressed to the Government. Still, I have no hesitation in answering the question, and I can assure the hon. Gentleman that some of the most eminent members of the Statute Law Commission have been incessantly engaged in the preparation not only of the Bills of which I have given notice, but also of Bills relating to other branches of the law. I have therefore great satisfaction in announcing that the whole of these Bills are at this moment ready to be laid on the table, and they will to-morrow or Monday be proposed to the House of Lords by the Lord Chancellor. It was thought to be only right that these important Bills should be brought in by some member of the Government.

CONSOLIDATED FUND (APPROPRIATION) BILL.

Order for Committee read.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, this was the first time that the Appropriation Bill had been printed and presented in its proper form. Yesterday the Bill was read a second time; and now the House was called upon to go into Committee; but he would appeal to the right hon. Baronet the Chancellor of the Exchequer to postpone going into Committee until to-morrow. He objected to the Government taking power in this Bill to apply the Votes for the army and navy in any way they might think proper. There were sixteen important Votes relating to the former and twenty-one for the latter, which had all been gone through and discussed in that House, and in passing these Votes they believed they were confining the Government to the money voted; but under the 30th clause of this Bill, the Government would be able to spend any sum of one Vote for another purpose. He should take the sense of the House upon striking out this proviso, which, he believed, would be most mischievous.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY asked the hon. Gentleman the Secretary of the Treasury (Mr. Wilson) or the right hon. Baronet the Chancellor of the Exchequer to explain in what respects this Appropriation Bill differed from those which had been introduced in previous years. The hon. Baronet also complained that under the present system of audit the House was not, until after an interval of two years, informed of the exact appropriation of the sums which it had voted, and thus its control over the public expenditure was practically destroyed. For instance, last year the House voted a sum of £3,800,000 for the militia. Of this, a sum of £1,000,000 was not expended upon that force, and of its appropriation the House was yet entirely uninformed. It was most important that something should be done to improve our system of audit.

SIR FRANCIS BARING said, it was quite true that not near £3,800,000 was expended upon the militia last year. Under the Appropriation Act the Government, no doubt, had power to apply a surplus under one Vote to meet a deficiency under another; but he apprehended that this was intended to meet the case of small deficiencies, and that it was never contemplated that so large a sum as £1,000,000 should be transferred from one Vote to another—especially when the surplus had arisen in the militia, which was hardly to be considered a military department at all. The militia was a service the supplies for which ought to be voted by themselves, and not mixed up with the general army Supplies. Acting on old constitutional principles, many hon. Gentlemen were favourable to a large militia force, believing that it would enable the country to reduce the standing army. He wished, before concluding, to ask the Secretary for the Treasury when the promised account of the advance from the Civil Contingencies Fund would be produced?

MR. WILSON replied, that if the public accounts had been kept as well during the last twenty years as they had been during the last five or six, there would have been no difficulty in producing the account referred to the day after it had been moved for. The Treasury had attempted to revise the accounts of the Civil Contingencies for a long series of years past, with the view of showing that the whole of the money voted by the House could be duly accounted for; but, after proceeding with the execution of the task for some time, they found that it was an utterly hopeless one and must be abandoned. They had, however, succeeded in accomplishing their object as far as concerned the last ten years, the whole of the accounts for that period had been balanced to a shilling, and he would have much pleasure in laying them on the table to-morrow. With regard to the question raised by the hon. Member for Lambeth, it was quite true the House had thought fit to entrust the Treasury with the power of applying the surplus of one Vote to the deficiency of another, but only in the same department; and that arrangement had been found of the greatest utility. Indeed, the public service could hardly have been carried on without it. The army and ordnance had this year been united, but the items would be classed under different heads. Thus all those sums which were analogous to the expenditure under the old ordnance department, such as the wages for artificers, charges for barrack furniture, clothing, works, and the like, would form one division; and the surplus under one head would be only applicable to the deficiencies under the same. If it had ever been the rule not to regard the militia as a military service, the last two years had certainly been an exception, for large sums had been granted for the express purpose of rendering the militia an arm of the regular service. As to the supposed sum which had been transferred from the militia Votes, and expended elsewhere, he was not able to give any precise answer until certain accounts had been received from abroad. Meantime, it did not seem probable that £1,000,000 belonging to the militia should have been expended on military departments, seeing that the surplus on the military departments amounted itself to upwards of £2,000,000.

MR. MILNER GIBSON wished to put a question to the hon. Member for Dublin University relative to a Bill on the table connected with considerations of finance. That measure proposed to extend the exemption from the paper duty, now enjoyed by Bibles, Prayer-books, &c., to the educational works used in the University of Dublin; and he wished to know what was to be done with it, and how it was regarded by the Chancellor of the Exchequer? He (Mr. Gibson) had received several communications on the subject.

MR. SPEAKER reminded the right hon. Gentleman that he was discussing a different Order of the Day from the one before the House.

MR. MILNER GIBSON meant to discuss it as a question of finance. One exemption from a particular tax generally gave rise to claims for further exemptions; and the system of granting immunity from the paper duty had lately been enlarged by the Treasury. ["Order!"] He begged pardon, but he intended to observe order. He imagined that any question affecting Ways and Means, or the income of the country, was perfectly regular.

MR. SPEAKER: The House is now discussing a Bill to appropriate the Votes granted in Supply—a question which has nothing to do with Ways and Means.

MR. MILNER GIBSON thought, with all respect, that they were engaged in appropriating Ways and Means, to furnish the Supplies, and that anything tending to diminish those Ways and Means was pertinent to the discussion. However, he would not press the matter further than to inquire of the Chancellor of the Exchequer and the right. hon. Gentleman (Mr. Napier) what course they meant to pursue on this question of finance.

MR. NAPIER wished, if not irregular, to say that the Bill referred to by the right hon. Gentleman contemplated, among other objects, the exemption from taxation of books of the character which had been described. ["Order!"]

MR. SPEAKER: The right hon. Gentleman must postpone his observations until the Order of the Day comes on to which he is referring.

MR. HENLEY, referring to the remarks of the hon. Member the Secretary to the Treasury (Mr. Wilson), said, he wished to ask in what state the accounts were now, and whether there had been any money appropriated, but not accounted for? because to go back for ten years seemed very unsatisfactory.

MR. WILSON said, he did not at all mean to imply that the Votes previous to the last ten years had been misappropriated. Formerly there had been several Paymasters, and it had in consequence been impossible to trace the accounts; but since there had only been one Paymaster and one office, no difficulty had been experienced.

House in Committee.

Clauses 1 to 7 agreed to.

Clause 8,

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, that the clause proposed to repeal two Acts passed in the course of the present Session, and he should like to have some explanation of the matter.

MR. WILSON said, that at the beginning of the present Session an Act had been passed giving the Government power to raise £5,000,000 by way of annuities, and a clause was inserted enabling them to apply this money for Supply services. As this money had not been so applied, it was thought to be the simplest way to repeal the clause of the Act alluded to.

Clause agreed to, as were also Clauses 9 to 29, inclusive.

Clause 30,

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he intended to give the Committee an opportunity of dividing upon this clause, which contained a proviso giving the Government power to apply the amount granted for one service to the exigencies of another service, so long as it was in the same department. In the case of the army and navy the Comptroller of the Exchequer had no control over the sums voted, except in the aggregate—a power which he possessed in all other cases. The House was engaged night after night in discussing the Votes, supposing that the sums they granted would be dedicated to the particular services for which they were voted. But it was no such thing, the Government paid no attention whatever to the rule. He begged to move that the proviso in the clause which gave the Government this power should be struck out.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER hoped the House would not accede to the proposition of the hon. Gentleman. This clause of the Appropriation Act was drawn up exactly in the form in which it had passed since 1832. Before that time the Government had the power of appropriating the whole of the revenue as one Vote; but since then a stricter practice had been introduced under the auspices of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Carlisle (Sir James Graham). It was the duty of the various naval and military departments to keep within the limits of the amount granted by Parliament; but in the event of their exceeding in any Vote, it was permitted to the Treasury to allow the excess of any one Vote to go to another. It was, however, found necessary to make some relaxation, and to provide for the separation of certain Votes in what were called the Army Estimates. In this way a division was permitted to be made somewhat analogous to that which formerly existed between the Ordnance and Army Estimates.

SIR JAMES GRAHAM observed, that his right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer made him responsible for this proviso. But it should be remembered that the proviso was introduced simultaneously with the strict rule of appropriation. The strict application of the rule, as first introduced, was found to interfere with the business of various departments, and some relaxation, therefore, became necessary. Having first recommended to Parliament the more stringent rule, he afterwards proposed the relaxation in question. Subsequently to this relaxation another recommendation was adopted, by which a concurrent audit was provided for; and the effect of this was that annually, with regard to the army, navy, and ordnance, an account, vouched by the Board of Audit, was laid on the table of the House, setting forth any excess beyond the Vote of Parliament permitted by the Treasury to be applied in aid of any other Vote. The objection to this account was, that it came too late to be of service. He would, therefore, ask his right hon. Friend whether he had any objection to communicate to the House at the beginning of each Session, before the Votes of the year were brought in, a statement of every case in which the relaxation was asked and allowed by the Treasury, and also a similar return at the close of the financial year? If his right hon. Friend would give that assurance he thought the arrangement would be satisfactory to the House.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, it was no doubt desirable that information on this subject should be furnished to Parliament at the earliest possible period. That information, however, could not be given in a complete form till the annual audit had taken place and all the transfers had been adjusted. He did not believe, therefore, it would be possible to furnish the accounts in the manner desired by the right hon. Gentleman; but he had no difficulty in saying that, so far as it was possible, he would lay before Parliament from time to time the assents given by the Treasury to applications for relaxation. He hoped that assurance would be satisfactory to his right hon. Friend.

SIR FRANCIS BARING said, he quite agreed with the right hon. Baronet (Sir J. Graham) that some relaxation must be made in the rule of appropriation, as the Government departments could not be conducted without some small concession of this kind. In reply to the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury he (Sir F. Baring) had certainly no positive information to rely upon; but he certainly thought he was justified, from the Government returns themselves, in concluding that the excess of the militia returns had been devoted to the army services, and he should be much surprised if it did not turn out that this was the case.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY should like to know what were the actual powers given to the Treasury by the Bill? Did the clause they were now considering give them power to take the money voted, say, for clothing, and appropriate it to works? He doubted whether the power which the Government possessed under this clause was not enormous, and he thought there ought to be some check upon its exercise. He should be glad to know what power the Treasury really possessed under this clause.

SIR JAMES GRAHAM said, he would answer this question by illustrations drawn from two Votes connected with the Admiralty Department—the one being that for the payment of the wages of seamen—a Vote which the House always granted with the utmost alacrity—the other a Vote for naval works, which was generally regarded with some degree of jealousy by the House. Now let him suppose the Vote for wages to be £2,000,000, while the Vote for works amounted to £500,000, and that in the case of the former there happened to be a surplus over expenditure of £100,000, which the Board of Admiralty desired to apply to make up a deficiency in the latter to a similar amount:—In order to effect that transfer the Board of Admiralty would be obliged to make application to the Treasury, setting forth the reasons for the proposal and asking their assent to its adoption. It was true that this adjustment of the Votes was of rare occurrence, but it was also occasionally of necessary occurrence. The Treasury had, however, that supreme control and authority—and if the reasons were found to be satisfactory, permission was given by the Treasury to make the transfer. That result, however, was generally arrived at towards the close of the year, and although the proceedings connected with it were ultimately brought under the consideration of Parliament, yet nearly twelvemonths must elapse before such was the case. Now that, he considered, to be too long a period for Parliament to remain unacquainted with the appropriation, and he should therefore suggest that at the close of the financial year the Government should lay upon the table of the House all the applications which might have emanated from the different public departments for permission to apply the surplus of one Vote to meet the deficiency of another. Full particulars in these transactions would thus be placed in the hands of the House, generally speaking, within a month of their occurrence; explanations with respect to them might be demanded, and they might be censured or approved of as the House should think fit. That mode of dealing with the subject would, he thought, be found to impose a check of as substantial a character upon Ministers as would be required.

MR. HENLEY said, that no one was better, or, indeed, so well acquainted with this subject as the right hon. Baronet (Sir J. Graham), but he denied that such a return would be any check on the practice; for even if the suggestion of the right hon. Baronet were carried out, these applications and provisions would not come before Parliament until the principal Estimates of the year had been voted, because the Estimates of the great services were almost invariably voted before the close of the financial year. If, for example, £500,000 were voted for buildings and works, and that Vote was exceeded by £100,000 in the following year, another £500,000 would be asked for without the House knowing anything of the previous excess. This was no question of crippling a department, because it was a case of work done and money spent, and the only question was, how the money was to be raised. He doubted whether the excess ought not to come before Parliament and be voted as a supplementary Estimate, when the sum exceeded a certain amount. Parliament would then have the opportunity of considering with the Estimates of the year, how far it chose to give a further sum for the object for which the excess had been incurred.

MR. DISRAELI said, the real question was, what degree of confidence was to be placed in the Administration? A certain degree of confidence must be placed in the Administration, whatever rules the House might adopt, and what they had to consider was the degree. The suggestion of his right hon. Friend (Mr. Henley) certainly went to the root of the complaint; but its adoption would be attended with this great disadvantage, that the great body of the Estimates would then be framed upon an excess model. The fear of coming to Parliament with a Supplementary Estimate would lead the Admiralty and other departments to form their Estimates upon a scale greater than they believed to be necessary for the public service, and it would not be easy for the House of Commons to contend against a system of that kind. He thought that the principle of confidence was a just one, and between the two suggestions of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Carlisle and the Chancellor of the Exchequer, he preferred the offer which the Government had made. It appeared to him that if the plan of the right hon. Gentleman (Sir J. Graham) were adopted the House might find itself voting away the chief Estimates without knowing the excess which might have taken place; but if, when the Treasury allowed the appropriation of the surplus of one department, a document were placed upon the table explaining the circumstances, such a check might not be complete, but would be to some extent satisfactory, and would be likely to prevent any improper conduct on the part of the Administration. Under all the circumstances, he was inclined to accept the offer of the Chancellor of the Exchequer—namely, that in every instance when the Government thus availed themselves of the confidence reposed in them by the Legislature, Parliament should be informed of it by the necessary record being placed on the table of the House. He should prefer this to the scheme of the right hon. Baronet, and he hoped therefore that, subject to this understanding, no alteration would be made in the language of the proviso.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER hoped the Committee would not be under the impression that there was any doubt as to the general enforcement of the rule that each department kept within the distinct Vote taken on account of it. That was the rule imposed on the naval and military departments, and they were not able to depart from it without express permission from the Treasury. Whenever they were desirous of obtaining permission to apply for the purposes of one department the excess upon the Vote taken for another, they had to make out a special case. A letter must be written showing the grounds of the application, and the general rule laid down by the Treasury was, that the case must be shown to be unexpected and urgent. Of course, the Treasury did not share the particular feeling which might animate the department at the moment; they would consider the matter impartially, and would not give their consent unless a fair and reasonable case was made out. These applications were made from time to time during the Session and during the recess. With reference to the remarks of his right hon. Friend (Sir James Graham), there would be no objection to lay before the House, as soon as Parliament met, a return of the applications made to the Treasury since the beginning of the financial year by any of the departments, and the cases in which those applications had been granted, together with the whole correspondence, or an abstract, if necessary. That might be laid before Parliament at the beginning of the Session, and a similar return might be from time to time presented; but he thought it would not be desirable to lay before the House each application as it occurred, unless there was some special ground for it. He hoped his hon. Friend would not divide the Committee on the subject.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, if the right hon. Gentleman would accede to the terms of the right hon. Baronet's suggestion, he would withdraw his proposition. In point of fact, however, if the present system were allowed to continue, it was a perfect farce for the House of Commons to vote certain amounts under certain heads. They might as well vote the whole Estimate for the army in one round sum, and adopt a similar course as to the navy; or they might go a little further, for if the argument of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Disraeli) were carried out, there would be no necessity for any Vote at all, and it would be said, "Let us place confidence in the Government, and leave it all to them."

SIR JAMES GRAHAM said, the Chancellor of the Exchequer would perhaps consider the subject, and embody the suggestion which had been made to him in a proviso, to be added to the clause upon bringing up the report.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER was under the impression that he had acceded to the suggestion of his right hon. Friend, and had promised everything which was wished for. He was not at this moment aware that there would be any difficulty in embodying this suggestion in a proviso, and he should take the subject into consideration.

Amendment withdrawn; Clause agreed to.

Clauses 31 to 35 were also agreed to.

Clause 36, which provides for the appropriation of surplus half-pay.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, there was an expression in the clause which he thought most objectionable. It was enacted that if the sum voted on account of half-pay were more than was necessary Her Majesty—that was, the Government—should be empowered to dispose of such overplus to "officers who are maimed or have lost their limbs in the late wars, or such others as, by reason of their long service or otherwise, Her Majesty shall judge to be proper objects of charity." Now, it was discreditable for the House to adopt such an expression. Officers maimed in the service ought to be provided for in a proper manner, instead of being treated in this way, as "objects of charity."
The Chancellor of the Exchequer

Clause agreed to.

The House resumed.

Bill reported, without Amendment.

APPELLATE JURISDICTION (HOUSE OF LORDS) BILL.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That Mr. Speaker do now leave the chair."

MR. RAIKES CURRIE expressed his acknowledgments to the noble Lord at the head of the Government for bringing on this Bill for discussion as soon as circumstances would permit. The noble Lord said, the other night, that compromises were often expedient, necessary, and justifiable. From that general proposition no Member of the House would dissent, but every individual compromise must be judged on its own merits; and we were bound to ask whether each particular compromise was compatible with principle and honour? Agreement, no doubt, was a good thing, but adherence to conscientious convictions, from which important consequences sprang, was still better. He was not going to raise a discussion as to what category the compromise made by the Government came under, but he wished respectfully to observe that the noble Lord held his seat on the Treasury bench by a compromise. The noble Lord was willingly supported by a great body of persons in that House who, though not agreeing exactly in all their opinions, called themselves generally the Liberal party. This Liberal party, at least an important section of it—the bone and sinew of the party—advocated vote by ballot, a large extension of the suffrage, and the entire abolition of church rates. The noble Lord advocated none of those measures, but manfully maintained his own opinions. The Liberal party long supported the noble Lord in his foreign policy when it was vigorously and continuously assailed, and together with the noble Lord fought the battle of free trade. The Liberal party also remembered, far more than all these things, that when the reputations of experienced statesmen fell scattered around like leaves in autumn, the noble Lord stood firm, nailed his colours to the mast, threw energy into the councils of the Crown, maintained the honour of the country, and restored peace to Europe. Therefore, he was glad by a compromise, which he believed to be honourable to both parties, to call the noble Lord his leader. But to leadership and allegiance correlative duties belonged. A great party could not be knocked down one night and put up another night, whenever it suited the purpose of its leaders so to act. The noble Lord the other night performed an extraordinary manœuvre. Supported by a small band of mercenaries, whom he so designated not from any offensive intention, but because they were persons with respect to whom certain agreeable associations connected with quarter-day would be dissolved if they voted against the noble Lord—supported by this select band, the noble Lord crossed over to the other side of the House, and there, rallying a numerous phalanx, belonging to the Conservative or Tory party, turned round, challenged his own party, and put them to rout. When, next morning, the noble Lord walked over the field of battle, and counted the numbers and examined the bodies of the slain, accompanied by his aide-de-camp, the right hon. Member for Wells—in other words, when the noble Lord analysed the division list, he must have been inclined to say with Pyrrhus, that one more such victory would be his ruin. He hoped the noble Lord did not mean to repeat such a manœuvre to-night. He felt certain the noble Lord could not. The noble Lord had ability and dexterity enough for almost anything, but there was one thing which the noble Lord was told by the highest authority he could not do—namely, serve two masters. The noble Lord must cleave to one and forsake the other; he could not lead the Liberal party in the House of Commons, and do the bidding of Lord Derby, and register Lord Derby's edicts in that House. He had spoken frankly, for, as a real friend of the Government, he was bound to tell them openly what was said by a great number of people behind their backs. He would now address a few words to the House in general on this question. He felt his own inefficiency properly to bring forward this matter, the importance of which could not be exaggerated. The right hon. Leader of the Opposition was pleased to allude to him, the other evening, as being a desultory and independent Member. It was perfectly true that he sat rather loosely to that House, but he would yield to no one in an earnest wish that the House of Commons should hold a high position in the country and in the affections of the people; for he sincerely believed that the danger which beset and was calculated to overthrow any free Government was its popular assembly losing the confidence of the people. Then how, he asked, could that House maintain the confidence of the people if, on a matter deeply affecting the interest of every subject in the realm, the House refused to give it grave and deliberate attention before a Select Committee, and showed an inclination to huddle up the whole business, and hurriedly to register the edict of the House of Lords? His proposition was a most reasonable one, and he hoped the House would assent to it. All sorts of motives had been attributed to him for taking this course; his right hon. Friend the Member for Wells, for instance, had told somebody, he understood, that he was a monomaniac; he had, indeed, put this notice on the paper without consulting any one, but since he had given notice of it, he had received numerous communications from all quarters; and, if the House would grant a Committee, he would engage that it should be attended by men of the greatest eminence, Judges both of Common Law and Equity, who would show that the Bill contained as much mischief and as little good as could well be embodied in the same space of paper. Surely the House of Commons would not refuse to consider calmly and deliberately a measure which infringed on the prerogative of the Crown, and took away the right which he and everybody else had always hitherto considered to be inherent in Her Majesty as Sovereign of these realms, to summon to Parliament any one of her subjects whom she pleased, whoever he might be, to aid her with his counsel. That was a subject grave enough, not only for a Select Committee, but even for the most protracted discussion. No man could be in a position to give an opinion worth anything at all upon it without having first carefully studied the subject. But the Bill dealt with another question also of the greatest possible importance. The construction of an appellate tribunal in the last resort required the utmost care and deliberation, but the hasty and offhand manner in which this Bill had been disposed of was so extraordinary that he was completely at a loss to understand it. He had observed the right hon. Gentleman opposite blandly smiling the other night; no doubt he was hugging himself with the consciousness that his enemies were "delivered into his hand." The noble Viscount at the head of the Government seemed to be somewhat in the predicament of the knight in the old ballad, who made a compact with one who should be nameless—a compact rather opposed to the noble Lord's ideas of free trade, and in which the mortal generally got the worst of the bargain. There had been a good deal of talking and skirmishing the other night, but it all ended in nothing. The debate reminded him of one of those battles of the condottieri in the Middle Ages, where, after a long day's thumping and banging, all ended in nobody being killed and nobody wounded. None of the speeches except those of the noble Lord the Member for London and the right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle went to the point. The lawyers applied themselves to drawing the House away from the real question; just as one might see a partridge fluttering about to draw away attention from her eggs, so the lawyers do their best to lead the House away from the real eggs here. He hoped, however, that there would be a good stand-up fight to-night, and that everybody would speak his mind—as he intended to do. He hoped hon. Members had carefully considered the very remarkable debates on this subject in another place. Did the Bill recommend itself to them by its antecedents? He had heard it stated publicly that Lord Derby had said that in case the proviso of the hon. Member for Malton, saving the prerogative of the Crown, was carried, the Bill might go wherever it pleased; he should not care what became of it. That furnished an important clue as to the real object of the Bill. It was a distinct attempt to limit the prerogative of the Crown. In order to get a clear insight into the antecedents of the Bill it would be necessary to trace its history from the beginning. A short time before the Session began the Government—actuated, no doubt, by a laudable desire to strengthen the appellate tribunal of the House of Lords—created Baron Parke a peer for life. It soon appeared when Parliament met that a hare was to be started. The first to commence the sport was a noble Lord of wonderful activity, on which age seemed to have no effect, and to whom might be applied—slightly altered, the well-known lines of Gray—

"Full oft within those gilded halls,
When he had seventy winters o'er him,
The Lord Chief Justice led the brawls,
While law and reason danced before him."

He was seconded by a noble Earl who never in his life could resist a bit of mischief, and who, from some reason or other, entered heartily into this question. The Government made a good fight, but were beaten. An observation made the other night by the right hon. Member for Carlisle—that there was nothing new in the world—was remarkably applicable to the whole of this affair. It would seem as though the theory of the ship's carpenter in Peter Simple—that everybody would be doing just the same thing as at the present moment 2,222 years hence—had some foundation, and that every thing which passed in the world was merely a repetition of something which had happened before. In Lord Campbell's Life of Lord Nottingham would be found the following passage, which would really seem to show that that eminent man—he was a North Briton by the way—enjoyed the privilege of second sight—

"The Chancellor had the sagacity to see the trap laid for the Government, but he had not the address to avoid it. He could not control the fervour of those friends of the Government who, mad on the question of privilege, disregarded all party predilections, and stood up for their own notions of the rights of their order. During these debates the ex-Chancellor and the reigning Lord Chancellor being pitted against each other, the latter suffered severely."

The noble Lord at the head of the Government had spoken of this matter as a comedy which had been played up to the very foot-lamps, and, following up this curiosa felicitas of the noble Lord, he would endeavour to describe to the House how he viewed this matter in a theatrical point of view. This was about the tableau presented—the Government in a very ridiculous position, Lord Derby committed against the prerogative of the Crown—(not a very pleasant position, he should imagine, for a Conservative leader)—the jurisdiction of the House of Lords condemned by the discussions which had taken place in that House, and Lord Wensleydale in the distance, in bed with the gout,—perhaps the best off of the whole party. He was glad to avail himself of a happy accident which enabled him to quote past events in order to describe present ones. Most hon. Gentlemen in that House no doubt had read the “Imaginary Conversations” of Walter Savage Landor, and he had come into possession of an extract from an imaginary conversation, not written in the elegant English of Mr. Landor, but containing what might, perhaps, be considered to border a little upon slang, which he would beg to read to the House:—

“First Senator: You’re in a fix, and there’s but one in Venice

“Can help you out of ’t, and that I am he “Full well thou know’st; when rogues on the Rialto

“Are growing seedy they’ve an ancient custom—

“Each draws a little bill and each accepts it,

“And then they spout their paper, and the house

“That takes it is done brown (a house we wot of).

“Nobles may learn from knaves—say, do’st thou twig me?

“Second Senator: Alas! too well.

“First Senator: Then, mark me, ‘Villagrande,’

“I, too, have run my head against a wall

“Right at the Doge’s power, of which I boasted

“To be the best, if not the sole defender;

“Yet I will curb this curst prerogative,

“But hide the hand that does so. ‘Campobello’

“(Bellow he’s rightly named) doth roar and bluster

“About his ‘Res decreta,’ but we know

“’Tis worth the ink that writes it, and no more.

“I want a statute with all forms of law;

“We’ll wrap my dig at the prerogative

“In some sham semblance of a law reform,—

“The very cry you’ve started,—and the Commons

“Will toss their noses to the wind, and open

“Full on the false scent and o’errun the true one.

“Old ‘Campobello’ is the man to do it!

“For well he knows so to embalm a rat

“That none shall nose him. Ah! you hesitate,

“But I have more to offer, and, besides,

“Will find some plaister for your broken pate;

“Two golden rings and twice six thousand ducats

“To oil the legal wheels and set them whirring;

“And they shall whirr and whiz on this suggestion

“Down there below, until the wretch who hears them

“Shall stop his ears, and, bothered by their pother, “Surrender at discretion. Here’s a plan

“In which I think you trace a master’s hand.

“Second Senator: But then the Doge, my lord?

“First Senator: The Doge be d—d!

“Sweet ‘Villagrande,’ if you sign this paper

“And do my high behests, I’ll bear you harmless

“Out of this ugly scrape; but if, by Heaven,

“You pause or falter—ere the chimes of six

“Strike on St. Mark’s—I open on the Senate

“And thunder o’er it, till the ‘stones of Venice’

“Turn on their sides to mock thee with their grinning.

“Sign, then!

“Second Senator (with great trepidation): I sign!

“First Senator: Why, there’s a clever fellow!”

[Exit First Senator with the paper in his pocket.]

“Second Senator: The Doge! the Doge!! I fear I have betrayed him!!!”

[Opens the window, gazes on the Grand Canal, shuts the window, and rushes frantically out of the apartment.]

He should be happy to furnish any Gentleman privately with the means of referring to that extract, which appeared to him to be very pertinent to the present case. But to return to the House of Lords, it was not possible to arrive at the second tableau without passing through the green-room and seeing what went on behind the scenes. The position of certain parties in that House reminded him of a theatrical entertainment which he had attended, given by his right hon. colleague, in which a country yokel, or, as he would be called in Kent, “chaw-bacon,” fell among persons who hustled him and picked his pockets. Let the House fancy the President of the Council, got up in the true chawbacon guise, thus treated, and then turned out, evidently very uncomfortable, and looking as if he had swallowed something which he could neither digest nor get rid of, and they would have an idea of the result of the Committee. He now came to the second tableau, which exhibited everybody complimenting everybody else, including the Lord President, who himself did not appear very comfortable, while his colleagues freely admitted that they were completely puzzled, and did not know what had been going on. All, however, were seen occupied in tossing the Bill down upon the table of that House.

He could assure the House that, if he had appeared to treat the subject with levity, it had been because he wished, in the observations which he felt himself bound to make, to avoid giving anything like offence to any one.

“And if I laugh at any mortal thing,
’Tis that I may not weep.”

Every one knew what the real meaning of the Bill was. It was a measure to settle and limit the prerogative of the Crown, and that brought him to another curious part of the case. He had some time back put on the paper a notice of a question which he intended to put to the noble Lord at the head of the Government, with regard to the form in which the measure was to be introduced into that House. His attention had been drawn to the subject by what was stated to have been said by a noble Lord in another place. It appeared that Lord Grey stated that—

“He felt himself bound to express his regret that the Government had introduced this measure in a less formal manner than he believed they ought to have done. By the law and practice of Parliament it had been always usual, when the House was called upon to pass a Bill which limited the prerogative of the Crown, to signify the consent of the Crown, and, as he believed that the Crown at the present moment had the power of creating life peerages which would confer a seat in their Lordships’ House, he believed that the consent of the Crown should have been formally signified before their Lordships were called upon to agree to the present Bill.”

Now, he should have imagined that, if it had been necessary to signify the assent of the Crown, that assent would have been signified at the introduction of the measure; but, instead of that, it was only signified at the third reading. Now, it appeared that another noble Lord (Lord Derby) had said—

“Probably many of your Lordships will agree with me that the Crown had no prerogative to waive, and that, therefore, no Royal consent was necessary; and, undoubtedly, if that consent had taken a more formal shape, and had been communicated to your Lordships as a message, I, for one, should have experienced great difficulty in receiving such a message, and in consenting to the adoption of an address in answer thereto which would appear to imply a recognition of that prerogative.”

This was a very remarkable and pregnant declaration. He thought, therefore, that the compliment might be paid to that House of allowing something like inquiry into the subject. What he wished to impress upon the House was the absolute necessity of referring the Bill to a Select Committee; and if the House consented to adopt that course, he had authority for saying that persons would offer themselves to be examined whose authority every Member of that House would respect, and who ought to be examined upon the subject. As regarded life peerages, he did not agree with what had been said by the right hon. Member for Carlisle; he had hoped that no one in this House would desire to extinguish the power of the Crown to create them. We were all too apt to look upon the phenomena which surrounded us as permanent laws of nature, whereas, in point of fact, they were continually changing. Many opinions of our great-grandfathers appear to us absurd and benighted, so may our own most cherished ones seem to our great-grandchildren. A late Whig nobleman, whom everybody respected, was wont to observe that there were two great prizes which the higher aristocracy of this country did especially covet; one was the garter, the other the lord-lieutenancy. The noble Lord, an experienced judge of human nature, particularly of the class to which he belonged, said that they coveted those great prizes because they were never given to merit. That observation looked very much like irony or satire, but it was nothing of the kind. It might be quite logically and reasonably accounted for. Among the aristocracy the summum bonum was not merit—because merit might be, and was, shared with the base-born, the poor, and the outcast—but great political power, high rank, and enormous wealth; and they valued those honours as the test and proof that they pre-eminently possessed these things. Nor were these remarks inapplicable to the general community, for there could be no doubt that, in comparison with continental nations, the people of England did bow in the most prostrate manner, in the first place to wealth, and next to rank. But was that always to be so? Was the world advancing or was it not? No doubt it advanced very slowly; but he was one of those who believed that it did improve, and, without being over sanguine, he looked forward with confidence to the time—be it twenty, fifty, or a hundred years hence—when men would be more valued than at present for moral and intellectual qualities apart from mere rank and wealth. He believed the day would arrive when it would be important to the House of Lords itself to attract brilliant talents, public spirit, virtue, though unendowed with the gifts of fortune. Now, it would be thought a strange thing if Mr. Macaulay were to be made an hereditary Peer, though his works would live as long as the English language, giving pleasure and instruction to millions yet unborn. And that gallant man who lately returned to England after performing the most heroic deeds—the hero of Kars—would he not be an ornament to any assembly? The power, then, of creating life peerages might remain dormant, but was not one of which he should like to see the Crown deprived, and when they recollected with satisfaction how much younger Her Majesty was than the majority of Members in that House, they would agree with him that the time might come when she might regret the attack now made upon her prerogative, and when her feelings of sorrow might be shared by the House of Lords itself. But, whether life peerages were good or bad, he objected to parting with so important a prerogative of the Crown by a side-wind, and in a manner which left the question in doubt and difficulty. Such was one reason why they ought to refer the Bill to a Select Committee. He now came to what he might call a plunder of the public purse, because everything was a plunder, be the amount £50 or £100, or even as many pence, which could not be justified by necessity. Were these new appellate Judges at £12,000 a year justified by any such necessity? He had letters in his pocket from some of the most learned Judges on the bench, men whose names—if he were to mention them—would command universal respect, all concurring in the statement that hearing appeals only would spoil any Judge. Law, like everything else, was progressive, and to enable a Judge to do his duty it was necessary that he should remain conversant with the practices of the Bar. One of his learned correspondents assured him that he was a different man after the long vacation than when he came off circuit, and that if he were to attend to appeals only he would be good for nothing in the course of two years. Again, one of the highest authorities in that House—one of the most experienced statesmen in the country—had told them that the Bill, if carried, would have the effect of corrupting all the puisne Judges. In point of fact, the Government appeared—but, of course, it was only an appearance—to be angling for the puisne Judges. There were two golden baits in the shape of deputy speakerships, precisely the things which those learned Gentlemen would bite at; for as men advanced in life their great object was to obtain not so much high salaries as a respectable position, dignity, and rather less work. Therefore, another great defect in the Bill, and one which called loudly for inquiry, was that it was likely to debauch the Bench. He now came to what to his mind seemed, however it might strike others, to be the worst feature of the Bill. It was their duty as a Legislature to raise the tone of public feeling and opinion, which they could do only by speaking and disseminating truth, and by being themselves true men. Yet they were asked by the advocates of the Bill to establish a monstrous sham. If the proposed court were to sit, there ought to be inscribed over it a very short but very expressive Saxon word which he would not mention, but of which they could not fail to be reminded by the monosyllable “sham.” The court was to be called the House of Lords. Did they suppose anybody would be deceived by such transparent humbug? It was to sit not as the House of Lords sits, but during the recess of Parliament, and consist mainly of two Deputy Speakers, who could no more be called an integral part of the House of Lords than he himself. The truth was, the Bill was nothing less than a miserable attempt to stave off the discussion of the great question whether the appellate jurisdiction should remain with the House of Lords. The extraordinary speech delivered by the Solicitor General the other night, containing so many assertions and assumptions, filled him with dismay, and sent him home in a state of mind which he would not describe, but which enabled him to understand what the late lamented Dr. Arnold meant when he said that he would sooner see his sons starve than educated for the Bar. He did not wish to libel that noble and glorious profession, and no doubt Dr. Arnold referred to a passage in Burke describing the effect which the practice of the law produced on particular minds. However that might be, he should doubtless now be told that, whatever an ignorant layman like himself might say to the contrary, the proposed court was and should continue to be the House of Lords. That reminded him of a passage in Dean Swift, which he would take the liberty of reading to the House. The Solicitor General maintained that the court was the House of Lords. “Lord Peter,” with scarcely less audacity, asserted that a crust of bread was a leg of mutton:—

“‘My Lord,’ said he, ‘I can only say that to my eyes, and fingers, and teeth, and nose, this seems nothing but a crust of bread;’ upon which the second put in his word, ‘I never saw a piece of mutton in my life so nearly resembling a twelpenny loaf.’ ‘Look ye, gentlemen,’ cries Peter in a rage, ‘to convince you what a couple of blind, positive, ignorant, wilful puppies you are, I will use but this plain argument,—by

—, it is true, good, natural mutton as any in Leadenhall Market; and — confound you both eternally if you offer to believe otherwise!"

Such was the kind of argument with which he expected to be met by the hon. and learned Solicitor General; but, nevertheless, he confidently asserted that the proposed Court could no more be the House of Lords than the three clerks at the table could be the House of Commons, even although empowered by the Bill to sit during the recess, and to exercise certain regulating or taxing powers.

Under all these circumstances he asked the House whether they would give the sanction of an Act of Parliament to this daring infringement of the prerogative of the Crown; whether they would lend themselves to a flagrant job, a wanton and unnecessary inroad on the public purse; whether they would organise a machinery for the corruption of the Judges, — one which at all events must throw suspicion and distrust upon that venerable body; whether they would deliberately establish and inaugurate a solemn sham? If, indeed, they were minded to do all these things, he entreated them to adopt at least the form of an inquiry beforehand.

"Affect a virtue if you have it not."

If they were really prepared so to legislate, let them, he besought them, if only for decency's sake, assume the forms of deliberation; let them grant his Committee. The worst that could happen would be the postponement of the Bill till all had had time for reflection. Then, let bygones be bygones; let them bury in silence and oblivion the miserable antecedents of this miserable measure; treading lightly and walking backwards with something of filial shame, let them cover the frailties and eccentricities of a venerable assembly in another place. Then, at the beginning of another Session, the Commons House of Parliament might proceed with calmness, with dignity, and with that earnest and truthful search for the more excellent way which the subject so entirely demanded, to apply itself to one of the noblest and gravest questions that could occupy the councils of a free people — how best to construct, build up, and establish a High Court of Appeal, appeal final, and in the last resort; to determine the rights, privileges, and property of every corporate body, and of every individual in the kingdom. He trusted that they might rise to the height of their great argument, that they might approach the question in a spirit of wisdom and caution, but, at the same time, firmly and fearlessly, not seeking abstract theoretical perfection by any unnecessary innovation, but, on the other hand, throwing away with scorn the bugbear of a prescriptive jurisdiction, because, digging down to the roots of the constitution, they found amid its gradual growth and its hoar antiquity, that this boasted jurisdiction of the Lords was no part and parcel of the ancient trunk, but a fungus vegetation of yesterday, a mere parasitical excrescence; or, to drop all metaphor and to speak the sober truth — that in the Life of a Commonwealth it was nothing more nor less than an ephemeral usurpation. The hon. Member concluded by moving that the Bill be referred to a Select Committee.

MR. EVELYN DENISON seconded the Amendment. His observations would, he feared, be in painful contrast to the amusing speech of so distinguished a performer as his hon. Friend (Mr. R. Currie), but, as he was suffering from indisposition, which would, perhaps, prevent his addressing the House at a later period of the evening, he should at once trouble it with a few remarks. His hon. Friend had spoken of a compromise. His (Mr. E. Denison's) habits of mind were not in favour of violent measures or extreme opinions, and a reasonable compromise upon a matter of difficulty would be to him rather a recommendation than an objection. Upon examining this subject, however, he could not find in it the elements of a compromise at all. It involved two questions perfectly different and distinct — the prerogative of the Crown to make Peers for life, and the reform of the appellate jurisdiction. Now, it appeared to him that certain parties, having involved themselves in difficulties, had turned round upon an absent one who ought to have been ably represented, and had said, "Let us solve the difficulty by" — doing what? Not by making a compromise, but by totally extinguishing and destroying the prerogative of the Crown to make life Peers; because that was the real effect of this measure. The House of Lords chose to enter upon a contest with the Crown upon the subject of life peerages, and made itself the judge in its own quarrel. That was a very convenient course when you were quite sure that the judgment would be final, and that there would be no appeal from it; but in this case, no sooner was the judgment given than the House of Lords themselves disturbed it by sending that measure to the House of Commons, and so calling on that House to be umpire between themselves and the Crown. He had no pretension to undertake the office of arbitrator—it required great calmness, gravity, and consideration properly to discharge the duties of arbiter in a quarrel of such importance; but as he had read the whole of the Blue-book, and also gone into the entire history of this transaction, he would call the attention of the House to a few particulars, which might assist it in forming its judgment. One circumstance which had struck him most forcibly was the extraordinary contradictions and shiftings of ground which had been exhibited in the course of this affair. In the first instance, when the power of the Crown to grant life peerages was questioned it was announced, with the utmost gravity, in the House of Lords that that House was never more competent to discharge the duties which it was required to fulfil than at the present moment. No sooner, however, was that question decided than it was discovered that the appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords, instead of being in a satisfactory and efficient, was in a most unsatisfactory and very weak and rotten condition; so much so, that it was held by the House of Lords themselves that it was not capable of improvement or restoration by its own power, but that they must apply to the other branches of the Legislature to give it strength. It was said in the Upper House that it would be devoured by a flight of lawyers, and this remark was made at a time when there was no question but of the introduction of a single Lord from the regions of Wensleydale. In a short time, however, it was proposed by the very author of these predictions, that, under this Bill, a whole covey of lawyers should be introduced. These were both striking contradictions; but there was a third more remarkable still. It was said that the appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords was the very essence of the peerage, that it was inherent in the hereditary principle, and very unfavourable contrasts were made between an hereditary Peer and a Peer for life. One noble Lord of great wit, looking to the extreme east for a simile, said that a Peer of the latter class would, after all, be only a “second chop” Peer. Yet, no sooner was the question of the creation of life peerages settled than a noble Lord proposed to make not one, but two or three “second chop” Peers, and to pass over to them from the great body of the Lords this appellate jurisdiction, and to call them the House of Lords, and that they should sit during the recess, exercising the full power and authority of the House of Lords. Really, if a Peer for life created by the Crown—the fountain of honour—deserved such a designation as that which he had quoted, he should like to know what term might not be applied to such a Peer, manufactured with the assistance of the rude hands of the Commons? These certainly struck him as remarkable contradictions, and gave him rather an unfavourable impression of the judgment with which this contest had been conducted. It seemed to him that passion rather than discretion had presided over their councils. He would not enter minutely into the legal question of the right of the Crown to create peerages for life. The hon. and learned Member for Plymouth (Mr. R. Palmer), although favourable to this Bill, had placed the right of the Crown to create life Peers in a light that was quite unanswerable. If the Crown could grant a peerage to A for life, with remainder to B and his heirs, it surely could grant a peerage to A for life simply. With regard to the proposed tribunal, what did the proposed tribunal really amount to? Two Peers for life were to be made, to be selected from the body of the Judges; but the inducements offered to men to fill a rank inferior to that of the hereditary Peers were so inadequate, that men of active minds, and in the full vigour of their faculties, would not take them—they could only tempt members of the judicial bench who were past their vigour, both of body and mind, and whose law would soon become rusty. Yet these life Peers were to have the power of reversing the decisions of the fifteen Judges of the realm who were in the full exercise of their faculties and in the constant practice of the law. Such a Court of Appeal as that would be simply ridiculous. He would, before he sat down, address a few words to the noble Lord at the head of the Government on the position in which that—the Ministerial—side of the House was placed by this Bill. They had arrived near the close of a Session which had been successful and honourable to the noble Lord's Administration. They were proud of the noble Lord as their leader. He had not only been ever foremost in the battle, but had taken more than his share of the daily drudgery of the trenches. The noble Lord, he hoped, was satisfied with his soldiers. Then let him not suffer this miserable Bill to come between them and him at the close of their campaign. The noble Lord's time was fully occupied, but if he could find a moment to look at the division list of the other night it was worthy of the noble Lord's consideration. It showed a large array of his usual supporters who had voted against him on this particular question. They could not enter into that contest with the noble Lord at the end of the Session without great regret and infinite annoyance to themselves; and he ought to spare them that painful necessity. He put it entirely to the good feeling of his noble Friend, and would remain silent on the possible result of driving them to extremities. Let him reflect that there was nobody who said a word in favour of this Bill, in public or in private. In private, indeed, it was criticised very freely. He (Mr. E. Denison) had heard it described by Gentlemen on the other side, as a very bad Bill, which, nevertheless, they were under an obligation to support. He had heard it condemned by a gentleman of the highest authority in even stronger terms—as being, in fact, the very worst Bill that had been introduced into the House of Commons for the last twenty years. That was also his own opinion of it. The noble Lord ought, therefore, hardly to force it through the House against the wish of 140 Gentlemen, many of whom were his warm supporters. An opportunity for inquiring into the matter ought at least to be afforded them. That was the reasonable and moderate proposition which had been made that night; and he felt confident that when the noble Lord came to consider the objectionable nature of this measure, and the position in which it would place him in relation to his supporters, he would not persevere any longer in the course that he had thus far pursued. All they asked was, to be allowed to close the Session and return to their homes with satisfaction and contentment. He trusted that the noble Lord would spare them the painful feelings which a further conflict on this measure must excite, and would accede to the request for inquiry.

Mr. MALINS said, that in the course of a discussion in that House, which arose in August last, on a subject not immediately bearing on the appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords, he drew attention to the grievous evils connected with the exercise of that jurisdiction. Since then the accuracy of the views that he had expressed had been established by the evidence taken before a Committee of the other House, and had also been adopted by the House of Lords itself, as testified by the sending down of the present measure. The intolerable delay and expense attendant upon appeals to the upper House being universally acknowledged, he would pass them by without further remark; but he wished to make a few observations on the nature of the existing tribunal. Now that public attention had been so much turned to the administration of justice, the appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords, exercised by a single Judge, even though by a Judge like Lord Eldon, would not be endured any longer. From the year 1832 downwards, owing to the frequent changes of Ministry following the Reform Bill, there had been collected in the upper House a Lord Chancellor and some two or three ex-Lord Chancellors, so distinguished for ability and learning that their like would never, perhaps, be seen again. The consequence was, that the country had been perfectly satisfied with the administration of justice in an assembly adorned with the presence of three or four such noble and learned Lords. Since then, however, the state of things had gradually changed. For various reasons those eminent men had discontinued their attendance. Lord Lyndhurst was excused by his advanced age, and Lord Brougham was rapidly approaching the period when he could claim the same privilege. Lord St. Leonards, too, although as full of zeal and activity as ever, had not been present to hear appeals during the present Session. The result was that for a large portion of last Session it had been impossible to secure the attendance of more than two law Lords; in the present Session they had never had more than two, and the number had even dwindled down to one. Such a state of things was intolerable. The question arose, then, what was to be done? It was universally admitted that some alteration must take place, and the question was, whether the House of Lords were to retain their present appellate jurisdiction or not. He, for one, should have rejoiced if the House of Lords had consented to relinquish that jurisdiction; but they had determined to retain it; and, although he could not concur in their decision, many distinguished Members of the House of Lords, and many gentlemen of great ability and experience out of that House, thought it essential to the maintenance of the position of the House of Lords that the appellate jurisdiction of that tribunal should be retained. He understood, however, that by the House of Lords was meant the House at large, and as it was well known that their appellate jurisdiction had devolved entirely upon learned Lords, he was unable to understand what connection the maintenance of that jurisdiction had with the position of the House itself. The question the House of Commons were now called upon to determine was what was to be done? Would any man say it was right or proper that the existing state of things should be allowed to continue? At present the Lord Chancellor was sitting alone to hear the most important appeals; and could anything be more ridiculous than to call such a tribunal the House of Lords? There might be some concealed reason, but he could not imagine any substantial reason, for retaining such a system. If he thought there was any reasonable prospect that the House of Lords would part with their appellate jurisdiction, and consent to transfer that jurisdiction to a properly constituted ultimate Court of Appeal, he would vote against the second reading of the Bill, and in favour of the Amendment. He confessed that he had never given a vote that had caused him so much anxiety, and he wished it to be fully understood that he did not give his vote for the second reading because he was at all enamoured of the Bill, but because the evil being great and pressing, he did not see any better remedy available than that which was afforded by this measure. They were now approaching the end of the Session, and if the Bill were referred to a Select Committee it would be virtually "shelved." It could not be expected that the number of law Lords would be increased next year, or that the House of Lords would consent to part with their appellate jurisdiction; and he, therefore, thought the best plan was to endeavour to effect some improvement, so far as it could be accomplished by this measure. Let the constitution of the ultimate Court of Appeal be what it might, they must remember that the rights, privileges, and liberties of all might depend upon it. There were three principal objections to the appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords as it at present existed. The first was, that as the House could only sit as an appellate tribunal during the Session of Parliament, great delay was occasioned; and the Bill proposed to remedy this evil by enabling the appellate Court to sit throughout the judicial year. The expense of proceedings before the House of Lords was also a ground of objection; but that expense would be materially reduced by this measure. The third objection was that the presence of only one law Lord could be secured in the House of Lords when it was sitting in its judicial capacity; but this Bill would secure the attendance at every appeal of not less than three law Lords. It had been said that by this measure a direct blow was struck at the prerogative of the Crown, because it authorised the creation of peerages for life; but it was a complete delusion to suppose that the Bill would in the slightest degree fetter the prerogative of the Crown. The Crown could create as many Peers for life as it might deem fit; but he thought it must be admitted that the House of Lords constituted the proper tribunal to decide who were members of their own body, and that House had decided that a Peer for life was not a Peer of Parliament. How, then, would this Bill interfere with the prerogative of the Crown? It provided that the Crown might create a limited number of Peers for life who should be Peers of Parliament. But that provision did not limit the prerogative of the Crown; in fact, it left the prerogative just where it was before, and merely provided that, with the consent of the House of Lords, a certain number of Peers created for life might have the privilege, which they did not now possess, of sitting in that House. There was a general concurrence of opinion in the House that the court of appeal, whatever it might be, should consist of at least three judges, and in that opinion he agreed. The noble Lord the Member for the City of London and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Carlisle (Sir J. Graham) seemed to think that Peers for life would not be on a footing in power to that occupied by hereditary Peers ; but he believed they were mistaken in that view, and that there would be no more distinction between life and hereditary Peers than there was between Scotch and Irish representative Peers and those who sat in their own right. It would be for the advantage of the public and of the profession to which he belonged, if the appellate jurisdiction remained with the House of Lords, that these peerages to some extent should be for life and not by inheritance. The right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle had remarked that the profession of the law was as profitable now as it ever had been. But he (Mr. Malins) ventured to assure him that if he would inquire he would find that the recent alteration in the law, however beneficial to the public generally, had not been so to the Bar, and that the income of both juniors and leaders had been considerably diminished. Undoubtedly the profession of the law generally did not yield such incomes as would provide a sufficient number of men able to sustain the honours of the hereditary peerage. Now, it was essential that there should be men of the legal profession in the House of Lords, for it would be a calamity of no common kind if there should be left only the Lord Chancellor as the representative of the legal profession in that House. Though it was sometimes said there were too many lawyers in the House of Commons—and perhaps so said correctly—yet how could they expect to deal efficiently with legal questions if they had no lawyers of experience to guide them with their opinions ? But if their presence was essential in the House of Commons, how much more so in the House of Lords ? At the present moment there were only four or five of the legal profession in the Upper House, three of whom were above seventy years of age, and in such circumstances was it not necessary to make provision for the presence of a sufficient number of law Lords ? In this point of view it seemed to him important that Parliament should concede to the Crown the power of creating a certain number of Peers for life who should be entitled to seats in the House of Lords ; and therefore he supported the present Bill as a practical measure, though he would gladly have seen a better remedy provided. A good deal had been said about retaining the appellate jurisdiction in the House of Lords ; but, really, when they found that this court was to sit when Parliament was not sitting, and that it was to consist of a particular body of persons, the most staunch friends of the principle of appellate jurisdiction would have to admit that in substance the thing was gone. When the public knew that in November, December, and January there were three law Lords sitting to hear appeals, well knowing that Parliament was not sitting, they would say, " This is not a House of Legislature, but a court of justice." They were told that they ought to have more information ; but what further information did they want ? No information was required as to the imperfections of the present system ; he was sure most people thought it would be desirable that the House of Lords should give up the jurisdiction they now possessed ; there was at present no prospect that they would consent to give it up ; but if in a few years they felt that the body constituted by the Bill was a distinct body, they might be induced to part with in name what they had already parted with in substance. Was there not a probability that the Lords would gradually, by gentle degrees, be induced nominally to give up that which they had already actually and substantially given up ? The Bill was a great advance in this respect—that it secured the attendance of a proper number of competent Peers ; because he took it for granted that the noble Lord in filling up the offices about to be created would have nothing in view but the due administration of justice ; he did not expect that any jobbery would take place. He entirely objected, however, to that part of the Bill which limited the choice of the Crown in filling up these judicial offices ; and he had given notice of an Amendment in Committee for its removal. He agreed with the right hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle that the Government ought not to have it in their power to hold out inducements of those appointments to the puisne Judges. The chiefs of the common law courts were commonly selected from the Bar ; and although Lord Cranworth had held a judicial office before his appointment as Lord Chancellor, yet five Lord Chancellors out of six were also chosen directly from the Bar. What an absurdity would it be to allow the head of a tribunal to be so chosen, while the inferior judges could only be selected from the holders of judicial offices ! There could be no reason for the exclusion of the law officers of the Crown. He strongly objected to this restriction as unnecessary, and even the Solicitor General, the only witness who recommended it to the Committee, did not, he believed, adhere to the opinion he then expressed. There were some other parts of the Bill to which he also objected. [Ironical cheers.] He understood that cheer to mean that his was, after all, but a faint support of the Bill. He admitted that he thought something better might have been done, but, considering the magnitude of the evil, and the necessity for an immediate remedy, which this Bill provided, he could not support the proposition to get rid of it by sending it before a Select Committee.

MR. CARDWELL said, he was anxious to join his voice to those who made the moderate and reasonable request that before they committed themselves to irrevocable legislation on this momentous question a pause should be allowed for inquiry and investigation. What were the circumstances usually held to constitute a case for a Committee of Inquiry ? When for a great and admitted grievance a remedy was proposed which even its advocates declared to be imperfect and unsatisfactory, the course adopted by this great inquest of the nation was to pause and inquire, and, through the agency of a Committee, to obtain the information necessary to enable them to arrive at a wise conclusion. What were the circumstances of the present case ? At the latest period of the Session, at the time of the introduction of the Appropriation Bill, a measure had been sent down from the other House dealing with the constitution of the other House, with prerogatives of the Crown, and with the rights and interests of every member of the community. They had been asked why they were so anxious to defend the prerogatives of the Crown ; but it was one of the privileges of the free Government under which they lived that no man could remain an adviser of the Crown who did not enjoy the confidence of the popular branch of the Legislature, and it followed as a corollary from that position that the prerogatives of the Crown were part of the inheritance of the people, and must therefore be faithfully guarded by them. The hon. and learned Gentleman who spoke last (Mr. Malins) said that the Bill did not limit the prerogative of the Crown: no, because according to him there was no prerogative to limit. No one disputed that the Crown could create life Peers, but it was a great question whether or not Peers so created could take their places and vote as Members of the House of Peers. With that question the Bill before them dealt, and if it dealt ambiguously and uncertainly with it, the reason for inquiry was so much the stronger. The hon. and learned Gentleman had himself furnished them with other and abundant reasons for deliberation. The Lords, in the hon. and learned Gentleman's opinion, did not understand the Bill ; and their determination not to part with their judicial status was his reason for supporting the Bill which took that status from them. The hon. and learned Gentleman stated that the House of Lords had passed the Bill for the purpose of preserving their appellate jurisdiction ; yet he also said that this very Bill did away in fact and substance with that appellate jurisdiction. If there was such doubt and contradiction upon the face of the Bill, even to the apprehension of its supporters, surely time and opportunity for investigation should be given before the House of Commons gave it their sanction. The hon. and learned Gentleman had given notice of an Amendment to strike out one of the most important provisions of the Bill—that applying to the persons from whom the new tribunal was to be selected ; and there were also other portions of this short Bill to which he objected. The advocates of the Bill had, indeed, much reason to exclaim, after hearing the hon. and learned Gentleman's speech, " Save me from my friends !" while those who were less favourably disposed towards the Bill found in it additional reasons for demanding more time for its consideration. Under what circumstances had this Bill come down to the House, and how had the Bill been received in debate ? Upon the Opposition side of the House but little had been said, and silent votes had been given in favour of the Bill. Upon that (the Ministerial) side of the House the strongest speeches and the most earnest votes had been given against the second reading. As yet the guardians of the Queen's prerogative in that House had taken no part in this discussion. He mentioned this with pleasure, for the demand for more careful inquiry was so reasonable that he hoped the Government would see the wisdom and propriety of consenting to it. Again, what had been the statements made by the supporters of the Bill? What Member who had spoken in its favour had failed to condemn it. The Attorney General spoke of it as a mode of getting out of a difficulty. The hon. and learned Member for Plymouth (Mr. R. Palmer) described the Bill as weak and unsatisfactory in its details, and said that if the Bill passed, appointing only two Judges, whose salaries did not exceed those of the puisne Judges, it would be a miserable failure. The other hon. and learned Member for Plymouth admitted that the Bill was capable of improvement. The Solicitor General wished that its basis was larger, and reserved himself for Amendments in Committee. These were the speeches in favour of the Bill. When they heard it so "damned with faint praise," not by one, but by all its advocates, was it not a serious warning to the House to pause? Ought a measure and so important a measure, for which no more could be said, to be hurried through the House at the fag-end of the Session? What was it, indeed, that they were going to do? Law reform was greatly demanded by the public, and the House of Commons were devoting a great deal of time and attention to the subject. What was the keystone and head of the column but the constitution of that appellate tribunal to which all legal cases were taken, and the decisions of which were themselves the models and the unwritten law by which all the inferior tribunals were guided? The House had delayed one measure of law reform on the ground that there was no use in going on with it until Parliament had settled the constitution of the final Court of Appeal. That certainly was not an argument for passing the present Bill in haste, but for making that Court of Appeal as perfect as possible, and for carefully considering every step for reconstituting it. He would ask the House to remember what was the present situation of the supreme appellate jurisdiction of the country? At present there were two Courts of final Appeal—the Committee of Privy Council and the House of Lords. Was it wise for any community to have two Courts of final Appeal? or, rather, was it not a question for the House of Commons to consider whether it would be wise to maintain two Courts of Appeal, and whether it would not be possible to create one Court of Appeal, composed of all the wisdom of the law and conciliating all the confidence of the public? The Court that gave universal satisfaction, not one of whose decisions had been complained of—the judicial Committee of the Privy Council—was entirely ignored by the Bill: in truth, as it seemed to him, the Bill evidenced a future intention of entirely getting rid of that tribunal. What ought to be the general principles of a first tribunal and of a tribunal of appeal? Was it not manifest that the principle of a first tribunal was the great individual responsibility of the Judge, and of the Court of Appeal, that it should embrace the collective wisdom of the wisest and most experienced Judges? If these two principles were sound, he would ask the House to consider the state of the tribunals of the country as they would be left if this Bill was passed. Take a case in equity. A case opened in chambers was adjourned into Court, and heard by a Vice Chancellor. An appeal lay from the Vice Chancellor to the two Lords Justices sitting with the Lord Chancellor. From their decision an appeal then lay to the tribunal in the House of Lords, proposed to be constituted by that Bill, where it would be reheard by three Judges, one of whom (the Lord Chancellor) was one of the very Judges who had heard the matter in the Court below. Here were four stages of appeal, constituting an amount of vexation, anxiety, and expense which, if it were premature to condemn, were at least matter for most reasonable inquiry. [Mr. MALINS: There is no appeal from a Judge in chambers. The case is adjourned from chambers.] Then take a case of common law—here the matter was still worse. The matter was first tried before one Judge, and was then heard before a full Court. It was then heard in the Exchequer Chamber, and thence removed to the House of Lords. Was it not matter most worthy of careful investigation, whether all these appeals were necessary for the due distribution of justice, or whether they were not accompanied by an amount of vexation and expense upon the suitor, from which it was the duty of that House to relieve him? The appellate tribunal was to be composed of the Lord Chancellor and the two Deputy Speakers—a court of three. That was the number of the Judges in the Court of Equity, from which the appeal was brought. Take the common law appeal. The Queen's Bench might be unanimous. Their decision might be affirmed by the ten other Judges in the Exchequer Chamber, and from the whole body of the common law Judges the appeal would be to the Lord Chancellor and the two Deputy Speakers sitting in the House of Lords. Was that obviously a wise and practical arrangement, or did they think that a plaintiff who had had the opinion of the fifteen common law Judges in his favour would be satisfied if their decision were reversed on a final hearing before the three Judges of the appellate tribunal, not one of whom might have practised in or presided over a common law Court? There were a number of other questions, all of the most important practical bearing, and every one of which not only deserved, but ought to command the most careful inquiry on the part of the House. There was, for example, the question of Scotland. The Dean of Faculty, the Lord Justice General, a most able man, with whom they were well acquainted as a Member of that House, and other influential persons, represented that provision ought to be made for Scotland by this Bill. Yet no provision was made for that subject by this Bill; and, surely, it was a matter well worthy of consideration. Then, again, as to India and the Colonies, he would submit it was a grave question, whether something might not be done to alter the state of the law of appeal as it affected those great countries. There had been also a petition presented to that House from a person of great weight and authority—Lord Wensleydale—which deserved consideration. It was not the habit of that House to deal lightly with the interests of private individuals, when it was represented their interests would be affected by public legislation, and certainly in this case that petition was well deserving of consideration. Did the House, by proceeding at once with this Bill, intend utterly to reject that petition? He would remind the House that the whole subject to which the Bill referred had been considered at length in another place, and occupied so much time that it was only now, at the close of the Session, that it had been brought under their attention. The hon. and learned Member who spoke last had said, that this was a matter for the House of Lords, as it altered and affected its constitution; but he (Mr. Cardwell) said, it was a matter for the House of Commons, as it affected the fortunes, the property, and the wellbeing of all the Queen's subjects. Then, was not that a strong argument in favour of a deliberate minute inquiry on the part of the House of Commons into that which had occupied the attention of the other House for so long a period? When it was stated by the last speaker that it was necessary to pass this Bill, because the House of Lords would consent to no other, he would observe that there was another consideration which should not be lost sight of. Judging by the terms in which the hon. and learned Gentleman had spoken of the appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords, of its imperfect constitution and consequent working of mischiefs, and that it was necessary for something to be done, he (Mr. Cardwell) did not believe the House of Lords would offer an impregnable resistance to any wise measure of reform which had been well considered and well supported by the House of Commons. So far from feeling the force of the implied threat of the hon. and learned Gentleman, he drew a completely opposite inference. The true conclusion was, that the exigencies of the case were such, that not only the House of Commons, but the House of Lords also, would feel themselves called upon and obliged to adopt some wise and deliberate legislation on the question. But, if the House was to be called upon to give its sanction to a mere stopgap measure, which would be regarded as its opinion of what was a reform adequate to the occasion, then a pretext would be furnished for an allegation, that all the mischiefs to which the hon. and learned Gentleman had referred had been cured by this Bill, to which the House of Commons had given its concurrence; and it would be remembered against them, that an appeal made to the House of Commons to take time for a deliberate inquiry had been overruled; that they had precipitately adopted a crude and imperfect measure, strongly condemned on the one hand and faintly supported on the other; and their own act of precipitancy would be the answer given to any future demand for further measures of improvement.

MR. WIGRAM said, he did not see any necessity for referring this Bill to a Select Committee, for he did not recollect any subject discussed in that House on which so much information appeared to have been generally attained. Every speaker, including the right hon. Gentleman who had just spoken, appeared to be acquainted with the details of the subject, and well qualified to deal with it. He gathered from the speech of the right hon. Gentleman, that we were not to touch the appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords until we had reviewed the whole system of our jurisprudence, and adapted a Court of Appeal to it. But if all collateral questions were to be discussed before we dealt with that of the Court of Appeal it would be years before the question was settled. The subject would get into the same unfortunate condition as the proposed reform of the Ecclesiastical Courts. Year after year, a reform had been promised in those Courts, the imperfections of which were admitted on all hands; but immediately any specific remedy was suggested, so many objections to it were raised that the evils which all admitted remained untouched. It was from an earnest desire to get rid of an admitted evil of magnitude in the present constitution of the Court of Appeal that he should give his assent to going into Committee on this Bill at once. Many hon. Gentlemen had been led astray from the main question. The Bill contained one leading point and several details, and those who were ready to concur in the main point, should not hesitate to go into Committee and consider the details. The main point proposed was the creation of two more salaried officers in the House of Lords, and there, in his apprehension, the principle of the Bill stopped. As to the question whether the appointments were to be confined to persons who had filled judicial offices, or were to extend to the profession at large, that was a matter of detail for consideration in Committee, and he was himself prepared to leave the appointments open to the profession at large. The question of salaries would be easily adjusted in Committee. The question of life peerages had nothing to do with the principle of the Bill. It, indeed, gave power to Her Majesty to create certain life peerages. But it would not be necessary that the new judicial officers should be made life Peers; and it was matter of detail whether to retain this power. The only other matter of detail was whether the judicial department of the House of Lords should sit during the vacation of Parliament; and that was open to consideration. He thought the most convenient course would be to modify the clause and to provide that the House of Lords might, if it thought fit, appoint a Committee to hear appeals, with authority to sit during the recess. The Bill only intended to supply the deficiency of Law Lords, which by aid of the retired Chancellors had, until now, constituted the Court of Appeal in the House of Lords. But the object of the opponents of the Bill evidently was to abrogate the appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords altogether.

ther. To that he was entirely opposed; and he was of opinion that it would be far better to improve the existing tribunal of the House of Lords, than to create a new Court of Appeal. As to transferring all appellate jurisdiction to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, he thought hon. Gentlemen were carried away by the reputation of the existing Committee of the Privy Council. He did not wish to say anything disrespectful of that Court during any period of its existence, but he had known that tribunal from its very commencement, and it was a mistake to suppose that it gave the same satisfaction during the first years of its existence that it did now. The real fact was, that its reputation was coincident with its being joined by a right hon. Gentleman, to whom allusion had often been made in these debates, who, on leaving the Bar, gave his assistance to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, and with the aid of his eminent abilities the decisions of that body had since given great satisfaction. Besides which, they had had the aid of the Lords Justices, two most eminent Judges, and of Dr. Lushington. Now by this Bill it was proposed to do with the House of Lords what was done when you constituted the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. The old Committee of the Privy Council gave dissatisfaction, and a remedy was applied by an Act of Parliament which constituted the existing court, which had been so lauded. If the same good fortune attended a new constitution of the House of Lords the same result would follow. But everything in each case depended upon the working of the Bill by the Government, and the appointments they made. They should select the best men—those whom the country and the profession considered the best. If the appointments were made from political considerations or private feeling—if the very best men who could be found were not appointed to these situations—this scheme and every scheme would prove worse than useless. He should assume with regard to this Bill, as he must, that the Crown meant to exercise the power given to it in the best manner that it could, and he should vote for going into Committee upon it. In Committee he should suggest that the House of Lords be asked to delegate its judicial functions to a Committee of their body, who should hear appeals in the same manner as the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. Reserving to himself full liberty with regard to the details of the Bill, he should support the Motion for going into Committee.

MR. GLADSTONE: I hope the House will excuse me if I attempt to detain them for a very few moments on a question of an interest and importance so extraordinary as that now before us. I have to regret—although this may be a pledge to the House that I shall not long occupy their attention—that, owing to indisposition, I have been prevented from hearing many of the most effective speeches which have been delivered by persons intending to object by their votes to the Bill now under consideration. I have, however, been fortunate in hearing several speeches delivered by men of great eminence in favour of the Bill; and, as an opponent of the Bill, I am bound to say that I have every reason to be satisfied with those speeches, and that, if any doubt had remained on my mind with respect to the inexpediency of proceeding with a measure of this character under present circumstances and at this time, the speeches which I have heard from eminent Members of the legal profession, who thought they were speaking on behalf of the Bill, and who intend to support it with their votes, would have sufficed to remove the very shadow of such a doubt. I take the speech with which the hon. and learned Attorney General introduced the Bill. He ran over the scale from top to bottom, reciting all the objections which might be urged against it; but he did not attempt to extenuate the force of one of them—he did not enter into any reasoning or statement of facts to show that any one of them was unfounded or exaggerated—but to one and all he replied by declaring that the present evil was vast, intolerable, and insufferable; that he had nothing else to offer but this Bill, and that the House had no option but to pass it. I am bound to say that I do not think the House of Commons is reduced to such a sorry pass as that when a question of this kind is presented to it, touching most nearly the very foundations of one House of Parliament—touching most delicate matters with respect to the prerogative of the Crown—and also involving most important topics with respect to the administration of justice—I say, when such a question is presented to the House at a time when the Appropriation Bill has begun to run its rapid course, I do not think the House is reduced to such a pass that every reason is to be confuted, every authority to be silenced, every argument to be set aside, and every objection to be met by the simple statement that the present condition of things is intolerable, and that the House has no choice but to accept what is offered to them. This, indeed, is paying but a very bad compliment to the House of Lords. What says the hon. and learned Member for Wallingford (Mr. Malins)? I hope every Gentleman in this House has heard his speech, which was worthy of the eminent position which that hon. Gentleman holds in his profession. The hon. and learned Gentleman thought it beneath him to make an uncandid statement of his views, and I thank him for his candour; but, at the same time, I hope he will not think it unfair on the part of those who are friendly to further inquiry to take what they consider a just advantage of his statement of the grounds on which he intends to vote for the Bill. In the first place, the hon. and learned Gentleman said that he never had so much difficulty in making up his mind, and he described the oppression on his breast with respect to the vote he should give. Really, that part of his speech sounded like an appeal to our sympathy and compassion; and I assure him that if he will simply alter his intention with respect to his vote—as he may in perfect consistency, as all the substantial arguments he urged were against the Bill—he will find all those disagreeable feelings he has referred to immediately disappear, and he will pass at once from a state of trouble to a condition of ease and tranquillity, with the perfect consciousness that he has done a real service to his country. The hon. and learned Gentleman says he entirely objects to the retention of the appellate jurisdiction by the House of Lords, and he thinks that there is not the slightest doubt that, when three gentlemen are found sitting in some corner of the House of Lords during the prorogation, the public will begin to perceive that the appellate jurisdiction is reduced to a fiction. Therefore, he says, as a practical man, that, inasmuch as he perceives that this Bill destroys the substance of the appellate jurisdiction, though it does not professedly go the whole length of his opinion, which is in favour of destroying the shadow as well as the substance—yet, because it leaves only the shadow, he accepts the Bill. After that it was with some surprise that I heard my hon. and learned Friend the Member for

Cambridge University (Mr. Wigram) get up and say that he entertained some suspicions that the opponents of this Bill—that is to say, those who are against proceeding with it at present—harboured ideas unfavourable to the retention of the appellate jurisdiction by the House of Lords. I know not whether there is any great disloyalty to the prerogative of the House of Lords with respect to the appellate jurisdiction on the part of those who recommended further time for consideration; but I am quite sure that no one can entertain more dangerous views in reference to that matter than the hon. and learned Member for Wallingford. Now, I know not in what sense the noble Lord at the head of the Government was about to address the House on this question when he rose; but I never was more strongly convinced of the reasonableness and moderation of any proposition than I am of the reasonableness and moderation of the request contained in the Amendment before the House. It is not pretended that this is anything else but an Amendment, which, if carried, must for the present Session put an end to the Bill; and I seriously ask whether, in the present period of the Session, and under the circumstances in which we stand, we are fit to open up all the great questions which this Bill involves? Does not even decency require—I will not say duty to our constituents—but does not even that decorum, which our constituents have a right to demand that we should observe, require that for some short weeks we should deliberate on a question of this kind, before finally committing ourselves to an arrangement over which our control ceases when once we adopt it? What questions are involved in it? If we were to consider only the private rights of Lord Wensleydale, I must confess it is not too much to say that we ought well to scrutinise our proceedings before we venture to damage those rights which, he contends, have been created by a solemn act of the Queen, and which it may be in his power to submit to a court of law. Is it not desirable that time should be taken to reconcile the serious discrepancies among the supporters of this Bill? The Bill has been objected to as a compromise; and the answer made is, that many great measures of former legislation are founded on the basis of compromise. That is most true; but are those compromises on which these great measures are founded, of a character analogous to the compromise in respect to this Bill? Of the former kind of compromises, it may be said that they are always arrived at after great deliberation, and when, by repeated discussions, you have well tested the state of the public mind and judgment, and the strength, not only of parties, but of arguments, so that you are enabled, on the whole, to come to a conclusion most agreeable to the general interests, and which commanded the confidence of every party. Is that the case here? On the contrary, this compromise is of a totally different character, and one which those who support it support without approval, either in consequence of the imaginary horrors conjured up by the Attorney General, or with the declaration of an intention of altering the Bill in Committee, as intimated by the hon. and learned Member for Wallingford—a declaration creditable to his acumen and candour, but which, if acted upon successfully, would obviously be fatal to the character of the Bill as a compromise. Compromise it may be, but it is entirely different from those respectable compromises which represent the conscientious conclusions of men after full investigation and deliberation. It is a compromise huddled up for the convenience of parties in some Committee-room in another place, then brought down to the House of Commons, and presented to us for our acceptance in such a shape, and under such circumstances, that it is not too much to say that if we pass this Bill, in the wretched sag-end which remains of the present Session, we shall be doing nothing short of abdicating our functions as legislators. Most of the points which concern this matter have been already treated with so much ability that I need not trouble the House by going over them again; but there is one point in particular to which I venture to call the attention of the House, because it affords a very strong ground of objection to proceeding with the Bill during the present Session. It is said that this Bill may be amended in its details. It is, however, sometimes difficult to judge what are details. If this Bill is a compromise, it is eminently desirable to know what are the essential parts of the compromise. If you take the lax and latitudinarian doctrine of the hon. and learned Gentleman who has just sat down, it appears that there are no essential parts in the compromise except the creation of two great salaried officers of the House of Lords, and anything else may either be excluded or inserted. If, again, you were to adopt all the alterations suggested by the hon. and learned Member for Wallingford, I know not what security he gives that, after we have passed the Bill on the footing of a compromise, it would not then be rejected in another place as being something different from what was intended—as not representing the compromise. This I may assume, that if there is any one part of the Bill which is the essence of the compromise, it must be that portion which bears on the prerogative of the Crown. I take it for granted that the whole aim and object of the compromise were to save the consistency and to reconcile the opinions of those who were placed in conflict with respect to an important prerogative of the Crown, asserted by a minority and denied by a majority in the House of Lords. I therefore assume that the Bill represents the sense and spirit of that compromise with respect to the prerogative of the Crown. Well, what does the Bill say and do with respect to that prerogative? Is there any man who will answer me that question? I wish I had heard the noble Lord at the head of the Government deliver his authoritative judgment as to the effect of this Bill on the prerogative of the Crown. I did not hear the Attorney General express his opinion, nor do I believe that the Solicitor General—though I did not hear his speech—declared his opinion upon this point. This question is touched mainly in the fourth clause. I do not presume to give any opinion with respect to the important inquiry whether the Crown is entitled to create life Peers of Parliament or not. I do not dispute the doctrine of my hon. Friend the Member for Wallingford, that the House of Lords was acting within its competency when it thought fit to take a proceeding which had the effect of negating the exercise of that prerogative. But on the other hand, I think it is perfectly plain that, when we are called upon to legislate upon the matter of life peerages, the House of Commons is entitled, nay bound, to have an opinion with respect to that prerogative. The claim I make is this—and I think it is a resistless argument in support of the Motion of my hon. Friend—that we shall be permitted to deal with this question of prerogative in the daylight, and not in the dark. If we are about to limit the prerogative, let us know it; or if we are about to save it, let us know that it is saved. It is quite plain that it would be unworthy of the framers of a Bill to propose to this House a measure couched in terms of studied ambiguity in reference to that point, and, if there could be a man who would frame a Bill for the purpose of deluding the House, it would be unworthy not only of our dignity, but of our intelligence, to allow ourselves to be taken in by such a delusion. This Bill says, in the fourth clause, that if Her Majesty shall have granted a peerage for life to any person who shall be appointed Lord High Chancellor or Deputy Speaker, such person shall be entitled to receive a writ of summons as a Peer of Parliament. I do not now animadvert—because it is a point of secondary importance—upon the somewhat indecorous if not unconstitutional course of providing by Act of Parliament for the compulsory exercise of the Queen's prerogative with regard to the issuing of a writ of summons; I do not enter into that question now, because it is possible that it may be amended as a verbal question in Committee; I simply confine myself to the meaning of the clause. I find here a clear enunciation in an Act of Parliament, that when Her Majesty shall have granted a peerage for life to a Lord High Chancellor or Deputy Speaker such person shall receive a writ of summons as a Peer of Parliament as a matter of right. Is not the maxim inclusio unius exclusio alii, I ask, most clearly applicable in this case? If you say that a person receiving an appointment as Deputy Speaker, with a peerage for life, shall be entitled to sit in Parliament, do not you thereby inevitably and irrevocably declare that no other person appointed a Peer for life shall be entitled to sit in Parliament? If there be any doubt on the matter, turn to the 6th clause which says that nothing shall in any wise abridge or affect the right of Her Majesty to appoint other Deputy Speakers than life Peers. If you mean to preserve the prerogative of the Crown to appoint life Peers of Parliament, why do you not say, in like manner, that nothing shall in any wise abridge or affect the right of Her Majesty to appoint life Peers? Do you mean to preserve the right or not? If you do not mean to preserve it, let us know that we are proceeding on that basis. You have granted the right of appointing other Deputy Speakers besides the two to be appointed under this Bill; you have also granted the right of appointing four life Peers of Parliament under this Bill, and I want to know why, while preserving the right to make other Deputy Speakers you do not preserve the right to make other life Peers? Taking this fourth clause in connection with the rest of the Bill, I say that if you meant to enact an absolute extinction of any claim on the part of the Crown to exercise such a prerogative, you have done it most effectually here. Look at the first proviso in the fourth clause, "Provided always" (and I beg the attention of the Government to this point) "that not more than four persons shall have seats in the House of Lords at one time as Peers for life only." Are there any words in the English language which could more clearly express a Parliamentary declaration that the number of four Peers for life was to be the absolute maximum fixed by law? It may be right that that should be so; I do not enter upon that point; but, if we are to deal with a compromise on this question, I think we have a fair claim to know what is the meaning of that compromise. If you say that we must not inquire—that all we have got to do is to vote, it is not too much that before we vote we should ask you to explain to us what it is that we are going to vote. But even if we had before us an explicit and satisfactory declaration as to the question of life peerages itself, I should still be precluded from giving my vote in favour of this Bill without further inquiry by the simple consideration of the manner in which it deals with that great question. I think it is impossible that there could arise in this country a graver question than that involved in the creation of Peers for life. It may be that that question has been hastily and inconsiderately raised. That, I confess, is my own opinion, but the fact that it has been inconsiderately raised does not justify us in inconsiderately fixing and fastening it down by legislation. I can see great force in the argument for peerages for life. Your peerage, meant to be transmitted to remote descendants, is no doubt much connected with the possession of large property in all cases, except those where the personal distinction is so great as to render it nugatory to inquire what property the person raised to the peerage possesses, that it is a matter of great importance to consider whether in the professions from which you now-a-days mainly feed the peerage there is a fair chance of the acquisition of such a property by the persons distinguished in those professions as will make it desirable, either for their own sakes or for the sake of the country, that they shall have peerages transmissible to their descendants: that is a matter of great importance, and above all it is a matter on which this House has a right to ask for some time to deliberate. On the other hand, there are the considerations so powerfully stated by my right hon. Friend the Member for Carlisle (Sir James Graham) the other night. This is an opinion which we must all entertain—that it is better not to open this question of life peerages until we are prepared to deal with it in a manner which shall probably both open and close it. I do not mean close it in such a manner that it cannot be opened again, for of such doctrines we are not accustomed to hear much here, nor do I think their reasonableness is very generally admitted; but it will be allowed that the subject of life peerages is one which, if it be made the basis of a legislative measure, ought so to be dealt with that it shall both give satisfaction to the public mind at the time, and shall bear upon itself such marks of deliberation and adaptation to the wants of the period in which we live, that, at any rate, we shall have the chance afforded to it of a fair consideration without a perpetual recurrence of agitation. Does this Bill, I ask, fulfil this reasonable condition? It is quite plain that this measure opens the question of life peerages; but it deals with that question in entire and exclusive subservience to the constitution of a court of appeal. Surely that is not the scope to which the question of life peerages is confined? Is there anything in the question of life peerages which has any inevitable relation with a court of appeal? On the contrary, will any man tell me that you cannot constitute a court of appeal without touching the question of life peerages? These two great subjects stand in no such relation to each other as that one of them ought to be made the accessory and the victim, so to speak, of the other. If the House will recall the precedents which have generally guided its conduct on great constitutional questions, I am confident it will never consent to pass, without due inquiry, a measure on the subject of life peerages, which fixes us with the responsibility of understanding the full importance of the subject, and of all the possible consequences which may flow from it, and which raises the question, too, for a purpose so small and narrow, and to which it stands in no immediate connection. I know not whether it is undue prudery which influences my mind, but I cannot bring myself to see compensation given for the discharge of a duty which the House of Lords has hitherto cheerfully performed as a virtue, and part of its functions as a legislative body. The doctrine of our constitution certainly is, that legislative services are unpaid services, and I am bound to say that in my conviction there is no maxim which lies nearer the very root and foundation of the institutions of our country. If we are to be told of what is radical and revolutionary, there is no change which I should be inclined to view—I will not say with such suspicion—but with such aversion and detestation as the substitution of paid services in the Legislature for the gratuitous services which we now freely and efficiently render here. I do not mean to say that this is the same thing as if we were to proceed to vote salaries to ourselves and to the House of Lords; but an enemy to the House of Lords could hardly wish them to take a step more unwise than that of making a draught on the public purse. I think that the dignity of the House of Lords will suffer from the adoption of such a principle:—and I believe that the independence of the House of Peers will be most secure so long as all the functions which that House has to discharge are discharged gratuitously, as they have been from time immemorial. [“Hear, hear!”] These opinions may be disagreeable to some hon. Gentlemen; but even those to whom they may be disagreeable, will admit that it is only fair and just that those persons who entertain them should freely and frankly express them; and, for my own part, I am only giving utterance to my candid conviction upon the subject. I am jealous for the independence and dignity of the House of Lords, and I firmly believe that the appointment of salaried officers, sitting as Peers, to perform those judicial functions which that House has always discharged, will have, I will not say an immediate effect, but it will have a tendency dangerous to the dignity and independence of that body. I object to the measure on these grounds. I object to it also—most strongly object to it—on the ground of its connection with, and the influence it may have on the independence and purity of the judicial bench.

We have been told, indeed, by those who have spoken in favour of the Bill, that this part of the measure must be modified—and that it will not do to confine the choice of the officers to be elected to the judicial bench; and I conceive that, whatever vote we may come to to-night, it is impossible for the House to pass a Bill containing the provisions which this Bill contains with regard to that part of the subject. If you agree to those provisions, you not only introduce a principle with regard to the judicial staff which the practice of many years has excluded, but you introduce it in the most objectionable way, by holding out a prospect of advancement to judges in connection not only with their judicial, but also with their political services. You will bring the maximum of temptation to bear upon human infirmity, when you call upon these life Peers to perform legislation as well as judicial functions, for in fact you say to them, “make yourself agreeable to the Ministry of the day, not by your judicial, but by your legislative services, in order that you may hope for the further advancement to the hereditary peerage.” Now, Sir, let us review the circumstances which have transpired in the course of this debate, and the speeches of those who have supported the measure. It must have been obvious to the House, that all the good which those hon. Gentlemen have said of the measure, has been much more than counterbalanced by the censure of it contained in their own speeches. For my own part, I believe that if all the opponents of the Bill had been content to take self-denying ordinance and to take no part in the discussion, but to listen to what was said of it by its supporters, they would have had no reason to complain of it being treated with too much favour. It cannot be denied that the question is one of the greatest difficulty and delicacy, and one which involves a vast number of considerations. You have to constitute a Court of Appeal in the last resort; but it ought to be considered, among other matters, whether it would be desirable to have one or more Courts of Appeal, and whether means may not be adopted to avoid the multiplication of appeals. As regards the great question of life peerages, you are called upon to legislate in the dark as regards the prerogative of the Crown; because, although in that respect the meaning of this Bill is not subject to much serious argument, yet it is not too much to say that it is in diametrical contradiction of the declaration of the Government of the Queen upon the subject. Under these circumstances, is it too much to ask, that we may have accorded to us as much time for the consideration of this subject, as is ordinarily afforded to the House of Commons, for the consideration of subjects of not one-twentieth part of its importance and magnitude? It is vain to say that the present state of things, with regard to the appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords, is intolerable. It is true that there may be five or six months' delay; but that delay has always existed; and yet the persons who use that argument, tell us that even thirty years ago the appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords was most satisfactory, when the same gap of six months in every twelve, which is now objected to and urged as the chief ground upon which you are to adopt a measure, doubtful in itself even according to the statements of its promoters, and involving principles of the greatest difficulty and delicacy, and which most nearly bears upon the very foundation of the constitution, occurred every year. Under these circumstances, it is hardly too much, I think, to ask the noble Lord at the head of the Government to consent to the Motion of the hon. Gentleman, and to consent to refer this Bill to a Select Committee, to weigh well not only the difficulties by which the subject is surrounded, and which this Bill will tend to indefinitely complicate, so that we may not discredit ourselves and the British Legislature; but that by the exercise of prudence and by refraining from pressing extreme opinions, we may be able at some future period, and I venture to hope at no distant period, to present the country with a measure worthy of a great country.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: It must be admitted, Sir, by all that what has been stated by the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. Malins), that the meaning of this Motion is not so much to obtain an inquiry by a Select Committee as it is to get rid of the Bill for the present Session, is a correct view of the case, and upon that issue every hon. Member must be prepared to give his vote to-night. I very much regret the circumstances under which my hon. Friend has made this Motion, and also the manner in which he and my right hon. Friend have adverted to it. There is, I am sorry to say, a strong difference of opinion upon this subject, and I am sorry to be obliged to differ from many of those who in general afford me their support. We have, however, felt it to be our duty to recommend this measure to the acceptance of the House; and, however painful it may be to find that in the performance of our public duty we stand at variance with those who generally give us their support, still, having felt it to be our duty to propose the Bill, we were bound to discharge that duty, whatever the consequences might be. Now, Sir, this measure has been occasioned by the conviction which we have entertained that the appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords is in a condition in which it would not be for the public good that it should continue. Let it not be understood that I agree with those who think there is something inherent in the appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords which is in itself objectionable; on the contrary, I should be sorry to see that jurisdiction transferred to any other tribunal. I think that the proposal to transfer that jurisdiction to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council is founded upon very imperfect considerations, both as regards the tribunal from which it is proposed to take that jurisdiction, and also of the court to which it is proposed to transfer it. I think that to transfer the appellate jurisdiction, which has so long been exercised by the House of Lords, to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, which is a body of very recent origin—from a body of greater stability and independence to one which, from its nature and constitution, is dependent upon the act of the Crown—would be a measure not, in my opinion, in harmony with the practice of the constitution, nor would it tend to the maintenance of principles which we have always upheld. What was it, then, that, in our opinion, rendered some change necessary with regard to the appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords? It was, that by the course of nature many of those eminent men who had been the legal ornaments of the House of Lords, and who had constituted the strength of the appellate jurisdiction of that House, had passed away; and the number of law Members of the House of Lords capable of constituting an efficient and satisfactory Court of Appeal had largely and visibly declined. Under these circumstances it had become necessary to strengthen that court by the addition of legal talent. Then comes the question of life peerages. My right hon. Friend (Mr. Gladstone) has stated that the question has been inconsiderately mooted by the Government. Now, upon that point I beg leave to differ from him. The question is one which is mooted by the Government for the first time this year, but one which has for a long period occupied the attention of successive Governments, and which has been most carefully considered. As regards the general principle of life peerages, it is my own opinion that the House of Lords acted upon an erroneous judgment when they arrived at the conclusion at which they did arrive with regard to the admission of Lord Wensleydale to a seat in that House. There is a great distinction between the House of Lords and the House of Commons in respect to their source of power and influence. The great influence of this House arises from its being an elected body, and thus being a representation of the feelings and opinions of the great mass of the people of this country. The influence and power of the House of Lords, on the other hand, are founded upon the character of its members, upon their local influence, their personal character, or the political ability which they may display. There can be no doubt that the House of Lords would derive great influence and consideration in the country if there were the means of placing within its limits men who had distinguished themselves, either by their legal attainments or by great military or naval achievements, but who, not having that fortune which would enable them to transmit to their descendants the means adequately to maintain the dignity of the peerage, would be placed in an improper, and to themselves a painful, situation by being made hereditary Peers. That being our opinion, a life peerage was conferred by Her Majesty, acting on the advice of Her Ministers, upon Baron Wensleydale. The House of Lords differed upon the point, and a majority decided against the admission of Baron Wensleydale as a life Peer to a seat in the House. Then came the question, what course should be pursued? We have been told by the right hon. Member for Oxford University, that the present Bill is the result of a compromise huddled up in a Committee-room for the convenience of parties. It is no such thing. It was not the convenience of parties, but a compromise arising from a conflict of opinions upon a question of very great importance, and which promised a satisfactory solution of the difficulty. Thus, the Bill comes down to us from the House of Lords as an arrangement, which, on the one hand, is consented to by those who object to life peerages in the abstract; and, on the other, furnishes such a reinforcement of strength to the appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords as will in some degree remedy the evils which now exist. Many hon. Gentlemen think that a better arrangement might be made. That is not impossible; but the question is not whether this is the best possible arrangement for reinforcing the appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords, but whether the Bill which is now presented to us, and which, if we agree to it, would no doubt be carried into law, does give such an accession of strength to the appellate jurisdiction as would render it satisfactory to the country. My opinion undoubtedly is that it does. I am of opinion that the appointment of two salaried Members of the House of Lords would strengthen that Court sufficiently to enable it to perform its duties with more effect and with more satisfaction to the public. The right hon. Member for Oxford University says we are introducing a new principle to pay Members of the Legislature for the performance of their Legislative functions. But we do not mean to pay the Deputy Speakers for the performance of their legislative functions; nor is it contrary to the principle of the constitution to pay for the performance of important judicial functions, when performed by Members of the Legislature—on the contrary, it is a recognised and well-known principle of the constitution. My right hon. Friend might as well object to pay the Lord Chancellor, who presides in the House of Lords, and exercises not only judicial but also legislative functions. The objection founded upon principle goes beyond the limits of the present Bill; but in my opinion there is no constitutional objection whatever to giving to certain legal Members of the House of Lords that salary which would enable distinguished lawyers to abandon either their practice at the bar—if the proposition of the hon. and learned Member for Cambridge University were adopted; or their judicial situations, according to the present arrangement of the Bill, for the purpose of undertaking the important duties which the Deputy Speakers will have to perform in the House of Lords. I say, then, that what is called a compromise is simply the result of conflicting opinions entertained upon a subject of great importance—the result of a contest and a discussion—not, as my hon. Friend who moved the Amendment represented by his theatrical allegory, acted as a farce upon the stage, but carried on openly in the face of day, known to everybody, and ending in mutual concessions on the part of those who differed upon a question of considerable magnitude. But it is said that this is a matter of such importance that we ought not to come to a decision upon it without much more lengthened and deliberate consideration. Why, seeing that it has been a matter of public discussion ever since March in the present year, I cannot imagine what a further delay would do for those who have given their mind to it. When I hear the arguments of those who contend for further investigation and inquiry, I am reminded of the doggrel lines about Dean Swift, who was said to have “ ————— defended the ancients so well

That he perfectly proved the moderns excel.”

The hon. Gentlemen who have asked for further investigation have shown that they have so completely sifted and mastered the question in all its bearings—so thoroughly examined every part of the measure now under discussion—have made themselves so perfectly masters of every objectionable point—that no more lengthened or deliberate consideration is necessary to enable them at least to come to a decision. I therefore respectfully submit to the House that it is admitted on all hands that a great evil exists—that the appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords has been weakened, not by anything inherent in the constitution of that body, but by the accidental circumstance of a diminution in the number of Members competent to take part in its judicial business; and here is a measure which provides a permanent remedy for that occasional inconvenience—a measure which I think would secure to the Appellate Court that strength which would enable it at all times to be efficient for the purposes which it has in view; and it appears to me that it would be a great misfortune if this House were to reject the Bill and determine that an inconvenient state of things, of which such complaints have been made, should continue to exist. It is said that you will lose nothing by rejecting this Bill, because during the interval between the end of the present Session and the beginning of the next, the ordinary cessation of the appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords would take place. But I apprehend, looking to the arguments which have been used in this debate, that if the matter were to be referred to a Select Committee, leaving it to be taken up at the beginning of next Session, there would be little probability of the House passing the measure, so as to allow it to come into operation before the end of the Session; and therefore the question does not relate merely to the interval between this Session and the next, but to the continuance for a much longer period of a state of things which both those who are for and those who are against the Bill have condemned. A great deal has been said as to the effect of the Bill upon the prerogative of the Crown. It is manifest, I think, to everybody who reads the Bill that it acknowledges the prerogative and limits it; that, on one side, those who object to life peerages have acknowledged the prerogative of the Crown to create them, and, on the other, those who maintain the prerogative have consented to a limitation for the purpose of establishing the appellate jurisdiction of the House of Lords on a satisfactory basis. Such is the compromise which the Bill carries into effect, and I have only, in conclusion, to express my hope that the House, rejecting the Amendment of the hon. Member for Northampton, will consent to go into Committee.

MR. ROEBUCK would wish to say a word on the question of the prerogative of the Crown as affected by this Bill. In another place a noble Lord had stated that this Bill did not touch the prerogative of the Crown; while the noble Lord at the head of the Government appeared to hold a contrary opinion. He should wish the House to ask the law officers of the Crown what was their opinion, as without it the House were about to legislate in the dark. He had been struck by the wording of the measure, and he felt convinced it would take away the power of the Crown to make life Peers. He should wish to know whether it was the opinion of Ministers that such would be the case, or whether they agreed in the opinion expressed by their colleagues in another place? He hoped, therefore, he was in order in asking the law officers of the Crown for their interpretation of the measure.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL said, that it was impossible to give a positive answer to the question of the hon. and learned Gentleman, without first ascertaining whether the Crown had the prerogative of creating life Peers. If there were such a prerogative, beyond question this Bill, as now worded—the wording being a matter for the consideration of the Committee—limited the exercise of that prerogative, so that by virtue of it there could not be in the House of Lords more than four Peers for life at one time.

Main Question, as amended, put, and agreed to.

Order for Third Reading read,

Bill read 3°

MR. WHITESIDE then proposed the following clause:—

“ So much of the first section of the said firstly-recited Act of the 12th and 13th year of Her Majesty as provides that the Court for the Sale and Transfer of Incumbered Estates in Ireland shall consist of any number of persons not exceeding three, to be Commissioners under said Act, is hereby repealed, and said Court shall hereafter consist of two Commissioners only; and the officers under said Act heretofore attached to the first Commissioner shall be distributed between the remaining two Commissioners in manner best calculated to facilitate the despatch of the business of said Court.”

Clause brought up, and read 1°.

Motion made and Question proposed, “ That the said Clause be now read a second time.”

MR. J. D. FITZGERALD said, he had on a former occasion stated the objections to this clause, and therefore did not consider it necessary to take up the time of the House in reiterating those arguments he had before urged.

MR. NAPIER said, that the clause was proposed in accordance with the evidence taken by the Committee, which went to show that two Commissioners were sufficient to discharge the duties of the court, and that it was desirable that Baron Richards should return to the Court of Exchequer.

LORD NAAS supported the clause, and asked the Government to state their intentions as to the future constitution of the Court—whether they really intended to remove Baron Richards and to appoint another Commissioner in his place?

MR. GROGAN said, the question before the House was a great deal more important than the Government seemed desirous of acknowledging. If the proposition of the hon. and learned Member for Enniskillen be rejected, the Government should explain how they meant to dispose of Baron Richards, who, they said, ought to be removed from the Incumbered Estates Court, in order that he might be enabled to return to his legitimate court. He thought that the clause was most essential to carry out the recommendations of the Committee.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, his hon. and learned Friend had already distinctly stated that it was the intention of the Government to discontinue Baron Richards as a member of this Court, and that he should return to his own proper Court. The Government, however, thought it desirable to retain the power of appointing three Commissioners if it should be found that the business of the Court could not properly be performed by two. They should be most desirous and willing to reduce the number to two. It would, however, be exceedingly inconvenient if the power of appointing three should be taken away from the Government after it was found that two were not sufficient to perform the functions of the Court.

SIR JAMES GRAHAM said it was distinctly understood that Baron Richards was to return back to his Court and his circuit. He took it as granted that the experiment would be made of confining the number of Commissioners to two. If it be found that two would be able, satisfactorily, to perform the business of the Court, he wished to ask the noble Lord whether in that case the Government would abstain from appointing a third Commissioner? If the noble Lord answered in the affirmative, he hoped that the right hon. Member for Enniskillen would not think it necessary to press his Amendment.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, it was clearly his intention to express himself so. It was the intention of the Government to make the experiment with two only; and if that number were sufficient for the performance of the duties, he would not resort to the appointment of a third.

MR. WHITESIDE said, that under such circumstances, he would yield to the suggestion of the right hon. Baronet, and withdraw his clause.

Motion and Clause, by leave, withdrawn.

STAMP DUTIES BILL—INCOME AND LAND TAXES BILL.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER moved for leave to introduce two Bills. The first provided for the reduction of the duty upon proxy papers for voting in respect to railway companies from 2s. 6d. to 6d. That reduction, he believed, would meet with general approbation, as he was informed that the present rate of duty acted as a practical restriction upon the shareholders from voting, and thereby prevented them from controlling the acts of the directors. It was a matter of public policy to make the alteration he proposed. The Bill also proposed to effect a similar reduction in respect to certain instruments in Scotland called mandates, which were proxies for voting in respect to municipal and parochial matters. He also proposed to make an alteration with respect to the stamping of articles of clerkship to attorneys. At present, if the articles were not stamped before taken out they were invalid, and he proposed to adopt in regard to those instruments the same course that was pursued in respect to similar documents, and to allow them to be stamped at a future time upon payment of a penalty. The other Bill which he wished to introduce was intended to give to landowners in Scotland the same advantages with respect to the income tax which were virtually enjoyed by landowners in England, and which had been conferred by Act of Parliament upon landowners in Ireland. In Ireland there was an express provision by law that in calculating the income tax an exemption should be made for so much of the poor rates as fell upon the landlord. In Scotland the general incidence of the local rates was upon the landlords, who were in general, he believed, charged by the law directly with those rates. The effect of that state of things was, that the landlord received his rent without any deduction being made for the local taxes; he paid the local taxes himself, and his income tax was charged upon his gross rental, including the local rates. That was a disadvantage under which the Scotch landlords laboured in comparison with the same class of persons in England and Ireland, and from it he now proposed to relieve them. He further proposed to make an alteration with respect to the clerks of the Commissioners of Income Tax in England. The effect of raising the rate of income tax had been so to increase the scale of allowance to the clerks of the Commissioners as to render it excessive. He proposed that with respect to all those gentlemen whose salaries amounted to more than £500 a year, their poundage should be reduced from 2d., which it was at present, to 1d. in the pound, provided the alteration should not reduce their salaries to less than £500. If this reduction of the poundage should have the effect of bringing the salaries below £500 a year, they would be made up to that amount. The effect of the proposed provision would be that about thirty of the present clerks of Commissioners of Income Tax out of about 700, would undergo a diminution of their salaries. He also proposed to make a slight alteration in the land tax. At present the power of redeeming this tax was confined to persons who had an estate in fee simple. Persons having limited interests, such as life estates, did not possess this power, and he now proposed to confer it upon them.

Leave given.

Bill ordered to be brought in by the CHANCELLOR of the EXCHEQUER and Mr. WILSON.

Bill read 1^o.

The House adjourned at Two o'clock.

INDIA—CASE OF PERTAUB SINGH AND BISHEU SINGH—PETITION.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH presented a petition, to which he was desirous of calling their Lordships' attention, from Pertaub Singh and Bisheu Singh, British subjects, Soodees of Thubkurnah, Pergunnah, Deewanuggur, Zillah Goordaspoor, in the province of Lahore, commonly called the Punjaub, in the East Indies, complaining of the grievances they are suffering from the East India Company's Government, and praying for relief. He had thought it right to undertake the presentation of this petition, because it seemed to him expedient that the Natives of India should thoroughly understand that they were as much Her Majesty's subjects, and that recourse to Parliament was as open to them as to any of Her Majesty's subjects born in the United Kingdom. He was the more disposed to present the petition inasmuch as it complained of a very great grievance, for which these gentlemen had no remedy whatever in India; and he felt that it was only by giving publicity to the grievance they had suffered, by presenting their petition to Parliament, that it was possible for them to obtain redress. Although these gentlemen were not able to transport themselves hither, to take a house in London, and go about in their carriage and leave their cards with Members of both Houses of Parliament previous to the presentation of a petition or the discussion of a measure in which they were concerned, he nevertheless felt confident that their Lordships would not on that account give a less favourable hearing to their statement and their prayer. The petitioners were the lineal descendants of a great religious leader and teacher of the Sikhs who lived 280 years ago, and whose name was Oomra Ran Doss. He was a person of great influence, and his family had from that time to this maintained themselves in the position of gentlemen; respected by all, and retaining their possessions throughout all the changes and civil convulsions that had occurred in the interval. A portion of their property these gentlemen derived from grants made to them by the ancient princes and chiefs of the Punjaub; and they stated that the grants by which they held that property existed in the archives of the Lahore Government, and had been verified by the officers of the Indian Government, and certified as perfectly correct; so that there could be no doubt whatever as to their being the rightful possessors of the property. They said that they had never acted against the Government of India, but had, on the contrary, assisted them as far as they were able. They stated, also, that upon the conquest of the Punjaub the Board of Administration recommended that one-fourth of this property should be appropriated by the Government, and that, knowing the necessity for the Government having resources to enable them to maintain order in the country, they did not object to the sacrifice of the one-fourth demanded of them. The Board of Administration further proposed that the remaining three-fourths should remain to these gentlemen during their lives, and that after their decease a portion, amounting to about one-third of what they originally possessed, should be perpetually secured to their heirs and successors. On the 6th of May, 1853, the Supreme Government of India confirmed the decision of the Board of Administration as to taking away the one-fourth, and leaving to them for their natural lives the remaining three-fourths; but they rejected altogether the proposition of the Board that the descendants of the petitioners should retain the one-third. Now this, the petitioners represented, was not a general rule that had been enforced systematically throughout the province; on the contrary, in their own district, and in the immediate neighbourhood there were many cases of persons whose positions were exactly similar to theirs, and who not only had a portion of their property secured to them during their own lives, but a portion also secured to their descendants and successors after them. The Deputy Commissioner of the district reported that the petitioners were very respectable men, and that they bore a high character among both Europeans and Natives, and that they held the position of country gentlemen. Mr. Raikes stated that Pertaub Singh was a very respectable gentleman, whom he commended to the protection of the East Indian Government on his visit to Calcutta; and Colonel Lake also bore testimony to the character of these gentlemen. But the petitioners stated that by the decision at which the Indian Government had arrived, they were at this moment living in the melancholy position of knowing, that if that decision were carried out they would leave their descendants without an inheritance. He (the Earl of Ellenborough) had moved for and obtained papers, which showed what was the principle upon which the Indian Government had acted towards the Sikhs, and he found that that principle was one upon which they were justified in acting, though he held that it was not applicable to the case of these gentlemen, who had never borne part in opposing or resisting the Indian Government, but had always given that Government all the assistance that was in their power. Whilst, however, the Government might be justified in acting as they had done in the case of the Punjab, as a conquered country, he disputed the wisdom of treating the Sikhs differently from the other conquered provinces of India. Take Scinde as an example. So satisfactory was the system pursued there, that from the day the chiefs swore allegiance to the Indian Government not a hand had been raised against our authority, and he was assured by Mr. Frere that the armed police were amply sufficient for maintaining the internal tranquillity of that country, and that if troops were maintained there, it was not for the purpose of securing internal quiet, but to protect the frontier, and guard against the inroads of hostile neighbouring powers. How different from the position of the Punjab, where Government were obliged to maintain an army of 50,000 men, in addition to 18,000 or 20,000 armed police! It was to him a subject of the most serious consideration, and always had been—what would be the ultimate result of the policy which we had been pursuing now for many years, not intentionally, in various provinces of India. For there could be no doubt that our severe fiscal administration had, against our desire, had the effect of so changing the distribution of property there, as to produce a state of society of which there were few instances in the history of the world—he meant a state of society without any or very rare gradations of rank—a nation without a gentry. It was the first time, he believed, in the history of the world that any such state of society had existed. There was, or would soon be, in India, no link between the foreign sovereign and the native labourer; and it was a reflection upon the recent Government of India that it had endeavoured to introduce into the Punjab a system the effect of which was to annihilate the ancient possessors of the soil, to substitute none for them, and to have none whatever between the Government and the field labourer. In adopting a policy like this, did they suppose that they had created a state of society upon which it was possible for education to act for the moral improvement of the people? Did they suppose that they could improve by education a suffering body of proprietors, or raise a population which was reduced to that low level of distress and misery? And let them imagine what might be the consequences if, in some future time, circumstances led to a general insurrection in the Punjab. What hope would there be for the Government? What help for the people? He had heard Gentlemen express hopes, that by improving the country we might render it capable at some distant period of governing itself; but how could they ever hope to attain such a result as that, if they established and persisted in a system which conduced to a state of society where there were no gradations of rank, and none between the foreign governor and the labouring classes? This question had always pressed much upon his mind; and the present was not the first time that he had thought it necessary to mention his feelings to their Lordships. He hoped it was a matter that would attract the attention of those who were connected with the Government of India. With regard to the particular case of the petitioners, he must say that he really thought it was impossible that the Government could have deliberately arrived at the conclusion to which they had come respecting it—he could not help hoping that among a mass of cases this one had been decided hastily. He trusted that the Government in this country would recommend the question to the consideration of the Government in India, and, relying as he did upon the truth of all the statements contained in the petition, that the decision of the Government in India would be such as to relieve the character of our Administration from the injury it must sustain if such injustice were continued.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL agreed with the noble Earl in his desire that the Natives of India should be encouraged in the feeling that in any claim for justice there was a Court of Appeal in the Parliament of this country, and he trusted that every native so appealing would find an advocate as able and judicious as the noble Earl. But there was this disadvantage, that it was impossible that the Government could have full information of the details in every individual case which might be suddenly brought under the notice of Parliament. He would, as far as he had been able to acquire information with regard to them, mention the circumstances under which the decision was come to in the present case by the Governor General of India. The noble Earl had referred to the general principles laid down by the Governor General with reference to the government of the Punjaub; and in the line of argument he took seemed to convey an impression that the Governor General had made a great distinction between the mode in which the government of the Punjaub was carried on, and that in which the rest of the country was governed. But no such distinction had been laid down by the Government of India as between those provinces and other parts of the country. He (the Duke of Argyll) never looked into the history of India without feeling some doubt as to the right by which we had taken possession of parts of that empire; and those doubts he had entertained, especially as regarded Scinde. But if ever there was a province acquired in a legitimate mode, it was the Punjaub. In a time of profound peace our territories of India had been attacked by the Sikh Rajah, and every one must well remember the alarm which was felt in this country at the temporary success which followed the first invasion of our territory. After a struggle, renewed more than once, we had succeeded in conquering the Punjaub. He did not mean to say that we were therefore justified in treating the Natives with injustice; but if there was any province which we should be justified in treating as a conquered province, it was the Punjaub. The instructions of the Governor General to the Board of Administration in the Punjaub, laid down a general principle for the assessment of the land for the purposes of the Government. He should state that the property in question was not land, or revenue derivable from land, but grants of remission from taxation on land. The Governor General having laid down in his instruction the general principle, went on to detail the different classes of cases with which the Board of Administration would have to deal; and the case which the noble Earl had brought forward came under the fifth head of the instruction—namely, “that all persons holding lands subject to pay fines should hold them for their lives, subject to the payment of one-fourth to the revenue, and that on the death of the holder the property would be resumed by the Government.” The general principle was, that the grants were respected as regarded the existing holders; but should not be continued to future holders, except those which had been given for certain religious purposes. It was under these general rules that this case stood. It might be said that the grants in question came under the head of a religious and charitable character; but the claim having been brought under the consideration of the Government of India, it was decided, after full inquiry, that they were not of a charitable or religious character, or such as, being for the support of religious or public buildings, would, under the rules, be entitled to be continued in perpetuity. He would ask the House to consider the serious nature of the question involved in this claim. If the claim were conceded in this case it must be conceded in all others of a similar nature, and that would involve the sacrifice of one-fifth of the whole revenue of the province, the abstraction of which would necessarily throw the whole fiscal system into confusion, and render it difficult, if not impossible, to carry on the government. He was not in possession of any very full information of the grounds which had led the Supreme Government of India to decide that this was not one of the exceptional cases contemplated in the general rules; but he would submit the petition to his right hon. Friend the President of the Board of Control, and if his right hon. Friend saw sufficient grounds, he was sure that neither the India Government, nor the Court of Directors, would refuse to reconsider the decision to which they had come. They must not, however, lose sight of the difficulties of the case, nor forget a favourable decision in this case might involve a similar decision in 5,000 or 6,000 others.

THE EARL OF ELLENBOROUGH said, that the noble Duke should recollect that in these particular cases the Commissioners had recommended that the descendants of the grantee should have one-third of the whole grant in perpetuity.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE hoped that inquiry would be made into the whole system of Indian government. It was absurd to talk of the people of India having an appeal to Parliament if their petitions were allowed to remain unnoticed upon the tables and their demands for justice defeated by technicalities. The noble Duke had pleaded a strange plea when he said that the question of the resumption of grants must not be touched at all, and that if all grants were to be maintained they would swallow up the whole revenues of the country, and render government impossible. There might be truth in that plea, but there was no justice—no matter how just was the title to a grant, the exigencies of the State were such that it must be ignored. That was a principle that must be well considered before the Parliament of England could adopt it. Up to 1805, no question of resuming these grants had ever arisen, but soon after that period an opinion was put forth by men, wise and able, no doubt, to the effect that the circumstances of all grants should be inquired into. That proposition was disputed, and a controversy arose upon it. In 1828 an inquiry was instituted, not in the fairest manner. In one case which came before the Privy Council upon appeal the first Commissioner who had been appointed had decided that the grant could not be resumed. The East India Company were not satisfied, and appointed another Commissioner, who decided in their favour. A third Commissioner was appointed, who agreed with the first; but that first Commissioner, in the mean time, had changed his opinion and adopted the views of the second Commissioner. A fourth Commissioner was appointed, and the Indian Government having got two Commissioners to decide in their favour seized the land in dispute and annulled the grant. He begged their Lordships to consider the importance of the subject, and whether it was not necessary, for the maintenance of the good name of this country, to inquire into the justice of complaints such as those put forth in the petition which the noble Earl had presented.

Petition ordered to lie on the table.

THE MILITIA—QUESTION.

THE DUKE OF BUCCLEUCH rose for the purpose of putting to the noble Lord the Secretary for War a question of which he had given notice. His question was this:—What was the intention of Her Majesty's Government with respect to the Constitution and Pay of the Permanent Staff of Regiments of Militia, and as to the Retention of Acting Quartermasters on the Permanent Staff? He had paid very considerable attention to this subject, and he believed that every single officer connected with the militia, whose opinion had been taken on the matter, concurred in the view which he took as to the importance of keeping up a proper permanent staff for the regiments of militia. Great exertions had been made, both on the part of the Government, and on that of individuals, to bring the militia force of the United Kingdom to a state of efficiency; and he believed he might say that it had been brought to that condition during the late war. However, all the energies in this respect would be wasted and thrown away unless means were taken to retain the militia in that high state of discipline; in fact, unless such steps were at once taken the militia would within a very few months be in the condition in which it was before the breaking out of the late war. For many years before that war there was in reality no militia force in this country. It was quite true that during the entire of that time a permanent staff was kept up; but those staffs were found to be nearly inefficient when their services were most required. The members of those staffs were for the most part old worn-out men, who, having had no opportunity of refreshing their memories as to the duties of active service, had forgotten much of what they had formerly known, and were, therefore, totally inefficient for the duties for the performance of which they were required. He trusted it was not the intention of the Government to suffer the militia to fall again into such a state of desuetude. The inconvenience of such a state of things having become manifest, a very strong opinion had been expressed in both Houses as to the necessity, as well as the expediency, of keeping up a strong militia force; not a mere nominal one, but one that would be really efficient in case of emergency—one with which, in case of war breaking out, this country or the colonies might be garrisoned, or which might be sent—as militia regiments had been during the late hostilities—in service companies wherever the service of fighting men might be required. It was in a condition such as would enable them to fill such positions as that he wished the militia regiments to be kept; but in his opinion, and that of all militia officers with whom he had conversed on the subject, the numbers put upon the permanent staff under present regulations were not sufficient to keep up the efficiency of the militia regiments; and the consequence would be that in the event of the active service of those regiments being hereafter required, the authorities would be obliged again to have recourse to non-commissioned officers of the line, or to pensioners who had grown rusty for want of active duty. Two sergeants to a company were the present allowance. Now, he thought that number clearly insufficient. The regiments were to be called out for training during a certain number of days in each year. Now, how could they keep up drill duty with two sergeants to a company? Besides this, those sergeants were allowed so small a remuneration—10s. 6d. a week—that they would be obliged to employ themselves at trades, or at avocations other than their militia duties. This was, in his opinion, an unwise arrangement; for those men should give their undivided attention to the duties of their regiments, if those regiments were to be maintained in an efficient state. The pay of the sergeants was too small. They should, at all events, be allowed rations, and a 1d. a day as was allowed to recruiting parties. Without a drum-major it would be impossible to get on, and paymasters and orderly clerks would be required. It had been conceded that quartermasters should be continued in certain regiments at a reduced pay of 5s. a day. Surely, if a quartermaster was required in one regiment, such an officer was required in every other that was to be called out for annual training. There was a regulation requiring persons to accept of a subaltern's commission on being appointed to the office of quartermaster. Now, competent persons had declined to accept the office on such a condition. He trusted that the whole subject of the maintenance of a permanent and efficient militia staff would receive the careful consideration of the Government, for the expense of the maintenance of such a staff would, after all, be but a very trifling matter as compared to the advantage which, in a time of emergency, this country would derive from having ready for service, not a nominal, but a thoroughly efficient militia force.

THE DUKE OF RICHMOND said, that his noble Friend who had just sat down had stated very fairly and clearly to the House what his views, and he (the Duke of Richmond) believed those of all other militia officers, were, in respect of the subject which he had brought under the consideration of Parliament. Those views amounted to this, that if they wished to have a militia which would be efficient, they must keep up a permanent and efficient staff for that purpose. Now, the adjutants of these militia regiments did not receive as large a remuneration for their services as they ought to do. He conceived that upon the adjutant depended very much the efficiency of the battalion, not only in its drills and manœuvres, but, what was much more important, in its discipline. It was easy enough to command a regiment of militia that had the advantage of an efficient adjutant and efficient non-commissioned officers; but it was not so if there was an inefficiency in these departments. Now, what was at present done to secure the services of efficient men? Many of the adjutants had raised themselves from the ranks by meritorious conduct, and when they came into militia regiments they had no sinecures; yet they might serve in those regiments for ten, fifteen, or twenty years, without any increased pay for length of service. He would ask his noble Friend opposite (Lord Panmure), who had been himself in the army, whether it would not be advisable to increase the pay of the adjutants, in the same way as the pay of the civil servants of the Crown was increased, for long service? He (the Duke of Richmond) did say that the man who had served seven years as a sergeant-major, seven years as an adjutant of a regiment of the line, and three years in a militia regiment, ought to receive some increase of pay. It was of great importance to promote deserving non-commissioned officers of the line; and when they placed those officers in a position in which they should keep up the appearance of gentlemen, they ought to allow them pay sufficient for that purpose. They permitted adjutants to keep a horse; but they did not allow them a man to clean that horse, and those adjutants of militia regiments who had horses must clean them themselves. Should not the adjutants have the service of a soldier for this purpose, as they would have when the regiments were embodied? There was another point to which he wished to draw the attention of his noble Friend, and that was, that some regiments of militia had quarter-masters and some had not. The regiment which he commanded had a quarter-master, and he would like to know why those regiments which had just come home should not each have one? He agreed with his noble Friend (the Duke of Buccleuch) that two sergeants to a company were not sufficient. The pay of the staff sergeants was only 10s. 6d. a week; and they got clothing only once in two years, while it was made compulsory upon the counties to find lodging for them. He hoped that the Government would increase the remuneration to the sergeants. If the country had come to such a state that it could not afford to keep 100 militia regiments in an efficient state, for heaven's sake let them be reduced to fifty; but let those fifty be kept in an efficient state. During the late war some regiments of militia had not been embodied at all, and it would have been very desirable to draught the men from those regiments into others which were embodied. He was aware that it was said that the 10s. 6d. a week was only intended to be in aid of the income derived by those persons from their usual trade or occupation; but if sergeants were permitted to carry on their usual trade or occupation they would soon become useless for their military duties, and most certainly recruiting for the various regiments would not be carried on properly. He would now say a few words upon what the commanders of militia regiments were obliged to do in consequence of the inadequate pay of 10s. 6d. a week given to non-commissioned officers. They were forced to take old pensioners, who brought into the militia regiments all the different systems under which they had served in the line, and the consequence was great confusion and difficulty. Besides, it would be found that these pensioners did not leave their regiments as long as they were really efficient, and he could assure their Lordships that the non-commissioned officers and adjutants of the militia had far more onerous duties to perform than the same class in the well-regulated regiments of the line. It would be a great boon to a valuable class of men if the permanent staff of the militia were permitted to draw their bread and meat from the contractors at contract prices. No charge would thereby be made upon the country. He hoped the Government would keep the militia in an efficient state. If the sum voted by Parliament would not be sufficient to maintain 100 regiments in a state of efficiency, let the number be reduced, because a small effective force would be of far more value than a large ineffective one. What he complained of was, that the Government expected the officers in command to keep up those regiments in a proper manner, and yet they did not give the means of carrying out their desires.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET thought that before their Lordships were asked to consider what should be the militia force in time of peace, they ought to have some information from the Government in regard to the probable expense of the force. When the militia was first embodied an estimate of the cost was laid on the table of the House of Commons, and he wished the Government would now state whether that estimate had been adhered to. Over and over again Motions had been made in the other House with the view of ascertaining what the expense of the militia had really been; but those Motions had uniformly been evaded, and no information had been given by the Government. It would be no easy matter to decide in what form the militia should be maintained, but he apprehended it would be a hopeless task to attempt to keep up a permanent staff in time of peace. That plan was tried before; but the result was, that after a few years the staff became worn out and inefficient. But, before deciding what form the militia should assume, their Lordships should ascertain from the Government what had been from the first the extent of the force and what the expense; they would then be able to judge how far it might be desirable during peace to keep up any portion of the militia. At present there was a strong feeling in the country in favour of the maintenance of an efficient military force; but they might depend upon it that in a few years the pressure of taxation would work a great change in that respect, and therefore it was all the more necessary that nothing should be done rashly or without due consideration.

LORD PANMURE, who was imperfectly heard, was understood to say, that the Government would listen with great attention to the opinions which might be expressed by qualified persons on the subject of the militia. It was the intention of the Government to prevent the militia falling into the condition in which it existed before the late war, and that it was also their intention with that view to call out for training, if not the whole, a considerable portion of the force in each year. They proposed to maintain a permanent staff, which, although not in itself sufficient to furnish non-commissioned officers for all the regiments, would yet be adequate in time of peace to the discharge of the duties entrusted to it. He could see no objection to a system of that kind, and he could assure their Lordships that the staff would not be stinted in numbers. It was, in his opinion, of the greatest importance that the non-commissioned officers of the militia should, during a state of peace, engage in civil occupations, and, therefore, he could not agree in the remarks which had been made as to the inadequacy of their pay. Their military duties were not sufficient to occupy the whole of their time; and if asked to abstain from other employment—their pay being increased—they would be compelled to spend the greater part of the year in comparative idleness. He saw no great necessity for furnishing them with rations, or allowances in lieu of rations, but the suggestion that they should be permitted to draw their bread and meat at contract prices was worthy of consideration, and might perhaps be adopted. Previously to the late war there were no quartermasters on the permanent staff of the militia; but it appeared to him that their services might be made available in assisting the adjutants to look after the stores. He thought the Government had acted wisely in placing quartermasters on the permanent staff in large regiments, in which there was a quantity of stores; but in small regiments there was not so much necessity for these officers. It was the intention of the Government to maintain, as far as possible, the efficiency of the militia regiments, in order that they might be in a state to assist the line when required; and he could not sit down without remarking how creditable it was to the noble Duke and to the officers in command of most of the militia regiments in the kingdom to have allowed their regiments to be broken up by sending their best men into the line.

THE DUKE OF CLEVELAND said, the regiment with which he was connected had derived great benefit from the appointment of a quartermaster to take care of the stores. He was not aware that there was any difference between acting and permanent quartermasters, and he was therefore much astonished at finding, after the quartermaster of his regiment had acted for two months, that the pay of that officer was to be disallowed. He wished to know whether the Government intended to give any compensation to quartermasters in that position for having discharged their duties for some time without receiving any pay?

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE also complained that the acting quartermaster of his regiment had been deprived of the advantages to which he was entitled. He wished, also, to know what arrangements had been made for the lodging of the militia in Ireland, and whether the small barracks not now occupied were to be made available for that purpose?

LORD PANMURE, in reply to the noble Duke said, it was well known, when men were appointed to the office of quartermaster, that such appointments would not carry with them appointments on the permanent staff when the regiments were disembodied. If it could be shown that any regiments to which quartermasters had not been appointed had a greater quantity of stores than could be placed under the charge of the sergeant-major, he would take into consideration the appointment of a quartermaster to those regiments. With regard to the question of the noble Marquess, if the Government had barracks not occupied he should recommend that they should be disposed of for the public advantage, and then the counties could come forward and purchase them for the militia.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE said, that in the county with which he was connected there were at least six of those barracks; but, surely, the Government would not sell the whole six? It was only two or three years ago that the Government had expended a great sum for building large barracks in Galway, although at the time there were two barracks unoccupied in the same county. The Government had also put a railway company to great expense in order to oblige them to consult the convenience of those barracks, and he believed they had been at law ever since in respect to the question of the building of a bridge for the troops to pass over.

POLAND—QUESTION.

LORD LYNTHURST: Your Lordships will, I hope, allow me, even at this hour, to say a few words explaining the object which I have had in view in putting the question to my noble Friend (the Earl of Clarendon) of which I have given notice. In a recent publication by an eminent foreign statesman, Count Montalembert, he complains in strong terms of the course pursued by the late Congress of Paris in censuring the Governments of Naples and Greece, and he contrasts that course with the silence which prevailed relative to the wrongs of Poland, which, he says, the Congress would have been justified in taking notice of, both diplomatically and morally, in consequence of the ancient treaties entered into with that country. He enlarges with his usual eloquence upon this subject. My Lords, I am compelled to admit that, as far as appears upon the face of the protocols, there is nothing whatever to show that the affairs of Poland were at all brought under the consideration of the Congress; but I know my noble Friend opposite too well, and I have too high an opinion of his manly and generous character, to suppose for a moment that he could have been silent on such a subject. I am persuaded that such a silence would have been impossible for him. Allow me to recall some of the past circumstances connected with this question. The Congress of Paris represented the Sovereigns, who were also represented in the Congress of Vienna, in 1815. We know very well that one of the most important subjects considered at the Congress of Vienna was the arrangement made with respect to Poland. That subject underwent great and anxious consideration. After a long struggle it was agreed that the duchy of Warsaw should be raised into a kingdom, and that the Crown should be conferred upon the Emperor of Russia for the time being. This arrangement was come to upon the express and distinct condition which was insisted upon with great earnestness by all the parties to the treaty, and perhaps with greater earnestness by Lord Castlereagh than by any one else. The conditions of the arrangement were, that Poland should remain a separate kingdom, that it should never be incorporated with the Russian empire, that its national institutions should be preserved, that it should have a representative assembly, and that the administration of the financial department and of the army should always be kept distinct. These were the terms finally settled by the Congress of Vienna, and which it was thought absolutely necessary to impose. The Emperor Alexander swore to the observance of these conditions. The Emperor Nicholas also swore to the observance of the constitution; but afterwards, regardless of the earnest remonstrances of the allies, regardless of the oath he had taken, he incorporated the territory of Poland in the empire of Russia, making it an integral part of that empire. From that period until his death the Emperor Nicholas passed a series of laws the object of which was to extinguish the Polish name and character. The works of art in the palace at Warsaw were transferred to St. Petersburg. The two universities of Warsaw and Wilna were totally abolished. The national schools were either abolished or remodelled. Many thousands of the inferior order of nobles were transported to distant parts of the Russian empire. The language of Russia was ordered to be used in administering the laws throughout the whole of Lithuania, and it was ordered that in every school of the empire there should be some person to instruct the people in the Russian language. The Polish dress was prohibited, and all the inferior orders were commanded to wear the Russian dress. All these circumstances must have been present to my noble Friend at the time of the Congress, and the more so that last year, before the war terminated, the allied Powers were engaged in forming a Polish Legion which was to have been commanded by the most eminent of the Polish exiles. My Lords, under these circumstances it is impossible to suppose that my noble Friend opposite could have been silent on the subject to which I have referred. I have no doubt that he must have brought this subject under the view of the Plenipotentiaries of Russia at the Congress, and that he must have earnestly remonstrated on the subject. I entertain no doubt as to the course which my noble Friend pursued; but I fear the result has been unsatisfactory, and that no beneficial issue has resulted from the representations of my noble Friend. So far from that being the case, the Government of Russia has taken elaborate pains—if I may so express myself—to furnish proof, for the purpose of convincing Europe and the inhabitants of Poland that she will not allow any intervention with respect to that territory or with respect to the mode in which it is governed. I refer to what has recently taken place at Warsaw upon the occasion of the entry of the Emperor into that place, and to the language which he held to the two assemblies who met him to welcome him. Upon that occasion he addressed the nobles and the clergy in a speech which was very short, very precise, and very emphatic. He said nothing would induce him to depart from the policy of his predecessors with respect to Poland. He said it was for the interest of Russia that Poland should form part of the Russian empire—of the Russian family. He added, that it was also for the interest of Poland. This was followed by murmurs. He said—

“Entertain no illusions; or, if you do entertain illusions, let them only lead to noble aspirations; for if they go beyond that I, who can reward can punish. I know how to punish, and, if necessity occur, I will punish. Above all,” he said, concluding his speech, “no visionary dreams—no visionary dreams.”

Nothing could be more marked than this speech—nothing more marked than the policy he intended to adopt; and I must regret, whatever passed between my noble Friend and the Plenipotentiaries at the Congress, that it was attended with no beneficial results. But this is only one part of the subject to which I have to call your Lordships’ attention. My noble Friend expressed at the Congress a strong and earnest desire that an amnesty should be granted by the King of Naples for political offenders. It is impossible to suppose for a moment that my noble Friend should not at the same time have urged in the strongest terms the desirability of granting an amnesty for the Poles. My noble Friend gives no sign of assent at this moment, but I am persuaded my noble Friend must have urged the necessity of that amnesty. My Lords, what is called an amnesty has in truth been granted. What is called, I say, for it “keeps the word of promise to the ear, but breaks it to the hope.” Everything which deserves to be called an amnesty should be of a comprehensive character—of a generous character. It should be precise in its terms. As to exceptions, they should be distinct and clear, and the exceptions should be of such a nature as to be justified in the opinion of the world. Try this amnesty by this test. It is stated that those persons who partook of its benefits on their return to Poland shall be free from indictment and prosecution. But under what circumstances are they to return? What are the limitations surrounding it? Every person who desires to return shall in the first instance present a petition. He must state in that petition under what circumstances he left the territory of Russia, and he must state minutely everything which has occurred to him from that period down to the moment of his petition. If the officer of the Government is satisfied with this explanation, then only is he permitted to avail himself of the amnesty; his civil rights are restored. But, my Lords, we all know and we all remember, that there was a sweeping confiscation of the property of all emigrants. Not a single word is said about the restoration of property or any part of it; so that a man who is allowed to return, returns houseless, distressed, outcast, and penniless. Such is the amnesty, so far as the return to the country is concerned. But what is his situation after his return? He is to be for three years under the surveillance of the police. Everybody knows and feels what must be the position of a person for three years under the surveillance of the Russian police. If after the expiration of that time, the report is favourable, he is then allowed to be a candidate for official employment. What are the exceptions? Exceptions, my Lords, as I stated before, should be precise and well-defined. These exceptions are most vague and unsatisfactory. I find that no person shall be allowed to return who has exhibited a spirit of hostility against the Russian Government; and who is to decide upon what may be a spirit of hostility against the Russian Government? The officers of the Russian Government. What can be more unsatisfactory than a provision of this kind. But there is one other point to which I would call your attention. We know that in the struggle for the liberty of Poland some of the most distinguished inhabitants of Poland were taken prisoners, and sent on foot in chains to the deserts of Siberia. No part of the amnesty comprehends any of that class of persons. I have heard that some persons are surprised that the most eminent of the Polish exiles have refused to avail themselves of this amnesty. They have stated their reasons in a document which lies upon your Lordships’ table. They say, “We do not object to this amnesty from personal considerations or feelings, but on principle; for if we avail ourselves of this amnesty, we shall admit the injustice of our conduct in struggling for the preservation of the liberties of our country, and we shall admit the justice of the proceedings taken against us.” Upon those grounds, therefore, they refused to avail themselves of it, and, in doing so, I think they acted with the greatest possible propriety. If my noble Friend did exert himself in the Conferences, the result of his interference must be not only mortifying to him but offensive to the Government which he represented. It may be said, and I dare say will be said, that it is very inconvenient that I should bring forward a question of this kind at the present moment; but I do not incline to that opinion. I am in no way connected with the Government. No one is responsible for anything which falls from me. I am not speaking as the representative of any party. I am speaking my own opinion, and I am sure, in speaking that opinion, I am speaking the opinion of every wise and temperate man in this country and on the continent of Europe. I feel it is a duty that every person who is placed in a position where his voice can be heard should raise his voice in denouncing injustice, tyranny, and oppression. To commit injustice is a crime; to treat it with silence is to participate in the criminality; and that must be my justification for the course I have taken. I wish, therefore, to put to my noble Friend, in point of form, the question of which I have given notice—that is, whether the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs has received any official communication of the recent Act of amnesty issued in favour of the Polish exiles by the Emperor of Russia; and, if so, whether he will lay a copy of it on the table of the House?

THE EARL OF CLARENDON: My Lords, when the amnesty to which my noble and learned Friend has called the attention of your Lordships was recently issued, we had neither diplomatic nor consular agents of Russia in this country. Her Majesty's Government have consequently not received a copy of this document, for the correctness of which they can vouch; but that amnesty has been published in all the newspapers, and I have no doubt that which is published is correct. My noble and learned Friend certainly requires no apology on his part for bringing this question under your Lordships' consideration. He says truly, he is speaking as an independent Member of this House—that he belongs to no party—that no one is responsible for what he says; but he considers it his duty to lift up his voice against what he characterises as injustice and oppression. I think my noble Friend is at full liberty to take the course which he has taken. I am, however, sure he will understand that the responsibility which weighs on me in the office which I hold prevents me following him in those remarks, or characterising the acts of a foreign Government by such terms; and I am further restrained by the belief that the cause of the Poles would be prejudiced rather than served by my doing so. In answer to my noble and learned Friend, I have to assure him that, being fully alive to all those circumstances in Polish history to which he has referred, and which are familiar to your Lordships, the British Plenipotentiaries, in conjunction with the French Plenipotentiaries, had determined to bring the question of Poland before the Congress, together with other matters of general and European interest, after a treaty of peace had been disposed of. We had every reason to believe that the intentions of the Emperor of Russia towards Poland were generous and benevolent. We believed that the Emperor was prepared to grant a general amnesty, to restore certain national institutions to Poland, to recognise the religion and language of Poland, and to place education in Poland upon a larger and more national footing. We believed, in short, that it was the intention of the Emperor of Russia to depart from that harsh system which has hitherto prevailed in the Government of Poland; and it was with these expectations weighing upon us that we determined to bring the subject before the Congress. But at the same time we felt it to be our duty to make inquiry as to what might be the result of that proceeding on our parts. We believed that, although the Russian Plenipotentiaries might deny our right to interrogate them, and might say, in reply to our demands, that they were not there to answer any inquiries we might make respecting the internal administration of a portion of the Russian empire; yet we did think it might not be inconsistent with the policy of the Emperor of Russia, and might form a fitting collateral termination to the labours upon which we were engaged at Paris, that he should have authorised his Plenipotentiaries to announce to Europe the intentions he entertained towards Poland, and the mode in which they were to be carried into effect. But when we found that this would not be the case, and that any proceeding on our part was likely to lead to misrepresentation in Russia, and would interfere with those acts of clemency for which certainly the Emperor of Russia had a right to choose his own time, and which as certainly would lose much of their grace if it were supposed that they had been suggested or promoted by those Powers with whom he had lately been at war—when we found that such would be beyond all doubt the case, the French and English Plenipotentiaries departed from their previous determination, and they said nothing about Poland, not because they were indifferent to the fate and the futurity of Poland, but because they believed that in the present instance it would be for the interest of Poland itself to remain silent. That was the course we pursued, or rather those are our reasons for not pursuing the course which my noble and learned Friend seems to think we ought to have followed. Certainly, after the expression of clement intentions on the part of the Emperor of Russia upon his accession to the throne, I, for one, did look for a realisation of those intentions, and, in common with every one else, I have felt disappointment at this so-called amnesty. I am unable to account for what has led to an act of clemency so restricted in its nature, and which must be inoperative; but I do know that the mere rumour of a real and general amnesty produced the greatest enthusiasm in Warsaw in favour of the Emperor, and justified the belief which was entertained in Paris that a large measure of this kind would be completely successful and would render the Polish subjects loyal and grateful, instead of being a source of trouble and anxiety. I say, the mere rumour of an amnesty produced enthusiasm in favour of the Emperor of Russia, and I cannot but think that that manifestation of feeling must have been gratifying, and, if I may presume to say so, encouraging to him; because, as far as we know the Emperor's character, judging from all matters over which he personally presides, he is just and generous. He is, so far as we know, alive to the sufferings of his people, he desires to promote their happiness and prosperity, and he is deeply sensible of the responsibility which weighs upon him in governing a vast empire which is entirely dependent upon his will. Therefore, my Lords, if we are correct in our estimate of the Emperor's character, I cannot believe that Poland has not something more to hope for and to expect from him than this amnesty which my noble Friend has brought under our notice. But, my Lords, I must say I believe that if the Emperor does intend doing anything for Poland it must be spontaneous, and I believe that that country would derive little benefit from either Parliamentary discussion or the expression of individual opinion.

THE CHELSEA COMMISSIONERS' REPORT—QUESTION.

THE EARL OF LUCAN said, he had put a question to the noble Lord the Secretary for War, on a previous evening, the answer to which was not satisfactory. The Report of the Chelsea Commissioners, to which he had referred, had been, he believed, placed in the hands of Her Majesty on Monday last, although the noble Lord on Tuesday stated that he was not aware whether it had been presented or not. If, however, it had been presented to Her Majesty, he wished to know why it had not already been laid upon the table of the House. The noble Lord had led the House to believe that there was something still to be done before the Report could be published; that at some subsequent stage after receiving Her Majesty's approval it would have to receive the sanction of the Government. He (the Earl of Lucan) thought it was only right and just to himself and other officers that the Report should be placed upon the table and published to the country at the earliest possible moment. He wished to ask the Secretary of State for the War Department, When Her Majesty's Government would lay before Parliament the Report of the Chelsea Board of General Officers?

LORD PANMURE agreed with the noble Earl that it was only an act of justice towards those officers whose conduct had been impugned, and at whose instance the Board of Inquiry had been constituted, that the Report of the Board should be made public at the earliest possible moment. The noble Earl had asked him a question upon the subject on Tuesday last, at which time he (Lord Panmure) was not aware that the Report had been presented to Her Majesty, and he answered accordingly. However, it appeared the noble Earl was better acquainted with what passed between Her Majesty and the Commander-in-Chief than himself, for it proved to be a fact that on Monday last the Commander-in-Chief did present the Report, and was in the act of explaining some portion of it to Her Majesty, when he was seized with the illness under which he still laboured. That Report was presented in manuscript, and was unaccompanied by the evidence upon which it was based, and to which it constantly referred. The evidence was now added; but Her Majesty, being anxious to make herself acquainted with that Report, had not yet sent it to him (Lord Panmure), and therefore, up to the present moment, the Government was not in possession of it. The course which the Government proposed to follow in regard to the Report was based upon the precedent of the inquiry which resulted from the Convention of Cintra. The Commissioners reported to the Commander-in-Chief, and, through him, to the Sovereign, who then referred the Report to Her Ministers for any advice thereupon which they might deem it their duty to submit. That was the course which the Judge-Advocate had pronounced to be regular and according to precedent, and which the Government intended to adopt. When the Report should be sent to the Government they would take it into consideration, so far as it was their duty to do so, before they gave any advice to the Sovereign upon the subject.

THE EARL OF LUCAN said, that from what had fallen from the noble Lord he did not see the slightest prospect of justice being done to those officers at whose instance the inquiry was instituted; therefore he should give notice that he would move an Address to Her Majesty on Tuesday next for the papers.

RULES OF THE HOUSE—QUESTION.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, he wished to put a question to Mr. Speaker upon a matter affecting the proceedings of the House. There was a difference of opinion as to the privilege which Members had in raising discussions upon the different stages of the Appropriation Bill. It was contended by some that Members had the same right at the different stages of the Appropriation Bill that they had upon Supply, seeing that the Appropriation Bill was in fact to give legal effect to the Votes in Supply, and the application of the public money. There were others who seemed to be under the impression that upon the different stages of the Appropriation Bill they were limited to observations simply on the clauses of the Bill. He was anxious, for the guidance of the House, that the right hon. Gentleman should tell them what the rule was. He perceived by looking back that there had been various proceedings taken on the stages of that Bill. Last year, on the third reading of the Bill, the noble Lord the Member for London (Lord J. Russell) introduced the whole question of our foreign policy, and the Italian question, and the Prime Minister also made a long speech on foreign policy on the same occasion. On a previous occasion the late Mr. Lucas brought on the unequal operation of the income tax in one of the stages of the Appropriation Bill. It was most important that they should adhere to their rules, but at the same time that they should depart from no constitutional privilege which they had enjoyed.

MR. SPEAKER: In answer to the question of the right hon. Gentleman, I have to state that Members have no more privileges with respect to the Appropriation Bill than with reference to any other Bill before the House, and that any observation which they may wish to make, and any Amendments which they may wish to propose, on this Bill, ought to be strictly relevant to the question before the House. As the right hon. Gentleman has been kind enough to give me notice of the question which he has put to me, I have been able to refer to the Report of a Committee of which I had the honour to be a member in 1837, and on which also the noble Lord the Member for London (Lord J. Russell) and the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Carlisle (Sir J. Graham) sat. That Committee was appointed to consider the state of public business at that time, and I have no doubt it will be in the recollection of many hon. Members, that a very inconvenient and irregular practice had been introduced of moving Amendments upon the Orders of the Day. Members asserted that they had the right upon the Question that an Order of the Day be read, of moving any Amendment they thought proper, and if the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. M. Gibson) will turn to the Report of those proceedings, he will find that most of the Amendments to which he has referred were Amendments on the Orders of the Day. The Committee consulted the then Speaker, Mr. Abercromby, and all those persons connected with the House of Commons who had had the greatest experience in Parliamentary matters, and I will read to the House a paragraph from their Report bearing on this question; but I must first explain that the Committee recommended that this practice of moving Amendments on the Orders of the Day should be discontinued, and that there should only be two Amendments allowed on this question—namely, that the other Orders of the Day should be read, or that some particular Order should be read. They proceed to state:—

“Your Committee have been given to understand that, according to the practice now followed, it would be considered disorderly to interpose upon this question (unless, of course, with the excepts stated of a Committee of Supply or Ways and Means), by interposing any question not strictly relating to the Bill, which the House by its Order has resolved upon considering; and they have therefore deemed it unnecessary to provide against the occurrence of an attempt to disturb this course of proceeding, although they wish strongly to impress upon the House the propriety of maintaining what they deem to be the established practice at present, should any attempt to interfere with it be made.

This I take to be a clear statement of the rules of the House, and that Members have really no greater privileges with reference to the Appropriation Bill than on any other Bill. With reference to the speech made by the noble Lord the Member for London last year, to which the right hon. Gentleman has alluded, the noble Lord, I remember, put himself in order by referring at the commencement of his speech to certain votes in the Appropriation Bill, upon which the noble Lord founded the observations he then made.

MR. ROEBUCK: Was that recommendation ever affirmed by a Resolution of this House?

MR. SPEAKER: That Report was framed after great consideration. It stated what was the rule of the House at that time. That rule has been maintained ever since, and it is a rule which I shall consider it to be my duty to maintain until the House shall otherwise order.

THE INDIAN SALT DUTIES—QUESTION.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Control, whether it was the intention of Her Majesty's Government, in consequence of the Report from the Commissioner appointed to inquire into the system of manufacturing salt in India, to effect any change in the present salt monopoly of the Indian Government in the Presidencies of Bengal and Madras, or to lower the rates of duty on salt.

MR. VERNON SMITH said, that the Report alluded to by the right hon. Baronet was not yet completed. A great portion of Bengal had not yet been reported on, but when the Report was completed it would be the duty of the Indian Government to consider the whole system with a view to its revision. The Commissioner was a man of great experience and authority, and no doubt the steps taken by the Indian Government would be in conformity with his Report.

THE SADLEIR FRAUDS—QUESTION.

MR. MACARTNEY said, he begged to ask the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland the name of the magistrate before whom any informations were sworn, the date of the same, and the day upon which a warrant was issued for the apprehension of Mr. James Sadleir?

SIR GEORGE GREY said, if he might be allowed to interpose between his right hon. and learned Friend and the hon. Gentleman, he would take the liberty of pointing out the great inconvenience of putting questions of this kind when it was not in the power of the right hon. and learned Gentleman to whom the question was addressed to enter into a full explanation of the circumstances pending a criminal prosecution. Independently of that consideration, the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland had just received information from Ireland that a statement had been made that morning by the Master of the Rolls from the bench, bringing several charges of a grave character against his conduct in the administration of his office as Attorney General. If any Member of that House should think fit to bring any specific charge against the right hon. and learned Gentleman, he was prepared to give a complete answer to it in that House, but if no hon. Member was prepared to embody his suspicions, if he might so call them, in the form of a Resolution, to be submitted to the House; then, the right hon. and learned Gentleman, as soon as he could obtain an accurate copy of what had fallen from the learned Judge, would himself be ready to bring forward the question in that House, and would give the House a full and complete explanation of the course which he had pursued. In the meantime, he hoped the House would not call upon the right hon. and learned Gentleman for any statement, either in reference to this question or in reference to the notice which had been given by a right hon. Gentleman for to-night, which it was the opinion of the Government it was inexpedient, under the circumstances of the case, that he should make.

MR. MACARTNEY said, he must beg to explain that the reason of his putting the question was in consequence of an apparent discrepancy in the dates mentioned by the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. J. D. FitzGerald).

CENTRAL AMERICA—QUESTION.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, that it had been publicly stated by the officer of a company, called the Central American Commercial and Agricultural Company, that he had in his possession a letter from the Secretary of State for the Colonies, setting forth definitively the limits of the British settlement of Belize and its dependencies. He wished to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether that document was in existence, and if it were, whether there would be any objection to lay it on the table of the House?

MR. LABOUCHERE said, that in the year 1836 a letter was addressed by his right hon. Friend the Home Secretary (Sir G. Grey), who was then Under-Secretary for the Colonies, to a Mr. Coxe, in which he stated what were at that time the views of the British Government with regard to the limits of the settlement of Belize. If the right hon. Gentleman moved for the production of the letter, there would be no objection to lay it on the table.

MR. MILNER GIBSON said, he would then move for the production of a copy of the letter.

Motion agreed to.

THE ROYAL ENGINEERS IN THE CRIMEA.

On the question that the House at its rising should adjourn till Monday.

CAPTAIN LEICESTER VERNON : Sir, I rise pursuant to notice to call the attention of the House to the services of the corps of Royal Engineers in the Crimea. I do so because there is a disposition abroad to depreciate the services of the British army in the Crimea. I think it high time that something should be done to counteract this tendency to detract, and I believe that my statement this evening will be a step in that direction. No detractor has ventured to question the courage and the conduct of the British soldiers of the general service. So far as the special corps are concerned, I have never heard any one bold enough to say the British Artillery was second to any in the world, and my statement this evening, I trust, will show that the British Engineers were equal, to say the very least, to any body of Engineers that ever took the field. The war that has just terminated, unlike any other modern war on record, narrowed itself into one mighty siege. The victory of the Alma was but the introduction to the siege of Sebastopol, and the battles of Balaklava, of Inkerman, and of the Tchernaya, were but futile attempts on the part of the Russians to raise that siege. A fortress important rather for its uses than for its strength—a fortress so low in the scale of scientific defence that it was supposed, erroneously enough, to be open to a surprise, so moderately fortified that it was considered liable to the affront of a coup de main, became, under the pressure of circumstances and by the mere force of earthworks erected by the genius of Todleben, one of the strongest places on record, and held at bay for eleven months the chivalrous valour and the military science of the world. This war, then, being a siege, it follows that the battle was fought by science. It was a war of engineers, and I rise in my place to claim for the British Engineers their full share in the achieving that great result which has brought about the peace. There were three great turning points on which the success of the war depended. First, there was the selection of a place of landing in the Crimea; secondly, there was the decision as to which front of Sebastopol should be attacked—for we were not in a condition to invest the whole, according to the real acceptation of the term; and thirdly, and most important, was the discovery of the key to the position of the front to be attacked. Now, Sir, I may at once avow that I claim for the British Engineers the decision on all these three points, and I shall confine myself, as much as possible, to proving that this was the case. I must trust to the indulgence of hon. Members while I place historically before them these three questions in their relative positions. It will be seen at a glance that this question widens itself from a corps question into a national one. What I now say, by the aid of the press, will be spread far and wide. What I now say will, doubtless, by many be impugned, and it therefore behoves me to start on a proper base, and to go on adding fact to fact in order to be able to defy all contradiction. In January, 1854, on account of the appearances in the East, Colonel Vicars, with three engineers, left England to place themselves under the orders of Admiral Dundas, who commanded in the East. At Gibraltar, Colonel Vicars was taken ill, and the command devolved upon Captain Chapman, now Colonel Chapman, whose distinguished services I have had occasion previously to bring under the notice of the House. These officers joined the fleet in the Bosphorus, and were despatched to reconnoitre the strong position of Maidos, near the Dardanelles. Now, at this juncture the home authorities were without any precise information with regard to the East. In this dilemma, Sir John Burgoyne, whose high position as Inspector General of Fortifications, might well have excused him from the arduous undertaking, volunteered his services, at this inclement season, to proceed to the East, to make military observations of such forces as should be sent by the allied French and English armies in support of the Turks, in the event of a war with Russia which then appeared imminent. His services were accepted with eagerness. On his way through Paris the Emperor Napoleon associated with him, Colonel Ardant, an officer of French Engineers. These two officers proceeded together to the Dardanelles, and inspected the position of Maidos, and afterwards of Boulahir, preferring which latter the officers of Engineers were withdrawn from Maidos to reconnoitre Boulahir, which they did in that inclement season, the snow being then deep on the ground. Sir John Burgoyne and Colonel Ardant then proceeded to Constantinople to reconnoitre the position of Bujukchekmedji, about twelve miles from Constantinople, a strong position, intended to be made the base of operations and to cover Constantinople. Colonel Ardant went forward to examine the position of Kara-su, where strong lines of defence were available, connecting the sea of Marmora with the Black Sea. Sir John Burgoyne meantime went to Shumla to confer with Omar Pasha, and he reconnoitred and reported upon Varna. Thence he returned to England, leaving Colonel Ardant

at Gallipoli. Now, while Sir John Burgoyne was at Constantinople, there was presented to him a project for the defence of that town by certain French officers attached to the embassy—these lines of defence were to pass from the Sea of Marmora to the Golden Horn, and from that to the Bosphorus, passing within a mile of the suburbs of Constantinople. The ground no doubt was ably taken up, but Sir John Burgoyne at once pointed out that it was faulty, because it passed close to an enormous population, and a city liable to conflagration as Constantinople notoriously was; but the principal objection, however, was, that it abandoned to the enemy the Bosphorus, which was our only means of communication with the Black Sea. This plan of defence, therefore, was abandoned in favour of that of Kara-su, which in every point resembled the lines of Lisbon, with a similar advantage of the stronghold of Bujukchekmedji. War being at length declared, the allied army was sent to Gallipoli, and took up the intrenched post of Boulahir; they then proceeded to Constantinople, leaving a small force to occupy Gallipoli. The Russians having made no impression on the Danube, notwithstanding their vast military resources, and the allied armies having advanced to Varna, in support of the Turks, the proceedings of Sir John Burgoyne and of Colonel Ardant were criticised as being too cautious and unenterprising, by taking up a defensive position for Constantinople and the Dardanelles; but it must be remembered that at that time the war had not begun, and it could not have been supposed that the Russians, who, in so arrogant a manner, had forced on the war, should have been held entirely in check by the Turks; and it was therefore requisite that Constantinople should be protected, and the Dardanelles, without which there were no means of communicating with the Sea of Marmora, the Bosphorus, or the Black Sea, which latter was at that time in the possession of the Russian fleet; in a word, it would have been impossible to trust an allied army in that country if such a strong position as Gallipoli and its adjacents had not been found. Such was the opinion of the Emperor Napoleon, and, what is more to my purpose, such was the opinion of Sir John Burgoyne. In August, Sir John Burgoyne was sent out to command the engineers in the Crimea, and was placed upon the staff. In September the army embarked at Varna for the purpose of invading the Crimea. And now, Sir, I come to the first point I wish to prove, namely, the selection of the part of the Crimea in which the landing was to be effected. A council of war assembled on board the Caradoc. It was attended, on the part of the French, by General Canrobert, by Colonel Trochu, one of the French staff, and by General Bizot, the French engineer; and on the part of the English, by Lord Raglan, by Sir George Brown, by Sir Edmund Lyons, and by Sir John Burgoyne. The French held the opinion that the best place to land was at the mouth of the Katcha, and I believe that Sir George Brown coincided with that opinion, but he said, "Before coming to a decision on this point, I think we ought to know the opinion of Sir John Burgoyne, who has had more practical experience than any other officer present." On this Sir John Burgoyne declared that the Katcha was not the proper place to land, that it was a difficult and defensible ground, and close to the resources and reserves of the Russians, and he pointed out, on the other hand, that the safest place for the allied forces to land was at the Old Fort. Sir John Burgoyne's representations were made known to Marshal St. Arnaud, who at once grasped the idea and consented to the proposition. The landing, therefore, was safely effected at the Old Fort, and Eupatoria in the rear was seized and occupied. The abandoning of the idea of landing at the Katcha was very distasteful to some of the officers of the French staff, but when that place fell into our hands, it was seen that Sir John Burgoyne's estimate of the difficulty was right, and that an attempt to land there would most probably have been followed by failure and disaster. I therefore think, Sir, that I have now proved my first point, and that I have a right to claim the selection of the place of landing for the British engineers. I come now, Sir, to my second point—that is, the selection of the side on which Sebastopol was to be attacked. After the battle of the Alma the troops advanced towards Sebastopol, across the rivers Katcha and the Belbek. Now, the intention of the French, and for which they had prepared projects, was to attack Sebastopol on the north side. Sebastopol on the north side was situated on a promontory, and its defences were placed on rocky heights, having in front of them strong ground of a very defensible character, narrowed by the bay of Belbek on one side and the broad and deep valley of the Tchernaya at the head of the harbour on the other side, the promontory being dominated by a strong permanent work called the "Severnaia." Now, Sir John Burgoyne did not think that the north side of Sebastopol was the side to be effectually attacked; he rather held to the opinion that it should be attacked on the south side, and he wrote a Report to Lord Raglan, giving his reasons for holding that opinion, an extract from which Report I will now, with the permission of the House, proceed to read—

"The communications with the fleet, whence all resources were necessarily obtained, would be from the fine bays and harbours of Balaklava, Kamiesch, and Kazatch, instead of from an entirely open beach, which was alone available on the north. The fronts that were exposed to attack were extensive, and, though naturally of great strength, were not more so than that of the north, which was limited, and, consequently, admitted of defence after defence. The south side covered the docks, barracks, and all the great establishments of the place; whereas, if the north promontory were obtained, there was the harbour still intervening, which could not be crossed by any means; and the only resource would have been a bombardment, and not possession. In rear of the encamping ground to be occupied by the allies in front of Sebastopol on the south side was a compact and most powerful position facing the country, and the communication to it from the harbours was direct and comparatively short, while on the north there was no favourable position on the land side; the ground to cover the camp and landing places must have been of enormous extent, for that landing could not have been nearer than the Katcha, as the Belbek was commanded by the enemy's batteries, and the communication would have been much longer, and over two heights instead of one. The enemy, if attacked on the north, having but one front of the garrison, of moderate extent, to cover could have greatly increased the outer field army for raising the siege. In thoroughly considering every circumstance, it is impossible to conceive how the operations could possibly be sustained against the north side; nor how the army, were it to remain there, could avoid some frightful catastrophe."

This Report, Sir, was sent to Marshal St. Arnaud; and that officer, with his usual sagacity, accepted the idea, and consented to attacking Sebastopol on the south side. Then came the question, how was that to be done? If there be one axiom in war more cogent than another, it is that an army should never separate itself from its base; and if there is any other axiom equal to that in cogency, it is that a flank march should never be made in the presence of a powerful or victorious enemy.

Yet, at first sight, it would seem that the proposition of Sir John Burgoyne, who said "March boldly from the north to the south," embraced both these military errors; but it was not so in fact. He proposed to leave one base, but the base moved, so that he should fall upon it again; and the flank march to enable him to reach the south side of Sebastopol was not made in the face of a victorious but in the rear of a flying and disorganised enemy, and it would place the allied army between Menchikoff and Sebastopol. The movement was, therefore, undertaken, and the army sat down before Sebastopol, never to rise from it again till it left that place and its defences a shapeless ruin. I think, Sir, therefore, that I am entitled to say that I have proved my second point, and that I have a right to claim the selection of the side on which Sebastopol should be attacked for the British Engineers. The siege was now commenced with scanty military means. There were only 300 or 400 sappers where there should have been as many thousands—for it should be remembered that behind the earthworks at Sebastopol was ranged the whole military power of Russia—and where, if there had been as many thousands, it would have saved thousand of lives and millions of money to the Allies. There were eighty officers of Engineers sent to the Crimea; of these forty-three were killed, wounded, or put hors de combat—a wholesale slaughter without a parallel. Many of these officers passed in that inclement season, and under what the French call "fire of hell," 100 nights in the trenches, making nearly a third of the whole time of the siege. Under that fire the executive officers, Chapman and Gordon, erected batteries of so substantial a character that they were not damaged by the fire of the enemy. The British artillery destroyed the fire of Todleben, the Russian artillery swept from the face of the earth the French batteries, but no missile hurled against the English batteries stopped for one single moment their steady, sure, and onward course. I shall now come to my third point. From the first reconnaissance of Sebastopol, Sir John Burgoyne perceived that the Malakoff was the key to the position of the front attack, and he so represented it to Lord Raglan. After the battle of Inkerman he again impressed on the authorities that the Malakoff was the place to be attacked. Upon the arrival of General Niel, the French aide-de-camp of engineers to the Emperor, a council of war of the allied engineers was held; at that council of war Sir John Burgoyne again represented that the Malakoff was the key to the position, and that it should be attacked. After the council of war had been held, wishing to place on record his opinion he reduced it to writing, and, through Lord Raglan, sent it to the French engineer General Niel. The following day General Niel called a council of French engineers to take under consideration Sir John Burgoyne's memoir—they prepared a procès verbal of what there took place, and sent a copy of it to Lord Raglan for Sir John Burgoyne's information. The first paragraph of that procès verbal stated that the Malakoff should be attacked in compliance with the opinion of Sir John Burgoyne. The words used were these—

"Il résulte des dispositions adoptées en conseil, et suivant le vœu exprimé par le Lieutenant Général Sir John Burgoyne, que des travaux d'approche devront être exécutés devant la tour Malakoff, afin de pouvoir attaquer, par ce point dominant, le faubourg de Karabelnaia, en même temps qu'on donnera l'assaut à la partie ouest de la ville."

I think, therefore, Sir, I have a right to say that I have made out my third point, and that I am justified in claiming the discovery of the key to the front attacked for the British Engineers. Now, Sir, that I have established the claim of the British Engineers to the merit of deciding on the three turning points of this war—they forming a part, and an important one, of the British army—what becomes of the case of those who would seek to depreciate the services of the British army in the Crimea?

Subject dropped.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS AND THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND.

MR. NAPIER: Sir, an appeal has been made to me not to put a question of which I have given notice, and which has reference to a charge made a week ago in this House against one of the Judges of the land, a very esteemed Friend of mine. With that request I unfortunately cannot comply. I heard my friend charged by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland, with disregard of the obligation of his oath as a Privy Councillor. To that charge I listened with the deepest pain; but I did not interpose, because I thought that it would be better to wait until I was in full possession of all the facts of the case. Of these facts I am now completely master, and, being so, I am prepared for any investigation which it may be thought right to institute, yet I am now to be told that inquiry is inexpedient, and that my mouth is to be closed, and that I am not to rebut the charge of the right hon. and learned Gentleman. Sir, I must protest against such treatment, and I confidently rely on the sense of honour and justice which distinguishes this House. I stand up not so much to repel the charge of the Attorney General for Ireland—though that also I am prepared to do—as to defend the right of an absent man—a man of as high honour as ever sat in this assembly—a man of unblemished character and unimpeachable integrity, and one of whose friendship I have ever been proud. I rise, Sir, to solicit the privilege of making a short statement, and of putting to the Attorney General for Ireland this simple question—whether he is prepared to abide by the charge which he made in this House a few evenings since against my right hon. and learned Friend the Irish Master of the Rolls? If so, I am prepared to meet him on that point. I will meet him anywhere—in this House or out of this House, and I will fearlessly declare what I honestly believe—that his charge is wanton and unfounded. That charge is, that there has been on the part of the Master of the Rolls, a disregard of the obligation of his oath as a Privy Councillor. I have myself the honour to be a Privy Councillor, and so, too, have the Lord Chief Justice of the Queen's Bench in Ireland, the Lord Chief Justice of the Common Pleas, the Lord Chief Baron, and my learned friend Mr. Brewster. We are all Members of the Privy Council, and it is essential to our honour that it should be distinctly understood what are our duties and obligations as such, for it would appear, according to the doctrine laid down by the Attorney General for Ireland, that it is part of our duty to go as informers to the Castle of Dublin, and, if we are Judges, to lay before the Lord Lieutenant the particulars of the cases which may have come under our judicial cognisance, with a view to the institution of criminal proceedings. According to the doctrine of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland the Master of the Rolls, who, by his assiduity, acuteness, and great learning, had unravelled a most notorious fraud, was bound under the obligation of his oath as a Privy Councillor to put the Irish Executive in motion, and to lay before them such information as would have induced them to interfere, in order that the criminal—a Member of this House—might be brought to justice. The case of the Attorney General for Ireland is, that a crime was committed; that the criminal has fled, and is no longer amenable to the law; and that his facilities for flight and the consequent miscarriage of justice are to be attributed to a disregard on the part of the Master of the Rolls of his solemn oath as a Privy Councillor and of his duty towards his Sovereign. Sir, I heard that accusation with profound indignation, but I have now obtained an accurate knowledge of all the facts, and I am prepared to abide by any decision that the House may pronounce on the statement I am about to submit. On the 3rd of March, the affairs of the Tipperary Joint-stock Bank came before the Master of the Rolls for Ireland on a Motion under the Winding-up Act. The Master of the Rolls investigated the case with all the patience, diligence, and industry, for which he is remarkable—and that, let me assure you, is saying not a little, for there never sat upon the bench a Judge who was governed by a more intense love of justice. He saw at a glance that there had been fraud of a gross and gigantic character. He investigated it carefully and most minutely, and in the judgment which he delivered on that preliminary motion, he emphatically called attention to the swindling which had occurred, and which affected a large number of persons and a vast amount of property; and he made especial allusion to the fictitious balance-sheet that had been signed by a gentleman who professed to act on behalf of the directors. The observations which fell from the bench on that occasion were canvassed by the public press, and on the 10th of March the leading journal of this country, commenting upon the case, urged the propriety of taking measures to prevent the escape of the parties implicated, and recommended that the attention of the public prosecutor should be called to the subject. Subsequently the matter came under the consideration of a Master in Chancery, on an application relating to certain English shareholders, who had been victimised. The Master heard the case, and certainly he was of opinion—though the facts on which he based that opinion are not known to us—that those shareholders were liable, and in so deciding he also released other parties from the imputation of fraud. But from that decision, there was an appeal to the Master of the Rolls in Ireland. It came on for argument at the latter end of the month of May, and was earnestly debated by some of the most learned and able men at the bar. I have a shorthand note of the proceedings, and I beg the attention of hon. Members to the importance of the dates. On the 3rd of June the arguments ended, and the Attorney General for Ireland asserts, that upon that occasion the Master of the Rolls disregarded his duty as Judge. [Mr. J. D. FITZGERALD: No, no!] I beg your pardon, I heard the charge made, and I have a distinct recollection of the words. I heard it made, and I also heard the words cheered by the right hon. Baronet the Home Secretary. The charge was that, before being prepared to give judgment, the Master of the Rolls prematurely broke out in accusations against the Government—that if the offender had escaped, his escape was attributable to this precipitate expression of opinion—and that that eminent Judge had also violated his duty as a Privy Councillor in not communicating the criminatory facts and documents which came before him to the Lord Lieutenant, who would have handed over the facts and the materials to the Attorney General for Ireland, to enable him to prosecute. On the 3rd of June, the Master of the Rolls, after alluding to the enormous frauds that had been committed, and intimating that from the very great importance of the case, his Honour would defer his judgment to a future day, said—

“That the Irish Government appeared to have taken no notice of the case, and he must say that, if the Government remained quiescent, they would be guilty of the greatest dereliction of their duty to the public, and could not complain if the public should say that they had connived at the matter; and that there might be no mistake about it he would read what the law was from the judgment of Lord Campbell in the case of Burnes v. Pennell (2d House of Lords' Cases, p. 524). His Honour then read from the judgment the quotation about the fictitious dividend of £15 per cent., and that directors giving such were guilty of a conspiracy, and were liable to be prosecuted and punished, the same as the last quotation afterwards given in his Honour's written judgment. Mr. Fitzgibbon then read from the Banker's Act, that such frauds were punishable by prosecution and imprisonment; and his Honour concluded by saying, ‘he would wish to know if such a system of fraud was to be carried on in a civilised country and no notice taken of it.’”

Mr. Napier

The materials for a criminal prosecution having presented themselves, the Master of the Rolls, finding that in the interval, between the 3rd of March and the 3rd of June, nothing whatever had been done to bring the delinquent to justice, declared there could be no doubt that, speaking on the authority of the opinions expressed by Lord Campbell and Lord Brougham in the House of Lords, a criminal fraud had been committed in the case which he was investigating. The real party inculpated by these observations was undoubtedly the Member for Tipperary. This occurred on the 3rd of June. In a letter addressed to me the Master of the Rolls says, that every fact and statement referred to in his judgment was supported by some one or other of the affidavits deposited in the Master's Office, or in the hands of the official manager of the bank. Thus, every source of information accessible to the Master of the Rolls was equally as accessible to the law officers of the Crown. Soon afterwards the remarkable letter from John Sadleir to his brother, directing the latter as to the mode in which the fraud should be committed, was discovered, and having been lodged with the official manager, came to the knowledge of the Attorney General for Ireland on the 14th of June. Now, Sir, I boldly avouch that the Master of the Rolls has done his duty as a Privy Councillor. What are the obligations contained in the oath taken by a Privy Councillor? In Blackstone's Commentaries, vol. i., page 230, it is stated—

“The duty of a Privy Councillor appears, from the oath of office, which consists of seven articles—1st. To advise the King according to the best of his cunning and discretion. 2nd. To advise for the King's honour, and the good of the public, without partiality, through affection, love, need, doubt, or dread. 3rd. To keep the King's counsel secret. 4th. To avoid corruption. 5th. To help and strengthen the execution of what shall be there resolved. 6th. To withstand all persons who would attempt the contrary. And lastly, in general, 7thly. To observe, keep, and do all that a good and true councillor ought to do to his sovereign lord.”

Therefore, in the face of this House and the public, I challenge the Attorney General for Ireland, as a man of character and honour, to point out what part of this oath has not been faithfully and scrupulously observed by a Judge as fearless as he is faithful. I call upon the right hon. and learned Gentleman to state the grounds upon which he has impeached the conduct of the Judge, who, by dint of great learning, assiduity, and zeal, has succeeded in unravelling a gigantic system of fraud, and in eliciting sufficient materials to enable the Law Officers of the Crown, by the exercise of proper diligence, to detect the criminal and bring him to condign punishment. Well might any man, under the circumstances, have been astounded and indignant at no inquiry being instituted, and no step taken in order to put the delinquent on his trial. The Master of the Rolls, as was to be expected, was surprised at this, and he made the observation imputed to him. Now, Sir, what occurred on the 3rd of June? A telegraphic message came across to know the day on which the Master of the Rolls intended to give his judgment in form—the Master of the Rolls having postponed his formal judgment that he might put it in a final shape. A more elaborate judgment I never read—it brings home to the parties, beyond a doubt, the case against them. That was on the 20th of June. Now, what was done between the 3rd of June and the 20th? After the judgment of the 20th of June, the Attorney General for Ireland, for the first time, applies to the Master of the Rolls on the subject. The Master of the Rolls sees the counsel of the Attorney General in chambers, and he gives the right hon. and learned Gentleman every information in his power, and tells him where to get the documents. After the 3rd of June the letter of Mr. John Sadleir to his brother James appeared. The Attorney General, on the 17th or 18th of June, said that the criminal had escaped; but mind, I do not want to mix up the two questions more than necessary. I came here to defend the Master of the Rolls, and to speak out my mind that he has been injured wrongfully in the face of the public; that a gross fraud having been detected, it has been imputed to him that through him the criminal has escaped justice. Now, I say that up to the time I have indicated, the Master of the Rolls applied his mind to the case, and furnished the means by which the criminal could be secured. It is painful to have to defend a man who has discharged his judicial duties so ably, from the observations of the right hon. and learned Gentleman, who has held him up to the world as not having discharged his duty as a Judge, and as violating his oath as a Privy Councillor. I have for many years had the satisfaction of labouring with the talented, indefatigable, and honest Master of the Rolls; the friendship and regard which I contracted for him have never since its commencement for a moment diminished, and I trust it never will; and of this I am certain, that a more able and more painstaking, a more impartial Judge, and one more devoted in his duty to his Sovereign, never sat on the bench. I feel it to be most painful to have to defend such a Judge from being held up in this House as having violated his duty as a Judge and a Privy Councillor. I should be sorry if the Attorney General for Ireland were denied the amplest opportunity for offering explanations. This case must be thoroughly sifted, because the honour of this House is involved in it. A Member of this Assembly stands charged with having been concerned in a gigantic fraud, by which many innocent persons in this country would have been victimised but for the intervention of the Master of the Rolls—he has escaped from justice, and it is essential that we should inquire by whose default his escape has arisen. For myself, I can only say that in any such investigation I shall be glad to render my best assistance, with a sincere desire that every man impugned should have a fair opportunity of defending himself. I hope, therefore, that the Government will afford the earliest opportunity for an inquiry to take place. The public demands one, and it must be conceded. But the point which I wish to put to the Attorney General for Ireland is this—he may have unadvisedly and in a moment of inadvertence made this charge against the Master of the Rolls. If so, I call on him unequivocally to retract it, and frankly to acknowledge that it cannot be sustained, and then, for myself, I shall be content that this painful controversy should at once terminate. But, on the other hand, if these unfounded aspersions are not unambiguously and explicitly withdrawn—if the slightest stain is still attempted to be cast upon the spotless honour of this upright and learned Judge, I have no alternative but to pursue this inquiry to the uttermost, until we have a full investigation into all the circumstances.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. J. D. FITZGERALD): Sir, the House will doubtless recollect the challenge thrown down by the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin, and I can assure it that I am not one who will allow him to recede from the position that he has taken up. The right hon. and learned Gentleman, when he was about to impeach the character of a Member of this House, should, I think, have acted with more delicacy—more generosity—to have yielded to the suggestion of postponement, being informed that within the last hour a telegraphic message had been received, announcing that a Court of Justice has this day been desecrated, and a scene enacted in it of such a character as I confess I am unwilling to credit. Until that intelligence has been confirmed it will not do to assume that it is unquestionably authentic, and therefore I think that this question ought not to be taken piecemeal, but should be brought on when an opportunity shall have been afforded for those full and clear explanations to be given, in which I hope to be able satisfactorily to defend my own character from the attack which has been made upon it; and also to vindicate the Government, of which I am a member. If the learned Judge who has been referred to has been guilty of misconduct—and from the information I have obtained I should think there has been gross misconduct—the matter is one which demands the fullest explanation. The right hon. and learned Gentleman, however, who exhibits a plausible generosity in dealing with his political adversaries, declines to postpone his question for a single day, and calls upon me for an explanation, when he knows that I cannot have in my hands at this moment the requisite information or the full particulars of the charge. The right hon. and learned Gentleman commenced his observations by referring to the proceedings which took place on the 3rd of March, at least six weeks before I held the office of Attorney General. I was not sworn in as Attorney General for Ireland until the 14th of April. I vacated my seat in this House upon accepting office. I was subsequently charged with the performance of an important public duty—that of conducting the prosecution at Cavan against the murderers of Miss Hinds; and it was not until the 14th of April that I actually filled the office of Attorney General for Ireland, yet I am called upon by the right hon. and learned Gentleman to answer for proceedings which took place on the 3rd of March. The right hon. and learned Gentleman says—and he says he heard it—that in this House I accused the Master of the Rolls of disregarding his oath as a Privy Councillor, and of dereliction of his judicial duties. Now, I did neither the one nor the other. I ask the attention of the House to what did take place on this occasion, and to put a fair construction upon the language used. I have not been in communication with any parties upon this subject, but I have derived my information solely from the public newspapers. I shall first, with the permission of the House, read an extract from a newspaper, the authority of which I think the right hon. and learned Gentleman will not be disposed to impugn. Nay, I am prepared to tell the right hon. and learned Gentleman that my information leads me to believe, that the statement in the Dublin Evening Mail is taken from a manuscript judgment of the Master of the Rolls, delivered on the 3rd of June last. I wish to call attention to the statements contained in that judgment, which led me to address some observations to this House on a subsequent occasion. The case was argued before the Master of the Rolls; and the hon. and learned Member for Cork (Mr. Deasy), one of the counsel in the case, who appeared for the official manager of the Tipperary Bank, having referred to some observations on the part of the English shareholders that there was fraud in the case in respect of which they ought to be discharged, proceeded to say:—

“That the evidence offered on this appeal had gone beyond the case made in the Master’s office, and therefore that much of it was not admissible. The appellant had made his case without charging Mr. James Sadleir with fraud. He had never applied to amend his affidavits or alter his case. He called upon his Lordship to confine the evidence to the facts pleaded; and as there was no case of fraud by Mr. James Sadleir made on the appellant’s affidavits in the Master’s office, he submitted his Honour ought not to permit it to be now made.”

Now, I must inform the House that, from the 4th of March, this case had been under investigation in the office of Master Murphy, that James Sadleir had been examined as a witness, that he had made affidavits in the case, and that five days previously Master Murphy pronounced his judgment, in which he acquitted the parties before him, including James Sadleir, of the charge of fraud. [Mr. NAPIER: The letter of John Sadleir.] That interruption on the part of the right hon. and learned Gentleman is unnecessary. The letter to which the right hon. and learned Gentleman refers was not discovered until the 13th of June, ten days after the Master of the Rolls made the observations I am about to read. The right hon. and learned Gentleman is quite right in calling attention to that important letter, because I am prepared to state, that if there is a sustainable charge against James Sadleir it is based upon that remarkable letter, which did not see the public light until the 13th of June. Master Murphy, who is known to many Members of this House as a lawyer of great experience and a most industrious Judge, and of whom I may say, without meaning to disparage the Master of the Rolls, that his character stands as high as the character of that learned individual—Master Murphy, having delivered a written judgment, acquitting all parties before him of fraud, the case came on appeal five days afterwards before the Master of the Rolls, who, in the course of his observations, said:—

“Although, as I have stated, I intend to consider this matter attentively before giving my judgment, still there is one question which I consider it to be a duty due by me to the public to pass my opinion on at present. I wish to express my unbounded astonishment that the Irish Government have not thought fit to take any notice of this case. It is of the last importance to the interests of both parties that they should do so; and, if they choose to remain quiescent, and shrink from the duty that devolves upon them of placing this case before the prosecutors for the Crown, I think that they will be guilty of a gross dereliction of duty.

“When giving judgment I purpose to enter into the facts at considerable length, and I undertake to prove that, if Government determine upon continuing to be quiescent, they can have no right to complain if the public charge them with connivance at conspiracy. I repeat that the Government must interfere. They may, perhaps, pretend ignorance of the law that is applicable to this case, but I will now lay it down for them distinctly.”

At a subsequent stage of the proceedings the Master of the Rolls said:—

“It was objected that no case of fraud on the part of James Sadleir had been made before the Master. If the appellants believed that there had been combination and conspiracy between the two brothers, and if, to avoid any question on the point raised, they desired to hand in affidavits of these matters, he would permit them to be received—the official manager to be at liberty to answer them if any new question of fact were raised by them.”

No one, Sir, can read that statement of the Master of the Rolls without regarding it as a distinct charge made by him from the seat of justice against the Irish Executive of dereliction of duty and connivance at crime. When I speak of the Irish Executive I speak of myself, for if there has been dereliction of duty on the part of the Irish Government it is upon me that the responsibility rests, and I am the last man to attempt to shrink from that responsibility. I saw the statements I have read accidentally on the 6th of June. It happened that a copy of the Freeman's Journal, which contained a petition agreed to by the corporation of Dublin against a Bill before the House, was sent to me, and the judgment of the Master of the Rolls being in the same paper I thus became accidentally aware of the observations he had made. Shortly afterwards a question was put to me on the subject by the hon. and learned Member for Dunkeld (Mr. Bowyer), which I immediately answered. Subsequently I was interrogated by the hon. and learned Member for Enniskillen (Mr. Whiteside), and finally a question was put to me by the hon. Member for Mayo (Mr. G. H. Moore), which led to the observations that are now the subject of controversy. The hon. Member for Mayo did not affect to disguise, what was apparent from the terms of his question, that its object was to impute to the Government connivance in the transactions which were the subject of judicial investigation. [Mr. G. H. Moore: Hear!] —In answer to that question, observations fell from me in which the right hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. Napier) asserts that I impeached the character of the Master of the Rolls, either judicially or in his capacity of a Privy Councillor. Sir, I wish most distinctly to deny both those assertions. I answered as fully as I could the question of the hon. Member for Mayo. I explained in detail what had taken place, and the hon. Gentleman having asked whether Mr. James Sadleir had escaped from this country, and if so, whether I could account for his escape, I replied that, from the moment the attention of the Irish Government had been called to the subject there had been no want of vigilance or activity in setting the law in force, and in rendering any persons who had been guilty of crime amenable to justice. I further stated, that if James Sadleir had left the country—a fact of which I was not aware—he had done so in consequence of the alarm created by the observations of the learned Master of the Rolls. I also said, what I state again, that I considered those observations irregular—“irregular” being the strongest observation I used. I will read from The Times the exact language that I used:—

“The proper course for him to pursue would have been to make an order that the evidence should be laid before the Irish law officers; or, in his capacity of a Privy Councillor, to inform the Lord Lieutenant that a crime had been committed, and point out the necessity for investigation."

I do not profess to quote from memory—I quote from the columns of The Times, whose reports I find to be generally accurate, and according to my recollection they are the very words I used upon the occasion. I did not say that the Master of the Rolls had violated his oath as a Privy Councillor, but I called the attention of the House to this—that if it had come before him judicially that a crime had been committed calling for the intervention of the public prosecutor there were two courses open to him. I was in this country, but my colleague the Solicitor General was in Dublin, and no one would for a moment impute to him the slightest intention in any case to connive at the commission of crime. He could have made application to my colleague or, as a Privy Councillor, he might have exercised his privilege of addressing the Lord Lieutenant, and saying to him, "A crime has been committed, something has occurred which I consider to be matter for investigation, and I give you information in order that the law may be put in motion." But, instead of doing this, the learned Judge thinks fit, from the bench of justice, to make observations so much tinged with matter of a political character as to attract the attention not only of the individual most concerned, but of the public at large; and I will say, that if James Sadleir had not left the country before that, no means more successful could be devised for driving him out of it. The right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Napier) says this is a matter that ought to be investigated, and that he will be prepared, on some future occasion, to bring it forward. Now, Sir, permit me to say that, when I spoke before on this subject, I had only a vague suspicion that what fell from the Master of the Rolls had had the effect of driving James Sadleir from the country. I have now, however, to state, from private information, received only two hours since, that without doubt it was a short time after this remarkable language on the part of the Master of the Rolls that James Sadleir did leave the country, and that he has not since returned to it. Therefore, the statement which I made on inferences drawn from the facts turns out to be true. Let the right hon. and learned Gentleman, then, bring forward his charge in a tangible shape—let him frame a Resolution on the subject and bring it before the House, and I will be prepared to meet it. The hon. Gentleman the Member for Roscommon (Colonel French) complained the other night of my observations with regard to the Master of the Rolls, and paid a high compliment to the character, and honour, and legal attainments of the learned Judge. I thought it right to state that I concurred in those observations as to the high and honourable character and legal attainments of the Master of the Rolls, but I added that I thought the observations made by him on the bench, on this subject, were irregular. Now, Sir, what has taken place since? I find that the Master of the Rolls has, in his place on the bench, made the following observations from a written paper—

"He had observed from the public journals that the Attorney General for Ireland had thought fit to renew the attacks which he had previously made upon him. That the Attorney General was much mistaken if he supposed that he (the Master of the Rolls) was about to rest quietly under such imputations. He would not do any such thing; but, on the contrary, would send forward by this night's post documents which would tend to impeach the course that had been adopted by the Attorney General in this case."

I presume the documents here referred to were sent to the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Napier) on Thursday. The Master of the Rolls then goes on to say—

"He would also be prepared on Friday to bring forward a charge against that officer which was of a most serious nature, and strongly calculated to affect his character and his office as Attorney General—a charge which he (the Master of the Rolls) was prepared to substantiate before a Committee of the House of Commons, or any other tribunal—a charge the effects of which neither the sophistry nor mystification of the Attorney General would avail him in escaping from."

I did venture to say in this House that the observations of the Master of the Rolls on the occasion referred to were irregular, but beyond that I made no charge against the learned Judge. But the result of the irregular observations is that a criminal—if James Sadleir is a criminal—has left the country. I have now, Sir, called the attention of the House to the statements made on Wednesday last, and I ask the right hon. and learned Gentleman whether he can now say that the Master of the Rolls has not turned his Court into a political arena? But the proof does not rest here. A telegraphic message has been brought to me within the last hour, and if the statements contained in that message are well founded as to what occurred this morning in the Rolls' Court, at Dublin, a grosser outrage in a Court of Justice has seldom been perpetrated, while, according to the message, the political observations made by the Master of the Rolls were responded to by loud cheers in a crowded Court. The House knows well that statements communicated by the electric telegraph are not always to be depended upon for accuracy, and therefore it would be unjustifiable in me to read the message I have received to the House; but it was in consequence of the statement I had received that I communicated with my right hon. Friend the Home Secretary, and that he, with my entire concurrence, and with the view of avoiding a premature discussion of the case, appealed to the right hon. and learned Gentleman whether it would not be better to have the question brought forward in such a shape that, instead of a partial, we might have a full discussion on it. I think this would have been a proper course. I may be considered a political rival of the right hon. and learned Gentleman. I hold the office which the right hon. and learned Gentleman himself once held. He knows the difficulties that attach to the duties of that office, and how much firmness and fearlessness it requires, and I think, acting on high and honourable feeling he ought not to have brought forward this case till there would be an opportunity of discussing it in a regular form, and when the House could come to a decision regarding it. The right hon. and learned Gentleman has not ventured to state that there has been on my part, or on the part of the Government, any dereliction of duty. When he chooses to bring the case forward in a formal and regular shape, I shall be prepared to meet any charge he may please to prefer against me. If the Master of the Rolls has sent to him a statement in writing of what I understand he read this morning in the Rolls' Court, Dublin, I ask him—and I wish to call the attention of the House to this point—whether there are not in that paper personal charges against myself? I do not mean charges involving my personal character, for I have no fear on that point, but charges against me as a public officer, of gross dereliction of duty, of connivance at the escape of a criminal, and with the knowledge that he was about to escape. If that paper is a transcript of such statements as those made by the Master of the Rolls this morning, then I say let the right hon. and learned Gentleman bring forward those charges in such a shape that this House can form and give a judgment regarding them. Let him do so at this moment, or on Monday, and I shall be prepared to meet them. The right hon. and learned Gentleman says he will never let this matter drop, if there is a charge brought against the Master of the Rolls. I tell him there is a charge against him, if the statement I have received of what he said this morning be true, and it was to see whether or not it was true that I wished this discussion not to take place to-night. If that statement is true, the Master of the Rolls has been guilty of the great offence of turning a court of justice into a political arena, and employing gross and unmeasured language, not only against me, but against the Government to which I have the honour to belong. It would not be fair, either to the Master of the Rolls or to myself, to go into this question now, as the House can form no judgment upon it; but when the right hon. and learned Gentleman brings forward his charge against me of having employed language towards the Master of the Rolls, which I certainly never intended to use, and which I believe I did not use, I shall, as I have already said, be prepared to meet it. At present the House could give no decision upon the question, and it could only lead to empty discussion. I challenge investigation. I tell him that if he shrinks from that investigation—if he fails to bring it forward—he will be pursuing a course that is not worthy of him. If the right hon. and learned Gentleman shrinks from a duty which he owes to himself, to this House, and the public; if, after the statement he has made, he fails to bring forward in a tangible shape the imputations he has ventured to make, I have to tell him that I will not let the matter rest. I shall advert now to only one other statement of the right hon. and learned Gentleman. He said, that all the evidence before the Master of the Rolls was available for my purposes. That evidence consisted of a great number, I believe, no less than 150 affidavits, which were the documents in possession of the Master of the Rolls till the 20th of June, when he delivered the judgment adverted to. I am sure the House will excuse me for having trespassed so long on its attention. I have confined myself exclusively to the personal charges, but let me tell the right hon. and learned Gentleman that it is the greatest mistake, with reference to this particular case of fraud on the part of James Sadleir, to suppose that he could be subjected to prosecution for the fraud only. The director of a public company may publish false accounts, may misrepresent its balances, and there is no law, unfortunately, to make him amenable. The charge against James Sadleir is, not that he defrauded the public, but that he and his deceased brother had conspired to cheat the public by certain frauds. It is the conspiracy that forms the charge against him, and the latter discovered, for the first time, on the 13th of June, would be the real foundation of the prosecution. With these observations I leave the matter in the hands of the House, perfectly prepared, either now or at any other time, to meet any charge the right hon. and learned Gentleman may put forward.

MR. CARDWELL: Sir, it has been my privilege, ever since the distinguished Judge, who has been referred to in this discussion, has been on the bench, to live on terms of intimacy with him, and I feel it impossible to remain silent when his conduct is called in question before the House. To that point exclusively I shall confine the observations I now desire to make. With respect to any charge, if there be any, against the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland, I shall say no more about it than this—that he is most perfectly entitled to expect that the Master of the Rolls in Ireland will not shrink from anything he has said, but will be prepared to stand by it and substantiate it. It is the undoubted right of the Attorney General for Ireland to expect that. I will now pass entirely away from that portion of the subject. I am extremely happy to learn from the observations of the Attorney General for Ireland, that no imputation was intended to be cast by him upon the Master of the Rolls with respect to the solemn oath which, as Privy Councillor, he had taken. I understand the right hon. and learned Gentleman distinctly to disclaim having made any such charge, and the disclaimer so made must of course be unreservedly accepted. The Attorney General for Ireland says that he has confined his observations to a personal charge against himself. With great respect, however, I must say, I do not think so. I noted down, while the Attorney General for Ireland was speaking, some charges which he has brought against the Master of the Rolls. Some of these charges are absolute, turning on information which is undoubtedly in his possession, and others are contingent on the accuracy of the telegraphic despatch received by him this morning from Dublin. Thus, speaking partly on certain information, and partly on contingent information, the right hon. and learned Gentleman has tonight in his place, and in presence of this House, charged the Master of the Rolls in Ireland with degrading a Court of Justice, with being guilty of gross default, with making irregular observations, with tinging with a political colour his judicial proceedings, and with being the cause of the failure of justice by occasioning the escape of James Sadleir. The right hon. and learned Gentleman further said that the Master of the Rolls had been guilty of the great offence of converting a Court of Justice into a political arena; that he had been guilty, also, of a gross outrage on justice in making use of his position on the bench to accuse the Attorney General for Ireland in the manner which the right hon. and learned Gentleman proceeded to describe. [Mr. J. D. FITZGERALD: Hear, hear!] I observe from the cheer of the Attorney General for Ireland that I have correctly represented his statement. Then we have issue joined in the presence of the House of Commons. The Attorney General for Ireland very naturally says that, if any charge of a failure of his public duty has been brought against him by the right hon. and learned Gentleman opposite (Mr. Napier) he should have indignantly demanded immediate, public, and full inquiry. Well, by the Attorney General for Ireland there have been made, against one of the most distinguished Judges of these kingdoms, grave charges of breach of public duty. The Attorney General for Ireland has truly said, that it is not for us to enter into a detailed discussion of this subject now, because, whatever particular Members may know, the House is really in possession of no information, or only of imperfect information. I am one of those who possess only imperfect information, and therefore I shall observe the caution given by the Attorney General for Ireland with respect to making observations in this stage of the proceeding; but I rise, under the obligations of intimate friendship to the Master of the Rolls in Ireland, to say that this case cannot rest here. In my opinion it is the bounden duty of the Government to take every means to bring this case, thus stated, to an immediate, full, and searching investigation; and, as an intimate friend of the distinguished Judge in question, I tender my entreaty to the Attorney General for Ireland to take some means of bringing the charges he has made under the consideration of the House. I do not know whether the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin means to make a Motion or not. If he does, it is, undoubtedly, the duty of the Government to afford him facilities for making it as early as possible; but if I were in the position of the Attorney General for Ireland, having made these serious and grave charges against a distinguished Judge, I would, whether the right hon. and learned Gentleman opposite made a Motion on the subject or not, myself take an opportunity of bringing these charges to an immediate and searching investigation.

MR. G. H. MOORE: I understand, Sir, from the tone of the right hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Napier), that something like a compromise has been offered between the two parties, but this is a matter in which the public can allow of no compromise whatever. It involves something larger and wider than even the characters of the two Gentlemen concerned, because either the Master of the Rolls in Ireland has been guilty of a gross calumny on the Irish Government, or the Irish Executive, including, I presume, the Attorney General for Ireland, have been guilty of the grossest dereliction of duty which ever a Government were guilty of. The right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland said, on a late occasion, that, from his experience of me, he had learned to believe that by my observations I meant to imply that the Irish Executive had connived at the escape of James Sadleir; and certainly from his experience of me he is likely to know that what I think and believe I would state frankly. Sir, I did mean just that. The Attorney General for Ireland must know, too, from his present experience, at least, that the Master of the Rolls has since stated what I said or meant to say at the time referred to. The Master of the Rolls said on a late occasion, to which the Attorney General for Ireland has alluded, that he did not obtrude, advise, or give information privately, because it was no part of his duty to do so, and because he believed then, as now, that it would have received no attention from the Government, for reasons publicly well known. There is no mistake whatever as to what that means. It means that the Irish Executive did not interfere to prevent the escape of James Sadleir, because they did not and could not dare to meet the issue which would necessarily have been raised by the disclosures if that individual had been put on his trial. That is what the public believe in Ireland, and that is what I believe the Master of the Rolls adverted to on the occasion in question. Now, Sir, what is the defence of the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland? He says that the Master of the Rolls, by his first charge, gave James Sadleir warning to escape, and that that charge was calculated to induce him to escape; and yet the right hon. and learned Gentleman, believing this, made no sign and took no step to prevent the escape of James Sadleir for a fortnight afterwards. The right hon. and learned Gentleman told me that he had ascertained that, if James Sadleir escaped, it was before he issued the information. But what was the converse of that? That the Government took care not to issue the information until they knew that James Sadleir had escaped. Which of these propositions would turn out true it is not for me to say, for that must depend on the investigation which must take place, and after which the statement of the Master of the Rolls and the conduct of the Attorney General for Ireland would be finally judged by the House and the country.

MR. WHITESIDE: I am afraid, Sir, that I misunderstood, in some points, the reply of the Attorney General for Ireland to a question put to him a few evenings ago. I was under the distinct impression that, in answer to that question, the right hon. and learned Gentleman made three statements. First, I understood him to charge the Master of the Rolls, in his judicial capacity, that he was the cause of the escape of Mr. Sadleir; secondly, that he had been guilty of misconduct as a Judge; and, thirdly, the right hon. and learned Gentleman made what I thought to be an unwise and unnecessary allusion to the duty of the Master of the Rolls, and his oath as a Privy Councillor. Now, Sir, I should like to know what business the right hon. Gentleman had to allude to the duty and the obligation of the learned Judge as a Privy Councillor? However, I distinctly understood him to make that allusion; every Gentleman who sits on these benches, I believe, understood him in the same sense, and I almost felt it to be my duty at the time to remonstrate with him on, what I considered, an unwise and intemperate speech, but it was deemed better to address the Master of the Rolls on the subject, and endeavour to get a statement of what were the facts of this unpleasant matter. Well, Sir, what are the facts? A case of gross, of scandalous fraud came before the Master of the Rolls. He spoke plainly and distinctly; he had a right to do so, and the Attorney General for Ireland had no right to criticise him on that account. In declaring that gross fraud had been committed the Master of the Rolls only discharged his duty; in declaring that it ought to be followed up and punished by the law officers of the Crown he said what every Judge ought to say in such a case. Well, then, he declared that a gross fraud had been committed, and in my opinion—I say it with sorrow, but I believe the public opinion of Ireland will support me—not only has fraud been committed, but there has not been displayed that zeal, that activity in bringing the offenders to justice that would have been exhibited if those persons had not possessed a certain political influence. I quite agree that the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland has a right to say that there is no case whatever against him; I think he has, and I say so advisedly; but I beg right hon. Gentlemen opposite not to suppose that they are not responsible like other men. [Mr. HORSMAN: Hear, hear!] The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland must not think to stop our mouths on a question of this kind. I say it is true that Mr. Sadleir, on the 3rd of June, walked about the hall to the surprise of everybody; that he was privately examined by Master Murphy; that there came to light a letter, the most infamous piece of evidence as proof of conspiracy that ever existed in any case of the kind. I do not know that the Attorney General for Ireland knew of it. But how was Sir John Dean Paul dealt with in this country? He was rigorously punished, though not guilty of half such crimes, I believe, as those committed by Mr. Sadleir. I agree in thinking it will be matter for inquiry as to whether, until the 24th of June, any document was sought for or obtained on the part of the Crown; and this point shall be inquired into. But I repeat that I understood the Attorney General for Ireland to impute to the Master of the Rolls that he was guilty of a dereliction of duty in saying what he did in reference to the fraud committed in this case; that he was likewise guilty of impropriety in suffering Mr. Sadleir to escape; and that, as a Privy Councillor, it was his duty to go to the Lord Lieutenant and put him in possession of the materials which had come into his possession as Master of the Rolls. Now, it is true that the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland has a high character in his profession, and I wish to say nothing to detract from that character; but I think he will make a fatal mistake if he supposes that he will raise his reputation in this House by speaking, as he has done more than once, so severely of those whom it is our duty to respect; of those who are placed on the judicial bench, and are sworn to do their duty, and conscientiously wish to do their duty, in that responsible position.

MR. HORSMAN: So far, Sir, from wishing to “stop the mouth” of the hon. and learned Gentleman who has just resumed his seat, I was only sincerely desirous that he would address himself to the one point alluded to by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Oxford (Mr. Cardwell). I now ask the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Napier) if he intends to bring to a distinct issue the charges he has in his hand, and which he has received by post to-day from the Master of the Rolls for Ireland? The hon. Member for Mayo (Mr. G. H. Moore) said, that one of two things has been distinctly proved—either that the Master of the Rolls has been guilty of gross calumny against the Government, or that the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland has been guilty of a culpable dereliction of duty. Sir, we accept that issue. We admit that that is the case now fairly before the House. That issue has been raised by the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Napier), though he had in his possession the statement of the Master of the Rolls, that on this day he would state in detail, from the judgment seat, the serious charges he had to bring against my right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for Ireland. Instead, however, of waiting for those charges, it was more convenient for the right hon. and learned Gentleman, with the present imperfect information before the House, to raise a discussion, rousing suspicions, creating doubts, and giving rise to misrepresentations, rather than allow us to come to a distinct decision upon the points on which he knows in a few hours we should be fully informed. It has been said, that the Attorney General for Ireland is responsible for the whole of those proceedings, and that if there has been any defeat of justice, the blame rests on his shoulders. Now, the fact is that, throughout the whole of this affair, from the very first moment when the intelligence of these frauds obtained publicity, my right hon. and learned Friend has made the entire Government aware of every step he has taken. I, myself, have been made acquainted with all that has been done, and there is not one of the steps taken by my right hon. and learned Friend for which I am not as fully responsible as he is. My chief object, however, in rising, was to say that I do not think it would be worthy of the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Napier) who has in his possession what the House has not—namely, these distinct charges under the handwriting of the Master of the Rolls against the Government, and who, possessed of those charges, made the speech which he has thought it right to deliver this evening—I say I think it would not be worthy of him, and the House would not excuse him, if he does not now raise that issue by submitting a distinct Motion to the House, allowing us to know what these charges are, whether he endorses them himself, and whether he will call upon the House to endorse them also.

MR. NAPIER: Sir, the statement furnished to me I will hand to the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland. If I had received it sooner, I should have given it to him before, but it only reached me by the late post this day. Allow me to say, that that statement merely consists of facts, and not of charges. I asked for facts and dates, and those were furnished to me, and I confined my remarks this evening simply to a defence of the Master of the Rolls. I repeat that I will hand this statement to the right hon. and learned Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland, and if he and the Government do not afford me an opportunity of going fully into this matter, I answer the challenge of the right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Horsman) by saying, that I do undertake to see it inquired into.

THE NAWAB OF SURAT—QUESTION.

SIR FITZROY KELLY said, he wished to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, whether it was the intention of Her Majesty's Government to take the opinion of the law officers of the Crown (including the Queen's Advocate, whose especial duty it was, when called upon to advise the Crown upon the construction of treaties), as to the true meaning and effect of the treaty of 1800 between the hon. East India Company and the then Nawab of Surat; and, in the event of such law officers advising that, under the said treaty the East India Company were bound to pay to the heirs of the said Nawab the annuity therein mentioned, whether it was the intention of Her Majesty's Government or the Board of Control, to order or direct such payment to be made by the said hon. East India Company accordingly? It was well known that, when the territory of Surat was annexed, the East India Company agreed to pay the Nawab an annuity of £15,000. The son of the Nawab died in 1840; and his son-in-law, the husband of the late Nawab's only daughter, and the father of two infant children, his only surviving descendants, demanded the annuity; but the East India Company had refused to recognise his claim. Now, he contended that the decisions hitherto given by the Indian Board on this claim had been entirely ex parte, the representatives of the deceased Nawab never having been heard at all. The annuity was charged by the treaty, not upon the general revenues of India, but upon those of the state of Surat itself, of which the East India Company had possessed themselves; and so long as those revenues were able to bear the burden, so long he maintained was the Company bound to pay it. The treaty bound the East India Company to pay this annuity to the Nawab and his heirs; and the simple question was, as to the meaning of the term "heirs." Meer Jaffier Ali, who now claimed to be the heir, had come to this country, and, being a British subject, had petitioned the House of Commons in favour of his claim; and a Bill founded upon that petition had been brought in, but had been rejected by the other House. The East India Company, wielding all the powers of the British Government, had solemnly entered into this treaty, by which a native prince was degraded to the rank of a subject; an annuity was secured to himself and his family; the payment was now disputed; and the British Government denied to those aggrieved parties the right of appealing to a Court of Law. They had been advised by the most eminent lawyers in this country that they were entitled to the annuity; but owing to the mode in which the treaty was framed, under the authority of the Crown, the claimants had no power to enforce their right in a Court of Law. It was said that Meer Jaffer Ali had done wrong in canvassing Members. Now, he would ask hon. Members what other course was open to him? He admitted that he had canvassed him (Sir F. Kelly), and no doubt many other Members. Being advised that he had a well-grounded claim, and finding that the door of every Court in the kingdom was closed against him, what could he do unless he appealed to that House? The Bill had been introduced in that House as a Private Bill, under the authority of Mr. Speaker, and had passed by an immense majority; in the other House it had been rejected because it was a Private Bill. The treaty had been submitted to a Select Committee of five learned Gentlemen who had unanimously determined that, according to its true effect and meaning, the present claimant was entitled to the annuity. It appeared that, while the treaty was in negotiation, discussion arose as to the meaning of the terms "and his heirs;" and the prince was assured by the Government of Bombay, that he might rely on the honour and good faith of the East India Company, and that those terms in the treaty would secure the annuity to his representatives and descendants for ever. It was only upon that representation that he had signed the treaty and given up possession of his dominion. The Company paid him the annuity as long as he lived, and continued it to his son after him; but when there ceased to be a direct successor to the Nawab, the East India Company refused payment to his heirs and representatives, alleging that the annuity was only payable to the Nawab for the time being, and that the Company had the power of determining that office whenever they pleased: thus constituting themselves the judges of their own case, and the interpreters of their own treaty. When the case came before the House, the hon. Member for Honiton (Sir J. Hogg) had strenuously defended the East India Company; but the Bill was, as he had previously mentioned, carried by a large majority, thus affirming the decision of the Committee. Upon that taking place, overtures were made to the East India Company, and the Vice President of the Board agreed to them; but they were rejected by a majority of the Directors, and the claimant was obliged to proceed with his Bill in the other House, and the result was what he had stated. Either the money was due or not; if it was, could any Minister of the Crown refuse to take further steps? There was but one course open to them, and that was to take the opinion of the law officers of the Crown, and to act in accordance with it. By the Statute of 3 & 4 Will. IV., cap. 85, the Government had power to order the annuity to be paid by the East India Company, if they were of opinion that it was due. If they thought otherwise, at least let them take the opinion of the law officers of the Crown, or refer the matter to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. He appealed most earnestly to the Government to do this. In the course of a long experience he had never felt more strongly than on this case. It was incompatible with honour, justice, or any motive that ought to regulate men's actions, that the matter should be allowed to rest where it was.

MR. VERNON SMITH said, he must complain of the hon. and learned Gentleman bringing forward this case on the Motion for the adjournment of the House. He had heard a great many desultory debates on the question of adjournment; but he had never heard so enormous an abuse of the privilege of debate as that of the hon. and learned Gentleman on the present occasion. He had gone over the whole of a case that had been three times debated, submitted to the Legislature as a Bill, sanctioned by that House, and rejected by the other. He must protest against such a proceeding. It was likewise extremely unfair to those who were not prepared to enter into such a discussion. The question was a very simple one, namely, whether the Government would follow the course which the hon. and learned Gentleman suggested. As to the claim of the Nawab, the hon. and learned Gentleman had made many erroneous statements and many dogmatic assertions. He had evidently given considerable study to the question, and there was no necessity for him to ask the opinion of any legal adviser. He had also referred to Members being canvassed in support of the Bill. He (Mr. Smith) was not aware that he ever made that charge; if he did, he certainly never alluded to the hon. and learned Gentleman. If he had been canvassed, nobody could object to that, on account of the interest which he took in the question. Canvassing, in reference to a Private Bill, meant the solicitation of Gentlemen who knew nothing about the question. The hon. and learned Gentleman had stated his own decided view on this matter; but it was clear, from his own showing, that there were doubts on the construction of the treaty. The hon. and learned Gentleman said that the authorities were all on one side on this question. Did he mean to say that Lord Ellenborough and the other Governors General of India, who had decided the question over and over again, were no authorities? With regard to the question of the hon. and learned Gentleman, his hearty hope was that the advisers of Meer Jaffier Ali would recommend him to go again to the Court of Directors and lay before them the whole of his case as he thought it should be stated. If he took that course he trusted the Executive Government of India would be prepared, setting aside all the irritation which might have arisen from the contest in that House, to come to such an agreement as would be satisfactory to all parties. If they could not come to a settlement, it would then be the duty of the Government to see that the question did not remain where it was. The hon. and learned Gentleman proposed to lay the case before the law officers of the Crown. But with all due respect to the law officers of the Crown, he did not think they were the best persons to consult on questions of Mahomedan law and the modes of descent in India. The other alternative was to refer the question to the Privy Council. He was of opinion that it would be useful to adopt that course, because the Judges of that tribunal were conversant with subjects of this kind. But the law officers of the Crown were not in favour of a reference to the Privy Council, as they doubted whether it could be done under the 4th section of the Privy Council Act. There certainly was a want of some tribunal to decide questions of this kind. The present was a question of the interpretation of a treaty made by the Executive Government of India and a Foreign State, and the question was to what tribunal that interpretation was to be referred. With regard to the power of the Board of Control to order the Court of Directors to make payment from the revenues of India in cases of this kind, he was by no means clear. There was a just jealousy on the part of the Indian Government of any interference by the Board of Control with the revenues of India. The power of checking expense was absolute and clear, but not the power of expenditure. However, if he found any injustice done, he should not confine himself to the issuing of a doubtful order, but should call on Parliament for a special Act to give him the power of performing justice.

STAFF OFFICERS—QUESTION.

COLONEL LINDSAY said, he wished to call the attention of the House to the deduction of pay from officers serving on the staff when they were temporarily absent from their staff duties. In reply to a question put by him on a former occasion, the hon. Under Secretary for War stated that the general rule of the service disentitled that class of officers to receive staff pay while not actually performing staff duty. On that point he took issue with the hon. Under Secretary, and maintained that the practice had not been such as he had represented it. He conceived that the rule adopted on the subject in 1848 was intended to meet the cases of officers holding two staff appointments, or of officers upon full pay holding staff appointments, and that it was not meant that the staff pay of half-pay officers holding staff appointments should be deducted when they were temporarily absent from their duties. He wished to know whether it was the intention of the War Department to deduct the staff pay of officers who were absent for a short time on leave?

Mr. FREDERICK PEEL said, that in the case of staff officers employed abroad the staff pay was not issuable when the officers were absent from the particular sphere of their duties. But with regard to officers at home, the practice, he believed, was to allow the staff pay to those who were only away for a short period, and whose duties could be discharged in their absence without any additional expense to the public; and by that practice the authorities at the War Office proposed to abide.

MILITIA ALLOWANCES—QUESTION.

MR. NEWDEGATE said, he wished to inquire of the hon. Under Secretary for War whether he would lay upon the table of the House the Report and names of the Medical Board who last examined into the state of the health and the fitness for duty of Captain Cassan, the adjutant of the 1st Regiment of Warwickshire Militia, who had applied for permission to retire upon the allowance provided for adjutants of militia, under the Act 9 & 10 Vict. c. 55; also the Report and names of the Medical Board who had previously examined and reported upon the state of health and fitness for duty of the same officer? He had reason to believe that Captain Cassan was at present in a state of health which totally unfitted him for the discharge of the duties of a militia adjutant, and that, he believed, had been the effect of the Report of a Medical Board which had inquired into his case. But another Board had, it would appear, instituted a second inquiry, and in consequence of their Report the authorities at the War Office had refused to Captain Cassan permission to retire upon the allowance provided for adjutants in the militia.

MR. FREDERICK PEEL said, the first Medical Board before which Captain Cassan had appeared had reported that he was unfit for service in the field. But the militia regiments were about to be disembodied, and a second Medical Board had given it as their opinion that Captain Cassan was not disqualified by infirmity of health from performing the comparatively light duties which would devolve upon an adjutant under that change of circumstances. The authorities at the War Office felt that they could not, after that second Report, allow the officer in question to retire upon the allowance provided for adjutants of militia. He had further to state that he did not think it would be right to produce the Report of the Board, which might be fairly regarded as a confidential document.

THE ECCLESIASTICAL COURTS—QUESTION.

MR. HADFIELD said, he would beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury what course was intended to be pursued by Her Majesty's Government in the course of the present Session respecting the Wills and Administrations Bill and the Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Bill; or, in the next Session, for abolishing the Ecclesiastical Courts, and conducting in future the business now transacted by such Courts, and especially for the purpose of making one probate or administration in England and Ireland, and one confirmation in Scotland, operative on all the property of a deceased person in the United Kingdom; and what Bills brought into the House were intended to be proceeded in or withdrawn this Session; and whether any new Bills were intended to be brought in? He did not think it right that the whole expense consequent upon any change to be made in the Courts and upon the grant of compensation to officers should be thrown on the estates of deceased persons; but he would rather submit to that burden than lose the benefits of a new measure. He believed that it had been proposed to create three or four new Courts, but as the Court of Common Pleas was not half worked he conceived that the whole of the business might easily be transacted there. He therefore called upon the Government to explain their intentions upon the subject of the Bill. [An hon. MEMBER: It is abandoned for this Session.] But he wanted to know what were the intentions of the Government as to next Session. At all events he hoped the Government would state generally their intentions as to the Bills now before the House.

MR. GLADSTONE said, he wished to call the attention of the House to one point connected with the Testamentary Bills. One of the great objections to the late Bill had been the amount of compensation. The matter had now been under discussion for twenty-five years, and notices ought to have been given to all parties entering on situations, that they took them subject to any changes Parliament might make. [An hon. MEMBER: There are two Acts of Parliament containing provisions to that effect.] He would suggest that in all future appointments notice should be given that the party would have no claim to compensation in the event of any change. As regarded the Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Bill, when the Order of the Day was read, he would call attention to the important principles it involved, and the danger of adopting it without due consideration. He hoped Her Majesty's Government would not determine on pressing the Bill at that late period of the Session.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, he believed that notice had been given to persons receiving appointments in those Courts that they would have no claim to compensation in the event of their offices being abolished. In reply to the hon. Member for Sheffield (Mr. Hadfield), he had to state that the Wills and Administrations Bill was withdrawn last night in consequence of the impossibility of its receiving due attention during the present Session. The Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Bill had only come within a few days from the House of Lords. He willingly admitted its importance, and the Government hoped to be able to proceed with it during the present Session. He would rather not, however, give any distinct assurance to that effect or otherwise, at present, but on an early day next week he would state what course would be taken with respect to it. In regard to the third part of the question of the hon. Member for Sheffield, he could only say that due notice would be given of any measures which the Government might think it expedient to propose in the course of the next Session. He was not aware of any new Bill which it was intended to bring in during the present Session, and, with reference to the Bills now on the paper, the course which the Government proposed to take would be stated as those measures successively came before the House.

MR. J. G. PHILLIMORE said, he hoped the Government would proceed with the Divorce and Matrimonial Causes Bill, which would remove from the Statute Book a scandal that had long been a disgrace to the country.

MR. MALINS said, he would beg to remind the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) that the abolition of the proctors, to whom the chief compensation was proposed under the Bill of the hon. and learned Solicitor General, was not recommended by more than one Commission which had inquired into the subject, and that the Government had proposed to give some £50,000 a year as compensation to those whose existence was reported by one of these Commissions to be essential to the public safety. The evils arising out of the present system with respect to wills and administrations had been greatly exaggerated, though he would admit that there were some which could hardly be exaggerated. For example, there was the bona notabilia system, which rendered it necessary to prove a will in several districts; and he thought it was also highly desirable that the Ecclesiastical Courts should be turned into Queen's Courts. If the noble Lord at the head of the Government would only take the trouble during the recess to look over the Report of the Chancery Commission of 1854—it was very short—the noble Lord might read it through in an hour and a half—he would find it founded on facts of such importance, and backed up by the authority of such eminent men, that he would hesitate long before allowing a Bill intended for the reform of the Ecclesiastical Courts to bring their business in any way under the control of the County Courts. Any Bill which contained such a proposition would meet with his (Mr. Malins's) strenuous opposition; but he would cordially support a Bill founded generally on the Report of the Commission to which he had referred.

MUTINY OF THE TIPPERARY MILITIA.

COLONEL DUNNE said, he trusted he might be allowed to say a few words on a subject which concerned the peace and good order of a large portion of the empire. The House had heard within the last few days that one regiment in Her Majesty's service had been in conflict with three others in the open field; they had seen that a town of some importance in Ireland had been in the possession of mutinous troops; they had been informed that four of those soldiers had been shot in action, while twelve or thirteen on each side were said to be wounded, yet no notice whatever had been taken of the subject in that House. An Irishman might perhaps be pardoned, then, for calling attention to so fearful a state of things. He had taken the liberty several times of calling the attention of the hon. Gentleman the Under Secretary for War—who was not now in his place, though he (Colonel Dunne) had given him notice that he should bring the question forward—to the mode of disembodied the militia. He had been in communication with the colonels of Irish militia on the subject, and they had together pressed upon the Minister for War the hardship suffered by men who were discharged from their regiments without money and with no clothes, except a light undress uniform. The noble Lord at the head of the Government, than whom no man in the country better understood military details, took the subject into consideration, and stated in that House that the men should have a gratuity of 14s. on being disbanded. That was a most satisfactory answer. All those who had made representations on the subject were averse from granting the men, on leaving their regiments, more money than was absolutely necessary, so that they might not be led into dissipation; but they also know very well that they had recruited from a class of men whose ordinary clothes were destroyed, and who would go from their regiments without a halfpenny in their pockets. That had actually been the result. In England there had been a great deal of bungling about the militia regiments, and almost all the colonels of those regiments had received different orders on the subject of the gratuities. Instead of giving the men the promised 14s., orders were sent round to give them a portion of the bounty, which was issued at the rate of 5s. a quarter, and in some regiments the men got 4s., with a part of the bounty. Now, the payment of the bounty was spread over that period, in order, no doubt, to induce the men to return to their standards, while the gratuity was to be given, because without it the men would have starved. That, as he had stated, was the course pursued in England, and he knew that in many instances the colonels of militia had given the men money out of their own pockets to carry them home and support them. Orders were sent to disembody the Irish militia, and he would beg to read an extract from a letter he had received from the officer left in command of his own regiment, which would show how the men were treated:—

“We are only authorised to give the men the proportion of bounty up to the day they leave, which is very hard, as many of them have left with only a few pence in their pockets, and unless they get immediate employment they must go without food.”

The Tipperary Militia were treated in the same way; they were ordered to give in their clothing, and, though he knew too well what military discipline required to defend such a breach of it as had been committed in this instance, he thought it was very natural on the part of men, who had very little other clothing, to object to such an order. The regiment then became so mutinous that General Chatterton, an experienced and humane officer, had to bring up other regiments against it, and the House knew what had followed. Now he looked upon the War Department as responsible for all that had taken place. Had they sent over the proper order that the men should purchase clothes, and should be fed until they got into work, or if the declaration of the noble Lord

Colonel Dunne

(Viscount Palmerston) had been carried out, this lamentable affair would not have occurred. There were many other regiments to be disbanded, and the peace of the country would be disturbed in many other parts of Ireland if the Government did not do justice to the soldiers. He admitted that in this case severe punishment must be inflicted on the offenders, but would it not be much better to exercise a little more common sense and humanity before such scenes were allowed to take place?

COLONEL FRENCH said, there was a general feeling in Ireland that the men had not been fairly treated. They had been given to understand at the outset that the £6 bounty would be paid at once, instead of which it had only been paid by instalments of £1 a year or 5s. a quarter, and then the payment of the miserable instalment of the bounty was substituted for the promised gratuity. There was a rumour that the War Minister intended altogether to override the assurance given by the noble Lord at the head of the Government; but he hoped that the noble Lord would not allow it, for the conduct of the men had been most admirable.

Motion agreed to.

COUNTY COURTS ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.

Order for Committee read.

Motion made and Question proposed, “That Mr. Speaker do now leave the Chair.”

MR. GLADSTONE said, it was his intention to move a resolution condemnatory of the principle of throwing a largely increased charge on the Consolidated Fund on account of the County Courts. He apprehended that its adoption by the House would not interfere with the progress of the present Bill, but would simply delay the carrying out of the proposed alterations in reference to the fees until another Session. It would be perfectly competent to the House, after adopting the Resolution of which he had given notice, to resolve themselves into a Committee on the Bill. He might as well, however, state to the House the reasons which had induced him to adopt this form of Resolution. The financial changes contemplated by the Bill were dispersed through its various clauses, and as it would have been impossible, by any question to be raised in Committee, to submit the subject fairly to the House, he had endeavoured to gather together the various results of the proposed changes into one general Motion. The additional charge intended to be thrown on the Consolidated Fund by this Bill was £170,000 a year. At present the fees paid by the suitors discharged the entire expenses of those Courts with the exception of £25,000 and a further sum of about £13,000, which by Act of Parliament was charged on the Consolidated Fund. Besides the additional charge of £170,000 contemplated by the Bill as it now stood, there were further additions contemplated by various Amendments, of which notice had been placed on the papers, giving salaries to Judges and their clerks amounting to somewhere about £45,000, which must be taken into account. If these were not adopted the whole charge of the County Courts when the Bill was passed would amount to £208,000, of which £170,000 would be imposed by the Bill, and if these were adopted the total charge would be about £253,000. Now that, it must be borne in mind, would not be merely a permanent charge, but, in all probability, would be a growing one. An annual charge of £170,000 was equivalent to voting away £5,000,000 of the public money; an annual charge of £208,000 was equal to £6,500,000, and an annual charge of £253,000 to about £8,000,000, so that in a financial point of view it was no light question which the House was called upon to decide. It was no excuse for passing over the financial considerations, to plead that this was a measure of law reform. So far the financial part of the question had not been adequately considered. The measure had been sent down from the other House, framed by certain eminent Peers connected with the legal profession, whose susceptibilities with regard to the liability of the Consolidated Fund were of course not so great as those of the House of Commons ought to be. The financial changes contemplated by the Bill had been treated quite as a secondary matter, but they ought not so to be viewed in that House. As yet there had been no distinct understanding arrived at as to the mode in which they were to proceed in dividing the charges of litigation between the public and the suitors. He was not prepared to deny that there was much to be said in favour of a revision of the present arrangement, but it ought to be done deliberately, and it should be after a careful review of the relations between this subject and other subjects connected with our judicial system. All he asked of the House was the right of reconsidering the subject. There was a doctrine which was greatly in fashion with some classes of the community, to the effect that inasmuch as litigation was a misfortune, its evils and annoyances ought to be borne, as far as possible, by the public. To that doctrine he most distinctly demurred. It was one which would greatly tend to foster litigation. Although some persons were involved in litigation perfectly reasonably and for the defence of their right, in many suits both parties were, and in most one was, unreasonable. Even if it were not so, why were the costs of misfortune to be borne by the community? why should not the evils and anxieties of life appertain to those upon whom they fell? By placing them upon the public you removed the stimulus to the exercise of individual prudence, and discouraged the self-command and self-denial which led men to take calm and dispassionate views of their own position and interests. With regard to the particular case of County Courts there were many circumstances which might be urged in support of the argument that the present state of things called for some modification of their arrangement. It was said that the State paid the salaries of the fifteen Judges who sat in the Superior Courts in Westminster Hall. That was true, but it was also true that suitors were made to contribute largely towards the expenses of those Courts. Besides, those Judges did not stand in a position with respect to the public similar to that of County Court Judges. Their services were required for carrying on the whole of the superior criminal jurisdiction of the country; and they had also to discharge the constitutional duty of rendering advice and assistance to the ultimate Courts of Appeal. It might also be urged as a reason why the Judges of County Courts should be paid out of the public funds that in Scotland the salaries of the sheriffs who presided in the small debts' courts of that kingdom were so paid. But it must be remembered that those sheriffs, like the fifteen Judges, were concerned in the administration of criminal justice. What he ventured to submit to the House, and at the same time to impress upon it, was, that this subject ought to be deliberately examined and considered by the House in connection with the state of the judicial establishments in Westminster Hall, and with the manner in which the charges of those establishments were divided between the public and the persons engaged in litigation. There was at present a strong impression on the public mind that these establishments were considerably larger than was necessary. The Judges were provided with most liberal salaries, backed by most liberal pensions. That, he considered, was perfectly proper. It appertained to the independence and the dignity of the Bench, and he did not believe that there were five men in that House who would wish to alter it; but that was no reason why the dignified occupants of those offices should not be fully worked, or why there should be a greater number of such officers than the nature and extent of the public business justified. The labours of the Judges had been greatly relieved by the creation of a body of not less than sixty County Court Judges, and the tendency of legislation was further to reduce their labours; and it was therefore but just to the people of England that, before imposing upon them a charge so heavy as was contemplated by the Bill under consideration, the House should examine into the state of those establishments, and should place them on such a footing as the interests of the public required. They were there to vote the money of the people of England, which was collected from the earnings of the mechanic, the artisan, the peasant, and the factory worker, and they had no duty more sacred than that of not voting sums which were disproportioned to the purposes to which they were to be applied, and of seeing that they did not impose upon the Consolidated Fund new charges without examining whether the expenses for kindred establishments could not be reduced. The only ground upon which his Motion could be opposed was, that this was a matter of extreme urgency; but such an objection would not be well founded, because all the necessary reforms in the procedure of the County Courts and in the costs of processes might be agreed to without the decision of the question of who should be the parties to bear the charge. That question was certainly not an urgent one. The course which he would suggest for the adoption of the Government was, that they should, during the recess, consider this very important subject, especially in connection with the position of the fifteen Judges; should fix a proper scale of salaries for the Judges of County Courts; should ascertain the lowest cost at which the business could be done; and should then, upon their responsibility, submit to the House a proposal as to the manner in which the charge should be shared between the public and the suitors. The Bill amounted to no such proposal.

Amendment proposed, to leave out from the word—

“That” to the end of the Question, in order to add the words “it is not expedient to impose, at the present time, upon the State a charge so heavy as one hundred and seventy thousand pounds per annum, towards the maintenance of the County Courts,” instead thereof.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that the Bill now before the House was founded upon the Report of a Commission specially appointed to inquire as to what changes might be made in the County Courts. The Commissioners were directed to inquire whether any reduction could be made in the fees paid by suitors in those Courts, and into the general cost of the proceedings. The Commissioners stated—

“We now proceed to consider a question which is preliminary, but essential, to this branch of the inquiry—that is, whether the County Courts should be self-supporting. We are of opinion that they should not. To compel the suitors to pay fees sufficient to support the establishment appears to us unjust in principle, as that which is for the benefit of the public should be supported by the public; but we fear that at present financial reasons will render it impracticable to reduce the fees in strict conformity with the principle we have enunciated. We think, therefore, that the suitors should pay an amount of contribution sufficient to remunerate the clerks and high bailiffs of the Court, and that all other expenses of the establishment—such as Judges’ salaries, buildings, stationery, and other matters, should be borne by the public revenue.”

They then gave a scale of fees, and recommended a reduction in the sum heretofore paid by suitors of £124,000. His right hon. Friend (Mr. Gladstone) had not stated any special reasons, applicable at this particular time, why the principles laid down by the Commissioners for the County Courts, and already recognised in the Superior Courts at Westminster, should not be now acted upon, and he did not see that any reason had been shown for further inquiry into the principle whether suitors who were least able to pay the costs should pay expenses from which the richer suitors in the Superior Courts were exempt. His right hon. Friend said this was a heavy charge, but he did not see how the House would be more competent to deal with the question in a future Session, since they had now the advantage of the assistance of the Report of the Commission. His right hon. Friend said there were special reasons why the Superior Courts of law at Westminster should be maintained at the public expense which were not applicable to the County Courts, because the Judges transacted all the criminal business of the country. But the Equity Judges received their salaries from the same source, and they transacted no criminal business. Their attention was exclusively devoted to suits in which property was concerned, and in which the suitors were persons of wealth, or, at all events, of some means. The Judges of those Courts were maintained exclusively at the public expense, and he did not see any distinction between the Equity Judges, who transacted exclusively civil business, and the Judges of the County Courts. His right hon. Friend said that there were now more Judges in Westminster Hall than were required for the business that devolved upon them. He was not aware of the grounds upon which his right hon. Friend came to the conclusion that the number of Judges could be at all diminished, nor could he conceive why, upon that account, the House should not do justice to the class of suitors interested in the County Courts. If the House were to cut off two, or three, or four of the Judges of Westminster Hall, that would not affect the business of the County Courts or the duties performed by the Judges of those Courts, nor did he see why the House should postpone an act of justice to the suitors in the County Courts until they had instituted an inquiry into a matter of a totally different nature. He conceived that the proper course was to go into Committee on the Bill. There might be reasons for making changes in the table of fees, but he hoped the House would not be induced to make those Courts self-supporting, and to throw the whole burden upon the suitors.

MR. E. BALL said, he hoped the Government would not give way upon the Bill. Of all the means to give relief to the oppressed, none was done at so little expense as by the County Courts Act. The last thing they ought to do would be to refuse a little money towards the relief of the oppressed. The business of the Courts was not only great, but increasing. Since 1851 it had increased a hundred fold. When, with the concurrence of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford the Government had voted so many millions, they surely should not refuse a sum of £100,000 for such a purpose. The right hon. Gentleman had told them to wait; he was a theologian, and therefore knew that procrastination was the root of all evil. No persons concerned with justice were so much wronged as the clerks of the County Court Judges, for they were less remunerated than any other portion of the same class. The Bill was intended for the middle classes, and he trusted that it would not be rejected.

MR. BOWYER said, that the Resolution of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) was founded upon the totally mistaken principle that the Judges of those Courts ought to be paid in part by fees from the suitors. The only sound principle was, that that expenditure should be looked upon as part of the public service. Remembering the reckless manner in which money was not unfrequently voted away by that House, it was shocking that there should be so much reluctance in granting the necessary supplies for that most important of all services—the administration of justice. He would certainly vote against the Amendment.

MR. VANSITTART said, he should support the Resolution. He approved of the reasonings of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Oxford, and thought that by acting upon the Report of the Commissioners the House would place itself in a false position. It was, he believed, dangerous to make justice too cheap.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that a proposal to throw upon the suitors the entire charge of those Courts looked not unlike an attempt to make men forego their rights and submit to imposition rather than incur a serious expenditure. Such a proceeding was not to be tolerated. The doctrine, that the charge of maintaining the Courts of law should be thrown on the litigant parties was open to grave objection, for the community at large, and not merely the person who succeeded in a case, derived benefit from the administration of justice. It might be that the expenditure on account of salaries and superannuations in the Courts at Westminster Hall was excessive; and, if so, it would be well to inquire into it; but the question had no manner of connection with that now under consideration, and should not be mixed up with it. It was not to be denied that the fees at present exacted from suitors in the County Courts were too large, and altogether out of proportion with the amounts involved in litigation. That evil the Bill would correct, so the House, in his opinion, would do well to go at once into Committee on it.

MR. BECKETT DENISON said, he fully approved of the Resolution. They were called upon to pay £170,000 a year, and if the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Gladstone) divided the House upon the propriety of considering the County Courts without pledging themselves to pay the sum, he would go with him. After so much money had been voted, it was more than ever important to consider such a sum as £170,000. He objected to it as a guardian of the public purse.

MR. ROEBUCK said, that from the speech of the hon. Gentleman, it would be supposed that the £170,000 was to be taken from the pockets of the people. That certainly was not the proposition. The proposition was to limit the power of granting money to the County Courts to £170,000. They should consider that in those courts was transacted the greater part of the litigation of the country. The amount in each case was small, but the aggregate was enormous. The courts were courts of litigation for the poor. The Resolution made a difference between courts for the rich and courts for the poor, and gave the favour to the court for the rich. [Cries of "No, no!"] That, however, he repeated, was the effect of the Resolution.

SIR HENRY WILLOUGHBY said, he must deny that the Amendment was fairly susceptible of any such interpretation as that sought to be put upon it by the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield. If any distinction were made between the rich and the poor as regarded their courts, the House would desire to make it in favour of the latter. But what said the Chancellor of the Exchequer to the proposal to saddle the Consolidated Fund with this enormous charge? It was, above all things, important to know how it was regarded by the financial Minister. For his own part, he (Sir H. Willoughby) had serious misgivings that if they went on throwing such heavy burdens on that fund, it would break down and become bankrupt at last. The expense of our judicial constitution was enormous. We paid more for allowance and compensation than other countries paid for their entire judicature. That arose from the mixture of payment by money and payment by fees.

MR. J. G. PHILLIMORE said, that all persons were gainers by a cheap administration of justice, and that to maintain cheap justice was one of the reasons for which that House existed. If the Judges in Westminster Hall were too numerous and too well paid, by all means reduce them; but let not the poor of the country be called upon to pay larger sums than they ought to pay in judicial fees.

MR. BASS said, the question was not one of cheap justice, but of what proportion of the expense of the County Courts should be borne by the suitors and by the country respectively. It was not the poor alone who were benefitted by these tribunals—the rich often availed themselves of their advantages; and if the fees now unnecessarily proposed to be reduced were still retained, it was his belief that nobody, from one end of the country to the other, would lose a night's sleep in consequence.

MR. STRUTT said, that 999 out of 1,000 debtors were induced to pay their debts from a knowledge of the facilities offered by those courts for enforcing just claims; and it was not fair that the unfortunate creditor, who was put to the trouble and expense of substantiating his claim in one of those tribunals, should be subjected to an additional charge for their maintenance. The burden ought to fall upon the public at large, to whose rights the existence of those courts operated as an effectual protection. It would, moreover, be a flagrant injustice while the cost of the Superior Courts—resorted to exclusively by the rich—was defrayed by the public, to insist on the tribunals frequented by the poor being supported by the suitors.

House in Committee.

Clauses 1 to 4 agreed to.

Clause 5.

MR. HADFIELD said, he wished to move, as an Amendment, at the commencement of the clause to insert the words "any special pleader of ten years' standing may be appointed a Judge of a County Court, and." Some of our ablest lawyers had been taken from special pleaders, who were especially versed in the law of evidence.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he must object to the Amendment. Special pleaders, he apprehended, would introduce technicalities, and not act on the principles of the Bill. There was a provision in the former Act that they should be qualified for the office after they had been called to the bar for a limited period.

MR. HADFIELD said, he would add to the Amendment a proviso that they should be first called to the bar.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he had no objection to fix a particular time after their call to the bar.

SERJEANT SHEE said, he did not think it was desirable to introduce special pleaders in any way. They were only persons who undersold the barristers, their very existence was of recent date, and they did not choose to observe the regulations of the bar.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that on referring to the existing Act, he found that special pleaders were eligible after they had been called to the bar for seven years. He hoped that would satisfy the hon. Member for Sheffield.

MR. CRAUFURD said, he would beg to ask whether the hon. and learned Gentleman would have any objection to another principle, which was not to exclude attorneys and solicitors. Those parties were admitted in Scotland; and one of the ablest Judges in that country, Mr. Sheriff Barclay, of Perth, was only a solicitor. He should move that a solicitor or attorney of ten years' standing might be qualified to be a Judge of a County Court.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. J. G. PHILLIMORE said, he should oppose the Amendment. The attorneys had quite power enough in the profession as it was. A single instance did not make a general rule, and he thought the line between the bar and the attorneys should be maintained definite and distinct.

MR. HADFIELD said, he hoped the hon. and learned Attorney General would adopt the Motion. He knew of no power attorneys possessed except that of selection in delivering briefs to counsel. There was no comparison on the part of barristers with a class of attorneys with whom he (Mr. Hadfield) was acquainted for a knowledge, not only of evidence, but of the law in all its departments.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he would not discuss the fusion of the two branches of the profession proposed. So long, however, as the judicial bench in Westminster Hall was recruited from one branch of the profession, he thought it was best to keep up the distinction, more especially in the County Courts. On those short grounds he opposed the Amendment.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, many of those gentlemen who were now Judges of the County Courts had been originally attorneys. It was but natural, however, that barristers should oppose attorneys.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. HENLEY said, he objected to the power the clause gave to the Judges, in case of absence, to allow another Judge to act for them.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, that the clause did not increase the power already existing in that respect. It only prescribed the mode of appointment.

MR. HENLEY said, that it would seem to sanction the notion that these Judges had so much of their time unoccupied that they could supply the convenience of other Judges, and do their work.

Clause agreed to; as were also Clauses 6 to 19 inclusive.

Clause 20 (County Courts shall not have jurisdiction to try any action for criminal conversation, but that, by agreement of both parties to a suit, all other actions may be tried in such Courts).

MR. ROEBUCK said, he wished to ask on what ground actions for crim. con. were excluded from the jurisdiction of the County Courts? He also wished to know why, in the case of causes beyond the jurisdiction of County Courts, the consent of both parties was required for their trial in those Courts?

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL replied, that County Courts were established in order to afford a cheap and speedy means for the recovery of debts, and for the administration of justice in certain cases; but if jurisdiction was given to those Courts over all causes which were now cognisable by the Superior Courts of Common Law, he apprehended that it would be necessary to establish a subordinate set of Courts to determine the class of cases which were at present within the jurisdiction of the County Courts.

MR. ROEBUCK said, he always understood that County Courts were established with the avowed object of bringing justice home to every man's door. If, then, there was in any case a right of action for criminal conversation, why should not the means of redress be open to the poor man as well as to the rich? The poor man felt the injury he sustained in such a case quite as keenly as the rich man, but, under present circumstances, his poverty prevented him from obtaining justice.

MR. J. G. PHILLIMORE said, he would remind the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield that the damages laid in cases of criminal conversation were frequently of enormous amount, and that great delicacy of judgment was required on the part of the Judges by whom such cases were tried. He thought, therefore, that the jurisdiction of the County Courts should not be extended to cases of that class.

MR. ROEBUCK said, a man could bring an action for libel in a County Court, and on what ground was he precluded from proceeding for criminal conversation in such a Court?

MR. HENLEY said, he did not see why, if cases of libel and seduction could be tried by consent in County Courts, the jurisdiction of such Courts should not be extended, with the consent of the parties to actions for criminal conversation.

MR. MURROUGH said, he thought it would be most dangerous to give County Courts jurisdiction in cases of crim. con. Under such a system facilities for collusion would be afforded, and plots of that kind might easily be carried out to fruition in County Courts.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he was of opinion that cases of collusion would be more likely to occur in the inferior than in the superior Courts, and he thought, therefore, that it was desirable to reserve the jurisdiction in actions for criminal conversation to the Superior Courts.

MR. M'MAHON said, that the clause would give jurisdiction to County Courts, by consent, with respect to all actions in Courts of Common Law; he should, therefore, move an Amendment giving County Courts similar jurisdiction with respect to suits in equity.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he should oppose the Amendment, which was negatived without a division.

MR. M. T. BASS proposed an Amendment, to extend the jurisdiction of the Courts beyond £50, without consent of parties, which was also negatived.

On the Question that Clause 20 stand part of the Bill,

MR. CRAUFURD said, he should oppose the clause, and hoped the Committee would strike it out, as in the event of its being agreed to it would clash with the clauses which he intended to move at a future stage.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he hoped the Committee would adopt the clause as it stood. The Commissioners were unanimous in their opinion that the jurisdiction of the County Courts should not be extended to any other causes than those mentioned in the clause without the consent of the parties to the suit.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 21 (Cases may be removed from the jurisdiction of the County Court, in which a set-off was admitted against the original account exceeding £200).

MR. SEYMOUR FITZGERALD said, he should move to strike out the words "provided the amount of the claim exceeds the sum of £200." He did not see why, if the actual sum in litigation was only £10, whether the set-off was £200 or £2,000, the County Court should not deal with such cases. If the clause were agreed to in its present shape, it would exclude all running accounts from the jurisdiction of those Courts.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL said, he would accept the Amendment.

Clause, as amended, agreed to; as were also Clauses 22 to 72 (C) inclusive.

Clause 72 (D), Salaries of Judges.

SIR JOHN PAKINGTON said, he considered the present would be the proper time to move the Amendment of which he had given notice for equalising the salaries of the County Court Judges at £1,500, instead of at £1,200 per annum, as proposed in the Bill. Those Courts occupied now a most important position, and he thought that the public interests required that every precaution should be taken to insure that the Judges should be highly qualified. The task he now had to perform was simplified by the admission contained in the Bill—that hereafter the salaries of the Judges ought to be uniformly of one amount, therefore he need not dwell on that point. A recent Act gave power to the Treasury to assign to them a salary not exceeding £1,500 a year, and not below £1,200. That discretionary power on the part of the Treasury had been condemned by the Lord Chancellor and by the country at large, and was wisely surrendered by the present Bill. The question now was, whether the salaries should be equalised at the amount of £1,500 a year, or, as the Bill proposed, at £1,200. When the first County Courts Act was passed in 1846, jurisdiction was given to the Judges of those Courts only in cases not exceeding £20 in value. A salary of £1,200 was assigned to them, but they were left free to add to their income by following their profession as barristers. In 1850 the jurisdiction was extended to cases of £50 in amount, and of course the business of the Courts was greatly increased. The next Act, in 1852, regulated the salary of the Judges, so that it should not exceed £1,500, or fall below £1,200, but by the same Act the Judges were restricted from following their profession as barristers. In the exercise of the discretion given by the Act the Treasury decided, in 1854, that a very considerable number of the Judges—he believed one-third—should receive the maximum salary of £1,500 a year, on the ground of the rapidly increasing duties of their office. Since then not less than six or seven Bills had been passed adding to the labours of the County Court Judges, and he now appealed to the House to decide whether it was not important to the interests of the country that the income of the Judges should be fixed at such an amount as would secure the services of men qualified to discharge the increased duties with efficiency. He would now give the House some idea of the amount of business done in these Courts by stating that, in 1851, not less than 441,000 complaints were entered for sums amounting in the whole to £1,624,916, of which £618,000 were received during the year to the credit of the suitors, and £615,000 were actually paid over. He might safely say that since then the amount had greatly increased. Considering that the Judges were obliged to abandon their profession as barristers, to take residences in the country, and to support properly their social position—considering also that the business of the Courts had greatly increased, he thought that the higher salary of £1,500 would not be more than a reasonable remuneration for the duties they had to discharge. Let the House compare the salary he now proposed to give with the remuneration given to some other legal functionaries. The senior Commissioner of Bankruptcy received £2,000 a year, and the other Commissioners £1,800 each. The first Insolvency Commissioner received £2,000 a year, and the subordinate Commissioners £1,500 each. The duties discharged by the County Court Judges were fully as important to the public as the duties discharged by those officers, and required an equal degree of capacity, professional knowledge, and experience. The Chairman of the Quarter Sessions Courts in Ireland received from £800 to £1,000 a year each, and were allowed to practise at the bar besides. Now, should not gentlemen qualified to fill the office of a County Court Judge, and having the dignity and station of that office to maintain, be put upon, at least, as good a position as the Chairman of the Quarter Sessions Courts in Ireland? Now, let the Committee consider for a moment the objections that were raised to the proposed increase of the salaries of the County Court Judges. It was in the first place contended that their labours were not so great, and their time not filled up to such a degree in the discharge of the duties of their offices as to entitle them to a higher amount of remuneration than that which they at present received. His answer to that objection was that such a rearrangement of the districts in which those Judges presided might be effected as to occupy their time to any extent which might be deemed to be desirable. The next objection which was urged to any increase of salary was, that those Judges held other situations from which they derived considerable emolument, and a case had, he believed, lately occurred in which a learned gentleman who presided in one of the County Courts held at the same time no less than three recorderships—namely, those of Plymouth, Devonport, and Wells. [Sir G. GREY: There is no salary attached to the last-mentioned recordership.] He was glad to be corrected by the right hon. Baronet; but he must say that he regarded the combination of different situations in the person of a County Court Judge as in principle most objectionable; and, being of that opinion, he saw no reason why such combination should be permitted to stand in the way of the change which he proposed. It was also urged in opposition to that change that it was totally unnecessary, inasmuch as no difficulty was ever experienced in finding in Westminster Hall barristers who were ready to accept the office of County Court Judge at a salary of £1,200 a year. That was a proposition which he was not prepared to dispute; but he must at the same time maintain that, in order to uphold the public interests, the real question in connection with the subject to be considered was, not whether barristers ready to accept the office at that salary could be found, but whether the services of men of high professional qualifications could for that amount be secured. He considered that such would not be the case, and, therefore, he felt justified in pressing his Amendment.

Amendment proposed, in page 21, line 4, to leave out the word "twelve," and to insert the word "fifteen," instead thereof.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that before deciding whether the salaries of the County Court Judges should be raised to the amount proposed by the right hon. Gentleman, there was a preliminary question to be decided — namely, whether the salaries, if increased, should be placed upon the Consolidated Fund or provided for out of the fees included in Schedule C? In proposing the sum of £1,200 per annum, the Government had been under the impression that it was an adequate salary for the County Court Judges. The only means of determining the correctness of that impression was by seeing whether persons competent for the discharge of the duties could be obtained for that sum. His (the Chancellor of the Exchequer's) noble and learned Friend the Lord Chancellor, who of course had better means of knowing whether that was so or not than any Member of that House, was of opinion that the salary of £1,200 a year was a remuneration sufficient to insure the public the services of barristers fit for the duties of the office. There was an allowance, too, for travelling expenses, which was a considerable addition to the receipts of many of the Judges, and which probably more than covered the exact expenses to which they were subjected. Her Majesty's Ministers had acknowledged the principle that the amount of the salaries of the County Court Judges should not be left to the discretion of the Treasury, by proposing that a uniform rate of £1,200 a year should, in their regard, be adopted; and, therefore, the only question which the Committee had to determine was, whether that sum should be increased to £1,500 per annum. He could not help observing that on many occasions lately the functions of the House of Commons and of the Government seemed to be somewhat inverted. The House of Commons used to be a check on the prodigality of the Government in proposing votes of money for the discharge of public duties; but lately, without going so far as to say that the Government had acted as a check on the prodigality of the House of Commons, it certainly had been frequently their function to resist the pressure put upon them by the House for the imposition on the Exchequer of allowances for pensions, salaries, and the like. The whole charge for the County Courts imposed on the Consolidated Fund, if this Amendment and the Amendment for raising the salaries of the clerks were carried, would be actually greater than the charges of all the Superior Courts of Law and Equity put together. If the proposition were adopted, it would be very desirable that there should be a clear understanding that, in case there should be any redistribution of districts and a diminution of the number of Judges, those Judges whose duties might be thereby increased would have no right to complain of a breach of contract. It should also be understood that if, in consequence of future legislation, any additional duties beyond those involved in the increase of districts, should be thrown upon the County Court Judges, they would have no claim for any further increase of salary on that account. He further thought they ought to give their whole time to the public, and not to be permitted to hold any other office concurrently with that of a County Court Judge. There was another point connected with the subject which he thought deserved the attention of the Committee. At present County Court Judges were not within the General Superannuation Act. The police magistrates of London were engaged in the performance of extremely onerous duties, for the discharge of which they received only £1,200 a year, subject to an abatement of 5 per cent per annum under the operation of that Act; and they, moreover, upon their retirement, were entitled only to the superannuation allowance which the Act afforded; whereas the County Court Judges received their salaries free from all annual deduction, and were entitled to a retiring pension equal in amount to two-thirds of their salary, even though the Treasury should think proper to sanction their retirement after the lapse of a single year. In a clause about to be considered an addition would be proposed to the salaries of the clerks or registrars equal to about £30,000 a year, and if that increase as well as the present proposed increase of the right hon. Member for Droitwich were agreed to, an additional charge of £45,000 a year would be thrown on the Consolidated Fund. The Committee would have to consider, in the event of their agreeing to those two augmentations, whether, instead of throwing them on the Consolidated Fund, it would not be desirable to raise them by means of fees. If the Committee thought they ought to be charged upon fees, he would point out that about a sufficient sum would be obtained by raising the first item in Schedule C (for every plaint) from 6*d.* to 1*s.* in the pound. The Committee ought to consider the effect of the numerous additional charges from time to time thrown upon the general taxation of the country. A Bill had already passed by which an additional charge of least £100,000 a year had been imposed on the public Exchequer, and by the Bill now before the Committee, about £170,000 more would be thrown on it, making £270,000, or in round numbers £300,000. If the proposed Amendments should be carried a further sum of about £50,000 would be added, making an annual charge thrown upon the public purse in the course of the present Session of £350,000. He would remind them that the fees of which he had suggested the increase were paid by persons who engaged in litigation in order to obtain their rights, and who would not probably complain of a little additional taxation, but would acquiesce in it without much difficulty. On the other hand, if the sum he had named were raised from the general taxation of the country, they must have recourse to taxes which had a very limited area of incidence, for although many taxes were doubtless paid by the general consumer, yet many, such as the income tax and the assessed taxes, were paid by a comparatively small portion of the community. He wished the Committee therefore to bear in mind the nature of the taxes from which the Consolidated Fund was fed, and not to do that which, instead of affording relief to the general public, would be certain to give rise to a feeling of discontent.

MR. W. WILLIAMS said, he was sorry the right hon. Gentleman did not offer a more decided opposition to the proposition. It had been stated that upwards of £600,000 was the amount recovered for creditors in the County Courts; and if he divided that amount by the sixty-two Judges, it gave an average of £6,000 for each. He thought that £1,200 a year was an ample salary for the recovery of such a sum.

MR. WHITESIDE said, that there were three scales of payment for chairmen of Quarter Sessions in Ireland, ranging from £500 to £1,000. He should decidedly object to the payment by fees.

MR. MALINS said, that the principle of giving £1,500 a year had been affirmed in the case of sixteen or eighteen County Court Judges. Upon what principle had that been done? On the principle of the number of causes heard. But that was a most fallacious test, because in London the Judges had but to leave their houses in the morning and return to them in the evening. But, in other districts, the County Court Judges had to undergo the exertion of passing through the country. He was, therefore, opposed to the distinction of salaries. If there was any objection to increasing the salary from the Consolidated Fund, he thought it might be done, as had been alluded to by the right hon. Gentleman (the Chancellor of the Exchequer), by increasing the fee from 6*d.* to 1*s.*

MR. GLADSTONE said, he was one of those who objected to the increase of the salaries of the County Court Judges, and he regretted that the observations of the Chancellor of the Exchequer had not been more decidedly opposed to the Motion of his right hon. Friend opposite (Sir J. Pakington). No private Member of that House could move to increase a Vote in Committee of Supply, or a tax to be levied upon the people; and why, because there was a technical defect in the application of the rule, should he be allowed to propose the augmentation of a charge upon the country which the Executive Government declared to be sufficient to secure the proper discharge of the duties for which it was intended to provide? The Bill now before them had been introduced into Parliament with the sanction of the head of the law, who had the best means of information, and necessarily had the strongest sympathies with the learned members of that profession, and he, in the name of the Executive, announced that £1,200 a year was a sufficient salary for a County Court Judge. Her Majesty's Government would have done no more than their duty had they taken their stand upon that declaration of the Lord Chancellor, and had submitted to the House that it would not be wise for it to reverse the relative positions of the two powers. His right hon. Friend (Sir J. Pakington) had somewhat misunderstood the argument of those who opposed the increase. That argument was, not that there were in Westminster Hall many lawyers who would take the office of Judge of the County Court for £1,200 a year, but that there were plenty who were able and competent to the discharge of that office who would be content with such a salary. That the gentlemen who filled those offices were fully competent to the discharge of their duties was an admitted fact, and was fully proved by the popularity of their Courts; that they were not men who, from patriotic motives, engaged to discharge those duties for inadequate remuneration was equally true. On the contrary, they were in general gentlemen who passed from a precarious income of a much lower amount to a certain and permanent salary of £1,200 a year, with the power of retiring upon two-thirds of that sum in case of well-certified bodily incapacity. It was right in the House of Commons to reduce the demands upon the public purse that might be made by the Government, but he would not believe that the House of Commons were about to take the functions of the Government out of its hands, and insist upon an augmentation of the burdens of the people.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, that when the question was raised in the early part of the Session by the hon. and learned Member for Sheffield (Mr. Roebuck), he (Sir G. Grey) asked the House to abstain from coming to a hasty decision, and to wait for a Bill which the Government had in preparation, when the question might be properly raised. He now repeated what he then said, that the Government adhered to the principle of fixed as against fluctuating salaries. He then stated that the Government thought a salary of £1,200, and a liberal allowance for travelling expenses, a sufficient remuneration for the duties which the County Court Judges had to perform; but he added that the Government might have made an error in forming an opinion, and it was for the House to decide, with a full knowledge of all the circumstances, upon the proper fixed salary for those Judges. His right hon. Friend the Chancellor of the Exchequer had weighed the various considerations which applied to this question. His right hon. Friend said, that, in the opinion of the Lord Chancellor, the most competent men in Westminster Hall were candidates for these appointments. He (Sir G. Grey) might also state that he received applications for the office of police magistrate, the salary of which was £1,200 a year, from men who were fully competent to discharge those duties, and who would be also qualified, as he believed, to fill the post of Judge of the County Courts. But the Government knew that a strong feeling existed on the part of many Members of the House, and they anticipated that their proposal might not be successful, and that the House might adopt the proposition of the right hon. Baronet (Sir J. Pakington). He would candidly say that one of the greatest difficulties that pressed upon him was the arrangement made by his right hon. Friend (Mr. Gladstone) when Chancellor of the Exchequer, by which a certain number of these Judges received a salary of £1,500 a year. He believed that that arrangement was a great error—that it was based upon a fallacious calculation, and that it had produced dissatisfaction among those not included in the number. He was not a Member of the Government at that time, but it seemed to him that that arrangement was the strongest argument for the increase now proposed.

MR. GLADSTONE said, that his right hon. Friend ought to be aware that the Motion for raising the salaries of the County Court Judges did not originate with the Treasury, but was pressed upon it by the noble Lord now at the head of the Government, who was then Home Secretary. He (Mr. Gladstone) did not consider himself permitted to consider what was a fit salary for County Court Judges, or he should have decided that question without hesitation. His was simply a Ministerial duty. The Act of Parliament had prescribed the path in which he was to walk, since the salaries of the Judges of those Courts were fixed between £1,200 and £1,500. If blame there was, his hon. Friend (Mr. Wilson), who was then Secretary to the Treasury, shared the taunt of his right hon. Friend (Sir G. Grey) with him. His hon. Friend would remember that, on referring to the Act of Parliament, it was not believed that they had a discretion, since it appeared to be the intention of Parliament that there should be varying salaries. That was simply a question of the construction of an Act of Parliament which was now going to be repealed. As the Judges affected by this decision had only a life interest, he was surprised to hear that that arrangement constituted so serious a difficulty in the way of the right hon. Gentleman.

MR. HENLEY said, it was distinctly stated by the Government that the Lord Chancellor had come to the determination that £1,200 a year was a sufficient salary for these Judges, and that there was no difficulty at that salary in getting plenty of persons fully qualified to fill those offices. When the Judges were first appointed it was uncertain what their duties would be. Fresh duties had since been put upon them, but no one had said they had more than they could do: they must, therefore, have had an easy time of it at first. Seeing that the Government thought that fit men could be found at the salary offered, he should not feel justified in going against the Government, whose duty it was to decide the question. If the Government proposed to give too much, it was the duty of the House of Commons to hold their hands; but it was not the duty of that House to make the Executive Government spend more money than they declared to be necessary. He regretted that the Government had not spoken with greater firmness against the proposition.

Question put, "That the word 'twelve' stand part of the clause."

The Committee divided:—Ayes 185; Noes 63; Majority 122.

Clause agreed to.

Clause 72 (E). (Registrars to be paid by salaries.)

MR. KENDALL said, he would now beg to move the Resolution of which he had given notice, relative to the payment of Registrars.

Amendment proposed, in page 21, line 12, to leave out the whole of the clause after salaries, and insert—

"And the principle on which the said salaries of the Registrars shall be fixed and regulated, shall be that the Registrar of each Court in which the plaints entered do not exceed the number of two hundred in a year, shall have an annual salary of one hundred and twenty pounds; and that in Courts where the plaints exceed two hundred in the year, the salaries shall be increased by sums of five pounds for every twenty-five additional plaints up to one thousand plaints inclusive, and then by sums of four pounds for every twenty-five additional plaints, and that such salaries shall be confined to proceedings within the ordinary and Common Law Jurisdiction of the Court: Provided, That no Registrar shall be paid a less salary than one hundred and twenty pounds per annum."

MR. STANHOPE said, he thought no justice really cheap that was not well administered. In his opinion, it would be much better to charge a small extra fee on each plaint in order to secure the services of a competent Registrar than, by reducing the fees, to run the risk of having an officer unable or unwilling to discharge his duties.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER said, that the rule of the House was, that while the Government were responsible for the fixing of the specific amount of any Vote they proposed, no private Member could move the increase of that amount, although it was competent for him to move that it be diminished. It was true that local fees and local rates did not come within the same category as taxes paid into the public Exchequer, yet both these classes of imposts were equally levied from the Queen's subjects, and also equally entitled to the vigilant guardianship of that House. The proposal for the remuneration of the clerks of County Courts contained in the clause now under consideration was founded on the recommendation of the Commissioners specially appointed to inquire into the subject. Those Commissioners stated their opinion to be that the suitors ought to contribute a sufficient sum to remunerate the clerks and high-bailiffs of the Court, while other charges should be defrayed at the public expense; and they suggested a scale of salaries for the clerks, commencing with £65, and ending with £1,020, thus exhibiting a considerable increase on many of the existing salaries. If the proposition of the hon. Gentleman were adopted the recommendation of the Commissioners must be set aside, and the country would be saddled with a burden of £60,000 a year, instead of one of £30,000—the extent of the fair and reasonable addition to the income of the clerks proposed to be made by the Bill. He therefore hoped the Committee would not accede to the Amendment.

MR. BENTINCK said, he regarded the opinions of many Members of that House, who were fully acquainted with the subject, as deserving of even greater weight than those of the Commissioners referred to by the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer. The rule restricting private Members who might wish to propose the increase of taxation was no doubt very excellent when not pushed to extremes; but an exception ought to be made in its application in a case like the present, where the proposition of the Government would render those Courts inefficient.

MR. CAYLEY said, he thought the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer was under a misconception with respect to the Commissioners; it was his belief that they had not entered into the question of the remuneration of the Registrars at all. That was a totally different question from the last, and certainly the Amendment should meet with his support. The Bill had gone hastily through the House, mainly out of deference to the Commissioners; yet he believed that the Commissioners had never inquired into the duties or the salaries of the officers of the Court.

MR. MULLINGS said, the scale of salaries in the Report of the Commissioners was prepared by some Gentleman connected with the Treasury. He protested against it at the time, but as there was a strong desire on the part of the Commissioners that they should concur in the Report, he did not press his objection, but he still protested against so low a scale.

MR. SPOONER said, he entertained a strong objection to the unconstitutional proposal of leaving the amount of salaries of a large class of professional men to be fixed and regulated by the Commissioners of the Treasury. Considering the nature and extent of the onerous duties of the County Courts clerks, he thought that the minimum of remuneration proposed in this clause of the Bill was much too small. It should be considered that the clerks, under the existing law, were required to keep open an office daily from ten to four, and to give proper attention personally or by their clerk to all persons calling for information and official aid. He had made himself acquainted with the details of a County Court clerk's office, and he could say that this book-keeping involved considerable labour and attention to detail, for not only were the entries of the proceedings numerous, but when judgment was carried by a plaintiff the payments were often made in very small instalments extending over a lengthened period of time, and required the utmost attention and accuracy. He earnestly hoped the House would concur in doing justice to a body of men so useful to the suitors and the public as the County Court clerks.

MR. WILSON said, the objection of the hon. Member for North Warwickshire (Mr. Spooner) was entirely removed by an Amendment, of which he had given notice, to fix the salaries in strict conformity with the recommendation of the Commissioners.

Question, "That the words 'to be' stand part of the Clause."

Mr. Cayley

The Committee divided:—Ayes 73; Noes 162: Majority 89.

MR. WILSON said, in adopting the sense of the Committee as evinced by the division, he would now beg to propose an Amendment to the effect that all Registrars in Courts where the plaints issued exceeded 200 per annum should have an annual salary of not less than £120, with an addition of £5 for every twenty-five plaints up to 1,000, and beyond that number £4 for every additional twenty-five plaints up to 6,000, making in the whole £1,080 per annum, and when the plaints exceeded 6,000 in number then the salary to be fixed by the Commissioners, with the consent of the Lord Chancellor.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses up to 71 inclusive were agreed to.

House resumed; Committee report progress.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS AND THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND.

On the Motion that the Unlawful Oaths (Ireland) Bill be read a third time,

MR. ROEBUCK said, he would beg to ask the right hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin whether he would fix a day for a discussion on the subject which had occupied the attention of the House at an early period of the evening? He hoped the right hon. and learned Gentleman would put such a Resolution upon the paper as would enable the House to come to a distinct decision.

MR. NAPIER replied that he must leave it to the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland to take such steps on the subject as he might think fit.

MR. HORSMAN said, the right hon. and learned Gentleman had made a charge against his (Mr. Horsman's) right hon. and learned Friend the Attorney General for Ireland, and the Government waited to see whether it was his intention to bring that charge before the House in a definite form. The Government had a right to expect that the right hon. and learned Gentleman would not shrink from supporting the charge he had made, but would submit a substantive Motion to the House, and so give the Government an opportunity of meeting his accusation.

MR. WHITESIDE said, he thought the discussion highly irregular, and he considered the speech of the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Horsman) most unjustifiable. His right hon. and learned Friend (Mr.

Napier) said he was in possession of a statement with which the right hon. and learned Attorney General for Ireland requested to be furnished, and his right hon. and learned Friend promised that that statement should be placed in the hands of the Attorney General for Ireland. The statement had been sent to the Attorney General for Ireland, and he (Mr. Whiteside) thought, when the right hon. and learned Gentleman had considered the subject matter of that statement, the onus would lie upon him of taking such course as he might think fit.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. J. D. FITZGERALD) said, he had not asked for any statement. The House had been informed that the Master of the Rolls had sent to an hon. Member of that House a statement which he (the Master of the Rolls) intended himself to read from the bench that day. He (the Attorney General) said he supposed that statement had been sent to the right hon. and learned Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Napier); that he understood it involved charges upon his conduct as Attorney General for Ireland; and he challenged the right hon. and learned Member to produce that statement. He never asked the right hon. and learned Member for the document. The right hon. and learned Gentleman offered him a document which he (the Attorney General) did not accept, and he repeated what he had before said—that he challenged the right hon. and learned Member, if he dared, to bring the subject under discussion. He (the Attorney General) was prepared to meet the charge, and it was the duty of the right hon. and learned Gentleman (Mr. Napier), as a man of honour, and as a Member of that House, who had been made the vehicle of bringing the charge before the House, to give him (the Attorney General) an opportunity of meeting and refuting it.

MR. NAPIER said, he conceived that he understood his duty as a man of honour and as a Member of that House. He had defended the conduct of the Master of the Rolls, and he had been furnished with a statement which he had that day received from Ireland. He had offered to place the statement in the hands of the Attorney General for Ireland, and, when the right hon. and learned Gentleman answered that statement, he (Mr. Napier) would be prepared to do his duty.

Bill read 3^d, and passed.

DIVORCE AND MATRIMONIAL CAUSES BILL (LORDS).

On the Motion for deferring the Second Reading of this Bill,

SIR JAMES GRAHAM said, that adverting to the clause in the Bill, which prohibits persons who have been guilty of adultery from intermarrying, he thought that as it was likely to give rise to much discussion he would call upon the noble Lord at the head of the Government to state whether it was his intention to proceed with the Bill at that late period of the Session?

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he would state the intentions of the Government on an early day next week. With respect to the clause referred to, it was, in his opinion, a cruel and immoral one; and, as far as he was concerned, he would not assent to it.

Second Reading deferred.

ITALY.

LORD LYNTHURST: I am anxious, my Lords, before we separate, to call your attention to the affairs of Italy. I have from time to time applied to my noble Friend opposite (the Earl of Clarendon), to furnish us with information on that subject, but my applications have been uniformly unsuccessful. I regret to say that we do not very often succeed in obtaining information from my noble Friend, or in procuring papers containing information to be laid upon the table, until such information has ceased to be interesting or important. Happily, however, in this case other sources of information are open to us. Deplorable, indeed, my Lords, is the situation of Italy. Every man of education—every man with any feeling—must deeply sympathise with the situation of that most interesting and unfortunate country. When my noble Friend first furnished the protocol of the 8th of April, the world was taken by surprise, and Italy hoped and expected great and important advantages from that publication. I regret, however, to say that those hopes and expectations have been completely disappointed. I have often questioned within myself the policy of that publication, unless the Governments of France and England intended to follow it up, not by a mere interchange of diplomatic notes, but by some efficient action. For, my Lords, it is impossible that men should continue to live under a foreign military tyranny without being eager to break their chains; and to raise the hopes and expectations of persons in that situation, and afterwards to disappoint those hopes, is a course that must lead in all probability to a most calamitous state of things. I need hardly add, my Lords, that of all military tyranny the military tyranny of Austria is the most galling and odious. It is not in Italy alone that we have had experience of the military occupation of Austria; we have had more recent evidence with respect to it in the Principalities. The Austrians entered the Principalities as friends and protectors—professedly as friends and protectors, in virtue of a treaty with the Sovereign of that country. It might be supposed that under such circumstances the Austrians would maintain most strict discipline, that they would abstain from all violence and injury to the inhabitants, or that if, by any accident any injury or violence were committed, that it would be speedily redressed. Unfortunately, however, during their occupation they pursued a different course, and I think I am authorised, from the information I have received, in saying that the people of that country lament that Russian invasion was exchanged for Austrian protection. The Austrian occupation of those countries has been spoken of in favourable terms; but I have seen so much of the evidence from official documents that I feel certain that the representation I have made is perfectly correct. My Lords, by the Treaty of Vienna the limits of Austrian power in Italy was strictly defined. They have passed this boundary; they have stretched themselves along the coast at Ancona, and they are now in the occupation, with an immense military force, of the duchy of Parma and a portion of the State of Modena. They command, indeed, the whole north of Italy. I will not enter upon an inquiry how far their original entry into the Legations was legal, and how far it was justified by the condition of the country and of the Governments. These things I pass over. They are well worthy of consideration and discussion, but they would take me from my present object. What I wish is to bring before your Lordships the present state of that country. From the time the Austrians have passed the boundary seven years have elapsed. For seven years they have had possession of this territory, and they have not only ruled it, but they have placed a greater portion of it in a state of siege, and under martial law during the whole of that period. My Lords, when is this to cease? What termination is to be put to this state of things? I ask this of my noble Friend. He will tell me that the short answer returned by the Austrian Government to this question is, that they will leave this territory when they can do so without danger of insurrection. Now, mark the course of things. Bad Government produces dissatisfaction, disturbance, and possible insurrection. That leads to the invasion of a military force. The possession by a military force continues and increases dissatisfaction, protects bad government, produces disturbances, and renders it impossible to remove the troops; so that, by this argument, to the evils of the possession of such a country by a hostile force there appears to be no reasonable termination. My Lords, that is a sad prospect for Italy. If it be true, is there no remedy? What are we to say of the condition of that unfortunate country? My Lords, I refer to the suggestion which I think proceeded from my noble Friend opposite. I refer also to the suggestion of the Sardinian Government as to the mode in which these evils may be terminated. The plan is this—establish a satisfactory Government—a Government that will satisfy the people; establish a small national force for the purpose of keeping the peace, and then you may withdraw your army. Until that is accomplished it is impossible to do so. Now, it must be allowed that this plan is specious; if it could be carried into effect it would be satisfactory. But, my Lords, it cannot be done without the consent of Austria. Will she consent to do it? Will she consent voluntarily? If she will not consent by her voluntary act, will she consent by the pressure or persuasion of the Western Powers? A man, my Lords, must be credulous indeed who should suppose that Austria will voluntarily quit the possession of these districts. It has been said sometimes that the inconvenience of this possession is such that Austria by her own act will withdraw her troops. I know a little of Austria; and I am sure that the inconvenience must be of a nature much more strong than I can conceive to lead her to withdraw her troops from this part of Italy. I think, therefore, that so far as relates to her voluntary acts, the withdrawal is altogether hopeless. It has been thought that she may possibly yield to the pressure of France and England. I look forward to that state of things with the anticipations of agreeable results. I do hope that the pressure will be such as to accomplish the object which I have in view. I do not mean a pressure by the force of arms, but by the moral effect which would be produced by that pressure. But I may be permitted to say that, although a short time ago I was somewhat sanguine as to the effects of the concurrence of France and England, yet that certain events have since occurred and certain symptoms have appeared, of such a nature and character as to lead me to entertain very serious doubts whether those hopes will be realised. Not that there is any coolness between the two countries or any want of energy on the part of England; but there are circumstances in the situation of France which lead me to doubt whether she is disposed cordially to co-operate on this subject: therefore, my Lords, although I do not absolutely despair of the state of Italy, I confess I feel very great anxiety, mixed with very great distrust and fear, that the object which I have in view may not be accomplished. My Lords, my noble Friend, in the document to which I have referred, speaks of the grievous notoriety of the proceedings of the Government of Naples. It is impossible not to say a word on that subject. I will only say, in general terms, that nothing, in my opinion, can exceed the infamy of those proceedings. I will not attempt to describe the conduct and policy of that Government, because any terms that I could make use of would fail to impress your Lordships' minds with the reality of the evils under which the subjects of that Government suffer. Nothing but a minute detail of circumstances of a most extraordinary kind which have occurred could possibly impress your minds with a distinct and accurate notion of the state of that country. I must leave this to the general impression of what you have read and heard. I will only refer to a publication to which I have before alluded—a publication by a right hon. Friend of mine, the Member for the University of Oxford (Mr. Gladstone). That publication was circulated extensively throughout the Continent of Europe. It went through various editions, and caused a great impression. An official answer was returned to it by the Government of Naples. I do not know how many of your Lordships have read that answer; but, so far from refuting the statements of my right hon. Friend, it only confirmed the accuracy of his details. That publication—I strike out everything but what fell under the observation of the author himself—a man of truthful character and conduct—that publication relates conduct on the part of the Neapolitan Government to mark the infamy of which is beyond my power of expression. But it may possibly be said that these occurrences took place four or five years ago, and that great improvements have taken place since that period. But, so far from any change having taken place, the same system has continued from that time to the present—more secrecy is observed, and there is more disaffection, but there is the same infamous system of tyranny and oppression. If it is suggested that a change has taken place, let me refer to what is passing at this hour in the kingdom of Naples—to the political trials that are going on, the counterparts of those described by my right hon. Friend (Mr. Gladstone), in which there has been a disregard of every principle of justice and a violation of every right. Persons have been suborned to be witnesses against the accused, and men have been threatened with imprisonment and punishment unless they consented to bear false witness. I will not go through the details, but your Lordships must have read them, and must have seen that a greater violation of right and principle never existed in the history of the world. But what makes the case worse—if it can be made worse—that this state of things is founded upon no law, not even upon the law of arbitrary Government. The constitution of Naples was sworn to by the King. After the disturbances he ratified the adoption of that constitution, which has never been revoked, and is now the law of that country. The obligation of that constitution is, therefore, still in force, and everything has been done in open defiance of the law, and in direct violation of the constitution. My noble Friend told us, in the document to which I have referred, that although the general principle should be that one State ought not to interfere in the interior transactions of another, yet that there were exceptions to that rule—that there might be exceptions which not only give the right to interfere, but make it the duty of another Government to interfere—and my noble Friend applied that principle to the State of Naples. Three months and more have elapsed since the treaty of peace was signed, and since my noble Friend assented to that principle, and soon after a note was addressed to the King of Naples. When I asked my noble Friend, about a week ago, if the Government had received any return to that note, what was the explanation? Upon a subject so grave, so important, so interesting to the country, so interesting to mankind, mark! my Lords, what was the answer. The King of Naples had retired to Caserta, and, although the place is only a few miles distant, that was put forward as a reason for delay. Did you ever hear, on so grave a subject, such trifling—such absolute mockery—such insult? But I am told—and my noble Friend will tell me if I am right—that within the last two or three days an answer has been received. [The EARL of CLARENDON assented.] I see an assent on the part of my noble Friend, and I thank him for it, because that will lead me to another question. Is that answer satisfactory? I am told that it is extremely the reverse. I am told that the King of Naples denies the right of this country to interfere in the affairs of his kingdom, and that he not only denies the right, but positively refuses to give any explanation or reply to the remonstrances addressed to him. I will repeat the question. I ask my noble Friend whether that is the substance of the answer received to the important communication which he addressed to the King of Naples? My noble Friend shows no sign. Then I shall ask him to lay on the table of the House a copy of the answer, that we may have an opportunity of judging whether the information I have received is correct. There is one thing that strikes me as singular. There is no country in the world, I should say, more open to the power of England than the kingdom of Naples. If the King of Naples sets our power and authority at defiance, what is the interpretation which I put upon that conduct? It is this—that the Government of Naples feels that there is some lukewarmness, some backwardness on the part of France to co-operate with us in extreme measures for the purpose of obtaining the object which we have in view; and they think further, that we should not like to adopt measures which might give rise to conflict with Austria. This, then, is the state of things to which we are reduced. We threaten the Government of Naples. We say, "Your conduct is atrocious, is infamous; we require you to change it." They refuse to listen to our remonstrances, and we sit quietly down and take no further steps. What then becomes of the power and *présti*ge of England? There is another subject to which I wish to direct your Lordships' attention—I mean the occupation of a great part of Italy by the Austrian troops. My Lords, seven years have elapsed since Austria entered into possession of the Legations, and established a state of siege and martial law throughout the whole of that country. In an assembly of Englishmen it is not necessary to dilate upon what must be the state of a country occupied by a military force of foreigners establishing such a system as that. Of all instruments of arbitrary power martial law is the most effective and the most fatal. Acts of oppression are exercised without restraint or limit, and upon bare suspicion peaceable citizens are apprehended and thrown into prison. As Englishmen we have a very imperfect idea of what being thrown into an Italian prison means. We have a notion of well-arranged apartments, inspected and visited by magistrates and officials, and placed under most careful and responsible superintendence; but we must not transfer that notion to the loathsome dungeons in which men of education and men of station are imprisoned, on mere suspicion, with the vilest and most atrocious malefactors. Such is the state to which many of the inhabitants of the Legations are now reduced—occasionally, to be sure, there is a show of trial. But what species of trial? Trial by a military tribunal of foreigners, every member of which is subject to the control of the prosecution; a trial without any form, without any rule of law, in which everything is directed, according to the will and discretion of those by whom the proceedings are instituted. And what is the result? The result, I am told from the highest possible authority, is, that since the Austrians have been in possession of the Legations, 200 prisoners have been shot, and between 2,000 and 6,000 sent into exile. I go to another spot—the Duchy of Parma. There has been a great increase in the military force of Austria in that Duchy. Piacenza was originally assigned as the place for the armed occupation of Austria, but that place has long become too small to hold the forces she has sent into the Duchy. A conflict has taken place between the invaders and the Government. The Government insists that the trial of parties accused shall be before the ordinary tribunals. What say the Austrians?—that they shall be tried by courts martial, composed of foreigners. Every man who is attached to the principles of freedom and fair dealing, and to the due administration of justice must wish that accused persons should be tried before the ordinary tribunals of the country. But but this fact has occurred, and it is a melancholy fact—that before the conflict took place the Austrians had seized a great number of persons and transferred them to the dungeons of Mantua, where they lie in a hopeless state; for if brought to trial, they will be tried according to the discretion of the Austrians. It is while this conflict is going on that it is consistent with duty for Her Majesty's Government to do everything to interfere and support the cause of the people; yet, my Lords, although this contest has been going on for a very long period, it is only within a few days that our Ambassador at Florence arrived at Parma. Whether we shall derive any great advantage from his presence, I will not pretend to say; but, if report speaks truly, his inclinations and opinions are opposed to the rights which it should be the duty of Her Majesty's Government to defend. I pass it over, and I come to another part of this subject—I allude to the kingdom of Sardinia. Every Englishman must feel the deepest possible interest in the fate and prosperity of that kingdom. We are related to it now by common institutions and by a brotherhood in the great struggle which has recently terminated. The advocates of foreign occupation say that Italy is not adapted to free institutions. The State of Sardinia is a striking refutation of that opinion. Under the greatest difficulties, in a situation where the most active struggle was going on, Sardinia has succeeded in establishing constitutional Government, and in preserving it by the exercise of great firmness, moderation, and patience; and I am sure every man in this country and every one of your Lordships must feel anxious that nothing shall occur to impair, in any way, the benefits of that constitution. The state of things in that part of the Peninsula is one, however, which must cause the greatest anxiety. That Government is regarded with jealousy, with aversion, I may almost say with hatred, by the neighbouring Government of Austria. That Power regards the Sardinian Government as holding out a most dangerous example, and anything that can be done for the purpose of subverting it will be eagerly adopted by Austria. My Lords, in every constitutional Government there will be parties. In Piedmont there are the Radicals on the one side, and the Ultramontanes on the other; but there is in addition, a third and most dangerous party—the party of the priests—which has shown its sentiments towards the Government by its conduct in the affairs of the property of the Church. These bodies are all combined in a formidable opposition to the Government. Notwithstanding all this the great body of the population of the country is content and happy, and are active in their support of the constitutional Government. But the danger to Piedmont from abroad is not confined to Austrian intrigues, carried on within her—there are other dangers with which she has to contend. Immense armies are concentrated in her neighbourhood, which are being continually augmented. The least accident may create a collision which must bring down destruction upon the territory of Piedmont. But that is not the only danger to which the Sardinian Government is exposed by the formation of vast armies upon her frontier—armies already large, and increasing day by day. Their presence requires Piedmont to maintain a much larger and more expensive military force than her limited means would otherwise justify her in supporting, and therefore she is compelled to withdraw her financial resources from beneficial application in order to employ them in the maintenance of an army to defend her against the multitudinous forces of Austria. My Lords, I wish to impress upon you, as I desire to impress upon the Government, the absolute necessity of giving the strongest moral support to Sardinia; and should an emergency arise—should a necessity occur—to give further the aid of its material support to a country which has deserved so well of Europe as Piedmont has done. We can never desert that country without a violation of duty. Allow me to point out to your Lordships the bitter feeling of Austria towards Sardinia, as exemplified in the case of the sequestrations. There never was an instance of such littleness—if the affair had been one between women, I should say, of such spite. I will just briefly describe the circumstances of that case. By the law of the country every subject can cast off his allegiance—that is, with the consent of the Government, and with that consent he can leave the country and become a foreigner—in every respect a foreigner, and, like every foreigner, he is allowed to hold property in the country. Now, after some disturbances at Milan, a great number of persons who were not at all concerned in these disturbances, but who felt that a further residence in that country would be uncomfortable, availed themselves of the general license to quit the country; but, being warned that particular caution was requisite at that time, every one of them applied for and obtained a special permission. The greater number of those persons established themselves in Piedmont, where they became naturalised, and thereby, according to the laws of that country, became entitled to all the privileges of Sardinian subjects. Many of them have become members of the Assembly in Turin. However, in consequence of some alleged suspicions the property of those persons in Milan was sequestered by the Austrians. No explanation was given, no grounds assigned, no evidence was stated, no justification offered; but that sequestration has continued, despite the continued and earnest remonstrances of Piedmont, down to the present time—a period of between three and four years. Having stated these facts to your Lordships, let me for a moment ask what is the course recommended by the friends of Italy? They are earnest in advising that there should be no attempt at insurrection; that for the moment the idea of an united Italy should be abandoned; that all hopes and wishes for revolutionary movements should be abandoned. The plan of an united Italy is impracticable. Revolutionary movement would be immediately crushed by the disciplined bands of Austria, and the pressure of her despotism would be increased tenfold. Such, therefore, must be the advice given by all real, genuine friends of Italy. I have taken some pains to inquire, and I understand that the great mass of the intelligent and well-informed men throughout Italy are most moderate in their views. They desire no great changes, they do not wish to alter the existing Governments; but what they desire, and what they are entitled to demand, is an impartial administration of civil justice and a firm, honest, and intelligent administration of affairs. Give them that, and I firmly believe the great majority of the people of Italy will be content. When the French in 1806 entered the Legations they established the French code of laws, and their civil affairs were firmly and honestly administered; the people, before discontented, became satisfied, happy, and wealthy, and that period of its history is regarded in that district as the happiest it has ever known. We know well that, in Tuscany, the laws which the good Duke Leopold introduced were productive of happiness and contentment among his people; and we also know that, at the present time the people of Piedmont are contented, happy, and prosperous. That is what the people of Italy now require—that is what will satisfy them, and I would advise them most strongly not to seek to disturb the boundaries of different States, but to labour with all moral force, by all the means in their power, to gain the objects they so much desired—impartial administration of justice—good and regular administration of civil affairs. My Lords, there is one way in which that object may be attained, and with facility—it is by the cordial union and earnest co-operation of France and England. Whether we may hope for that co-operation for such an object I will not undertake to predict—it may occur—it has occurred—and it has produced great benefit to the people of the country to whom that united action was applied. Such co-operation is the only hope of the Italian people, and I trust I shall have some explanation from my noble Friend which will justify them in cherishing that hope. My Lords, I very much regret that the Austrian Plenipotentiary at the Congress was not content to discuss with my noble Friend and the French Plenipotentiary the question of the affairs of Italy. At the same time I am not at all surprised, because with Austria there is only one rule of government, and that is—force, coercion, direct military repression. It is a principle with Austria, that the people are for the Government, and not that Government is for the people. There is not one liberal idea in their whole system. For such a system to exist in another country, supported by foreign bayonets, must be horrifying; and with what feeling that system is regarded by the Italians we have most abundant evidence to establish. My Lords, I have thought it my duty to bring this most important and most interesting subject before you, and I trust that the very deep interest I take in it will be my excuse for addressing you at such length.

THE EARL OF CLARENDON: My Lords, during the course of the last two or three years it has been my disagreeable duty to meet with official reserve Motions which have been submitted to your Lordships by the noble and learned Lord on the foreign policy of this country. The statements of the noble and learned Lord have always been so lucid, and have been accompanied with such powerful appeals to the sympathy of your Lordships—although my noble and learned Friend declares himself to be only responsible, or rather irresponsible, for his own opinion, and that he speaks for no party—yet cannot help thinking that he is in some degree responsible; and although your Lordships have ever been most indulgent to those who speak under responsibility from the Ministerial benches, and especially with regard to the production of papers, yet I never at any time rose to follow my noble and learned Friend without a deep sense of the delicacy and difficulty of the duty I had to perform. I say this, the more particularly now, because I feel that there is so much in what has fallen from my noble and learned Friend that meets with the sympathies of the people of this country; that there is so generous an interest prevailing in this country in favour of Italy, and so great a desire that that country should emerge from the position to which she has been reduced by bad government, and be lifted up to the station which she is entitled to hold, and which she may hold by means of judicious reforms, that I feel an unusual regret that I cannot meet my noble and learned Friend by laying on the table of the House papers which would show what are the opinions of the Government, and what have been the steps taken to procure a better state of things in Italy.

But the correspondence on that subject is incomplete; it is still going on, and we have favourable expectations of the result. I can, therefore, conceive that nothing but injury would accrue to the cause my noble and learned Friend has at heart by the production at this moment of that correspondence. It might be the means of putting an end to the friendly and confidential communications with those Powers which are chiefly concerned in the condition and welfare of Italy. My Lords, we cannot improve the condition of Italy by force. We must come to an understanding with those countries from which the movement must proceed. Many of the facts to which my noble and learned Friend has alluded exhibit a state of things of long standing. There are many flagrant abuses of authority to which he has referred which seem to be the necessary consequence, to a certain extent, of the caprices of men in a corrupted and degraded state of society, and which can only be remedied by good Government and by a power which cannot be produced suddenly and by external pressure. I have endeavoured to collect all the information I can with respect to the present state of Italy, and to separate it from all exaggeration and all party spirit; and I admit that in order to establish a really better state of things—not only a state of things adapted to the character and wants of the people, but which must have some reference to the unfortunate circumstances of Italy—I am certain, (and I rejoice to hear the opinion and advice given by my noble and learned Friend on that subject), that revolution, however momentarily successful, will not lay the foundation of any substantial prosperity. It is our earnest hope that the people of Italy are too sagacious and have profited too much by former experience, not to resort to means, the result of which will render their position worse. My Lords, nothing has been done by Her Majesty's Government either to promote or excite revolution. I feel that it would be both unjust and cruel to excite expectations which could not be realised—or rather, I should say, expectations which we are not prepared ourselves to realise; because if we excite expectations on the part of a portion of Italy—if we lead them to expect aid from us, I say that we are bound to render that aid. And though I am prepared to say that there are cases in which intervention in the affairs of other States not only becomes a right but an obligation as strong as any, still I hold, as a general rule, that interference with the internal affairs of other States is not justifiable, and can only be resorted to upon the clearest grounds and as a last resource. It was in this spirit, and without any desire of promoting revolution or exciting false hopes, and with the view of laying the foundation of substantial reforms, and of procuring the speedy evacuation of Italy by foreign troops, that the subject was brought before Congress. In fact the initiative was taken by France; and this I think may be taken as a proof that the Government of France desired the withdrawal of the French troops from Rome. I cannot but regard with satisfaction that the subject was brought forward before the Congress, notwithstanding that it has been most bitterly condemned in some quarters. I was sorry to hear, even from my noble and learned Friend, an expression of regret that the matter should have been brought before Congress unless measures of great vigour were to be taken by the Governments of France and England. We have been told that we had no right to bring the subject forward before the Congress at all; that, by doing so, we were discussing the independence of States not represented at Congress; that it was calculated to defeat the object which we had in view, and that the representatives of the Governments who brought the question forward are responsible for the consequences which may ensue. But I say we were fully entitled to bring that question before the Congress; and when all the great powers of Europe were engaged in the great work of pacification, when they were solemnly binding themselves to evacuate the territory of Russia, when Greece, Turkey, and the Principalities were to be relieved on the earliest occasion from the presence of foreign troops, I say it was impossible not to cast our eyes towards Italy, which for years had been occupied by foreign troops without any sufficient pretext or justification. I shall not enter, any more than my noble and learned Friend, into the causes which led to that occupation; but we felt that it was a measure only to be justified by urgent necessity, and that it ought to cease with the causes which gave rise to it. We felt also, as my noble and learned Friend has said, that that necessity would never arise unless accelerated. We felt that the initiative would not be taken by the Italian Government. It may be convenient for

Sovereigns to rely upon the aid of foreign bayonets for temporary support rather than incur the anxiety and trouble of rendering themselves independent by effecting reforms which would secure for them the gratitude and affection of the people. It was with this object that we brought this question before the Congress; and we have good reason to be satisfied with having done so. And here let me take this opportunity of adverting to the conduct of Count Cavour at the Congress. The conduct of Count Cavour, the representative of the State most deeply interested in the result of the discussion, was throughout moderate and dignified, and he well sustained the reputation which he had already earned for himself by the services which he had rendered to his country. To him, more than to any other man, is Sardinia indebted for the establishment of liberal institutions; whereby he has rendered great service to Italy by proving that the Italian people are not unfit to enjoy liberal institutions, and that rational liberty is not inconsistent with devoted loyalty; and that both may be enjoyed in that country without risk of revolution or danger to public order. I feel the most entire reliance on the spirit by which Count Cavour is actuated, and I believe that the Austrian Government itself is not more opposed to insurrections in Italy than he is, or would do more to prevent it. It is true, as my noble and learned Friend has said, that three months have elapsed since this discussion took place; and it is also true that there are no visible results. But my noble and learned Friend must not infer from this that nothing has been done. As much has been done as could be undertaken in the time that has elapsed. I wish I could say that the result of our communications with the King of Naples was satisfactory. I cannot do so, for it is impossible that any two Governments could be more at variance in respect of the facts of the case than Her Majesty's Government and the Government of the King of Naples. Our representations were made to him in the most friendly spirit. We stated our reasons for believing that the existing state of things was dangerous to the stability of his throne, and also injurious to the peace of Europe. We particularly pointed out what were the dangers which threatened His Majesty, and we more especially pointed to that which my noble and learned Friend has suggested as the great difficulty—the necessity of a better administration of justice. We recommended a general amnesty for political offences, and such a system of Government as would rally round it the confidence of the people. We pointed out the inexpediency, not to say the danger, of a policy characterised by systematic mistrust and unjust persecution, and, above all, we showed how essential it was that all subjects of His Majesty, irrespective of their political opinions, should have sufficient security for their persons and their property. I think, my Lords, that a milder representation with respect to the existing state of things could hardly have been addressed to any Government. It is true that at last we have received an answer to this representation, but we have not yet been able to confer with the Emperor of the French on the subject of this answer. I hope I shall not bring the French Government under the censure of my noble and learned Friend by saying that the Emperor is absent, and that, as yet, therefore, there can be no reply given. Until we have communicated with the French Government on the subject, and have determined with them upon the course which it may be necessary to pursue, I think it will be better not to lay that note upon your Lordships' table, and I shall confine myself to saying that it was impossible for any answer to be less satisfactory or less indicative of future improvement. But, my Lords, the questions of reform in the Pontifical States and the withdrawal of foreign troops from those States have also been pressed upon the consideration of the Powers principally interested, and, I must say, have been discussed in a manner and in a spirit very different from that in which the King of Naples has met the suggestions made to him. Although my noble and learned Friend may be incredulous, I believe the Austrian Government itself desires to withdraw its troops from the Pontifical States. I believe that the French Government also wishes to withdraw its troops, and this desire, so far from meeting with any opposition on the part of the Roman Government, is shared and approved by it. If, then, it be true—as I have every reason to think it is—that this desire is sincere on the part of the three Powers principally concerned, I cannot believe that much time will elapse before the withdrawal I have spoken of takes place, and before those precautions are taken which will be undoubtedly necessary after so protracted a foreign occupation in order to prevent the recurrence of disasters which we should all regret. These precautions being taken, however, I can see no reason why the Papal territory should not be evacuated with as little danger or as little mischief as took place in the case of Tuscany. The events of 1848 may have left painful reminiscences in Tuscany, and may have raised the same apprehensions on the part of the Government there; but it is to the credit of the Grand Duke of Tuscany that he determined to rely for support upon his people alone, and to request the withdrawal of the Austrian troops, and your Lordships are aware that the last Austrian soldier has long left the Tuscan territory, without the slightest disturbance having ensued. My Lords, I see no reason why this example should not be followed, in respect to all the other Italian States. But, my Lords, in point of fact, the experiment of confiding in the Italian people has never yet been tried; for those excellent measures which inaugurated the reign of the present Pope, and which were received with gratitude by his people, were, like everything else, swept away by the torrent of revolution in 1848. I say, then, that measures of reform have not had a fair trial. I hold in my hands—it is too long for me to read to your Lordships—the Pope's proclamation, dated in 1849, which preceded his return to Rome, and in which the foundation of a better judicial system was completely laid down. I believe, if the reforms there promised by the Pope were carried into execution, that everything which my noble and learned Friend could require for the better administration of justice there would be carried out. But I repeat that, as yet, the exhibition of confidence in the Italian people has never yet been attempted. Throughout the greater part of the Peninsula, an administration founded upon the policy of securing the affections by promoting the welfare of the people has never been tried. The policy hitherto adopted has always been one of fear, founded upon the expectation of immediate revolution, without analysing the causes of those fears or inquiring whether those apprehensions were or were not justified. Now, this is not a natural state of things. It is not natural on the part of nations to rebel against their Governments. A rebellion against a Government which did all in its power to secure its welfare was never a national feeling on the part of any people; and I am convinced, my Lords, that the Italians are not inaccessible to kindness, that all they wish is to have their wrongs redressed, and that they are not difficult to govern if their rulers will attempt the work of reforming in good faith, in good earnest, and under a greater sense of responsibility than that which they have hitherto exhibited. My Lords, I do not know that any practical utility would ensue from my attempting to follow my noble and learned Friend throughout the speech he has made. He himself has pointed out in his speech some of the great difficulties which must attend the course to be taken by this Government. He has stated in plain terms the difficulty which we should have to encounter in acting alone. He has stated in plain terms why it is necessary that pressure, if applied at all, should come from France and England together; and I believe that until we can supply that joint pressure in all its force we shall not arrive at the results which we all desire. I will only say, in conclusion, that Her Majesty's Government have as much at heart the amelioration of the condition of the Italian people as either the Parliament or the people of this country can have, and that all the efforts they can make and all the influence they can bring to bear will be exerted in the endeavour to ameliorate that condition.

THE MARQUESS OF CLANRICARDE said, he trusted that no attempts would be made to excite insurrection in Italy, because it would lead to bloodshed, would probably end in defeat, and would then only make bad worse. But he could only say that the sooner a Government which continued to tyrannise over a people like that of the King of Naples, and to oppress them in a manner which had been to-night stigmatised as "infamous," the sooner such a Government was put an end to the better, not only for the people governed, but for the whole of Europe. When it was said that there must be no armed intervention in the affairs of Naples, what, in point of fact, kept the King of Naples on the throne? He, as he did not hold an official position, had no hesitation in giving utterance to the general belief upon that subject, and that was, that his position was maintained by the Austrian troops which had been allowed to overrun the Italian peninsula from the Alps to Ancona. It was well known that if any movement took place against the King, the Austrian forces would come in and suppress the movement. Well, then, it was said by the noble Earl that under no circumstances could resort be had to force in order to remedy a state of things which was injurious to Europe at large. [A gesture of dissent from the MARQUESS of LANSDOWNE.] Well, he was delighted that he had misapprehended the meaning of the noble Earl, but the noble Earl had talked of the inexpediency of the foreign armies being withdrawn from Italy until a better government was established. Why, if their departure were delayed until then, their stay would be indefinite, for they had gone into Italy to support and maintain a bad government, and not to support any amelioration of it. He, for one, anxious as he was that the powerful voice of the British Parliament might be of influence in bringing about a better state of things, could not press for the production of a correspondence which the noble Earl stated was not yet complete; but he thought that some information as to acts which had been committed in Parma, such as Italians being carried over the Austrian frontier and immured in Austrian dungeons, might well be laid before the country. With the exception of Sardinia, a country, the independence and integrity of which would always be dear to England, the whole of Italy was in a state of anarchy. It was occupied on the one hand by the brigands, and on the other by foreign troops, and such a state of things could not long be endured, for the condition of Italy might ultimately affect the balance of power in Europe. It was for the country to consider if it were not its duty to employ all its influence, and force even if necessary, to put an end to the occupation by foreign troops of a territory which ought to be independent—an occupation which was continued for the purpose of maintaining a tyranny not only injurious to the persons under its sway, but disgraceful to the present age.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE said, he felt great doubts as to the practical utility of continuing the discussion, and felt the greatest reluctance in adding a single word to what had fallen from his noble Friend (the Earl of Clarendon), but he wished to refer to one statement which had been made by the noble Marquess. The noble Marquess had understood his noble Friend to say that under no circumstances could force be employed, and he had felt it his duty in the momentary absence of his noble Friend to intimate by a dissenting gesture that such had not been the meaning of his noble Friend. What his noble Friend had stated was, that in the present state of affairs with regard to Italy—that in the present state of negotiations no recourse to force could be expedient; but he by no means laid down the principle that, with regard to that country any more than with regard to any other country, if the interests of Europe required it, no application should, under any circumstance, be had to force. On the contrary, his noble Friend had stated that there were circumstances under which a recourse to force might not only be necessary, but might be a matter of actual duty. They all were ready to admit that every other means of obtaining an object should be exhausted before recourse was had to force, and, above all, that every step should be taken, if interference by force should at any time be justifiable, to convince other Powers of the justice of the interference, so that the general peace of the world might not be disturbed. Let their Lordships also recollect that at that very moment, when they were talking about interference in the internal affairs of Naples, they were also protesting against the interference of other Powers in Italy. The present was not a state of circumstances in which it would be desirable to introduce any new complications, and he trusted that those which now existed would pass away, and that the result would be that interference would be got rid of altogether. He hoped that there existed on the part of the occupying Powers a bond fide and deliberate intention, in a greater or less degree, to get rid of interference, and the latest intelligence received by the Government with respect to Parma indicated an actual disposition to withdraw interference there the moment the system of assassination was put an end to. There were now fewer Austrian troops there, and the number would be gradually diminished. Concurring as a matter of feeling in the general sentiments expressed by the noble and learned Lord, he, nevertheless, thought it was equally the duty of Government to resist being led away by such a feeling, and to be firm in abstaining from any measure which might appear to embarrass the question. He only trusted that if ever interference should become necessary, it would be vigorously conducted, so that it might lead speedily to a satisfactory result. He had already said that he entertained some doubts as to the utility of the present discussion, and he therefore would not prolong it, not seeing the way to any immediate or useful effect being produced but by moral force. He was ready, however, to acknowledge that that moral force might be strengthened by the unanimous expression of feeling in that assembly, in which so much variety of opinion existed on other subjects, and that it would not be without its effect even in those fortresses of prejudice and arbitrary power which were undoubtedly the last places likely to be reached by it.

PAROCHIAL SCHOOLS (SCOTLAND) BILL.

House in Committee (according to Order).

Clause 12,

THE DUKE OF BUCCLEUCH moved, to strike out the clause.

* THE DUKE OF ARGYLL supported the clause, and expressed his surprise that the noble Duke had not stated the grounds upon which he proposed its rejection. The present Bill was in the nature of a compromise, agreed upon by the Scotch Members of various opinions in the other House, and it was the minimum that would be accepted by a large class of persons. The question, therefore, was, whether their Lordships would reject the present Bill with all its acknowledged advantages. The endowments of the Church of Scotland rested in that country, as in this, upon the principle of property, while the endowments of the parochial schools rested upon the principle of taxation. It was therefore necessary to come to Parliament when it was proposed to raise the income of schools and schoolmasters. No doubt there would be a few Dissenting masters elected under the Bill, but he believed the number would be very small; and if it should have the effect of demonstrating the feasibility of amalgamating the teaching of children of different sects under one master a great advantage would, in his opinion, be obtained. In that manner the Bill might possibly be the means of founding a more national system; but, at all events, it would be regarded for many years to come as a complete settlement of the question.

THE DUKE OF BUCCLEUCH admitted that the Bill was very different from the Bill of last Session, but even this measure was not supported by the class most interested in the subject. Although there was a majority for the third reading, the county Members were as two to one against it. The borough Members voted for it, and a great deal was said about increased means of education, but if greater means of education were needed, surely the large towns ought not to be overlooked. Nothing would have been heard of the Bill had not the schoolmasters' salaries become so reduced by the alterations in the prices of corn and other produce as to justify some proposition to meet their case. The connexion of the parochial schools with the Established Church of Scotland had been most intimate ever since their first formation, and he could not help believing that the present Bill was intended to afford an opportunity for substituting Free Church schoolmasters for masters who were members of the Established Church. It could not truly be said that the teaching in the parochial schools at present was at all of a sectarian or exclusive character. Their doors were open to children of Roman Catholics, Episcopalians, and Dissenters of all kinds, and those children did attend without any complaints on the part of their parents. If anything could be said to be a truly national system, he thought the parochial school system of Scotland was one. The great majority of those who were taxed to support the schools were, he believed, in favour of the existing system, and he would remind their Lordships of the declaration signed about two years ago by 1,970 heritors of Scotland, who signed their approval of the present system, and desired the maintenance of the connexion of those schools with the Established Church; and he knew there was a most anxious desire on the part of the heritors generally to extend the system of education and to increase the salaries of the schoolmasters from their own resources. For himself, it was not until after the most anxious consideration and much communication with persons out of that House, that he had come to the conclusion of moving the rejection of the clause. He had been pressed to oppose the second reading, but, believing there was much in the measure which was worthy of consideration, he had abstained from taking that extreme course. He, however, felt bound to move the omission of the 12th clause.

LORD PANMURE denied that the Bill had originated in any desire to introduce members of the Free Church as masters of the parochial schools, and he believed that if the Bill were passed in its present shape there would not be a dozen Free Church schoolmasters nominated throughout the whole country. If the clause were rejected, it would be almost tantamount to rejecting the Bill, for in all probability the other House would re-introduce the clause, and if their Lordships should persist in opposing it the Bill would be lost. All that was asked by the Bill was, that the schoolmaster should be appointed without being required to take any test. Whether they had a test or not from the persons keeping these schools, their Lordships might be sure that they would have none but God-fearing men in that situation.

THE EARL OF HADDINGTON supported the Amendment. He and his Friends were willing to accept the Bill if the noble Baron would consent to strike out the clause.

On Question, their Lordships divided:—

Motion agreed to ; clause struck out.

Clause 13,

THE DUKE OF BUCCLEUCH proposed to strike out the first four lines of the clause, with the view of inserting other words relating to the qualification of schoolmasters.

After short discussion, Amendment withdrawn, and clause agreed to.

Clause 14 struck out; remaining clauses agreed to, with Amendments.

THE DUKE OF ARGYLL then intimated to the noble Duke opposite (the Duke of Buccleuch) that, in consequence of the Amendment which had been carried on a division, the Bill could no longer be considered the Bill of the Government.

THE DUKE OF BUCCLEUCH repudiated the charge of the Bill. The measure was brought in by the Government, and they must take care of it.

Report of the Amendments to be received on Thursday next.

House adjourned till To-morrow.

CHARTER OF THE COLLEGE OF PHYSICIANS—QUESTION.

MR. KINNAIRD asked the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether it was the intention of the Government to grant a new Charter of Incorporation to the Royal College of Physicians of London?

SIR G. GREY said, for some years past communications had taken place on the subject, and the details of a new charter had from time to time been under consideration, but postponed in consequence of the different proposals made to Parliament touching the medical profession. However, as a new charter could not be granted without an Act of Parliament, there was no present intention of granting one.

THE IRISH MILITIA—QUESTION.

LORD CLAUD HAMILTON asked the Under Secretary for War to state the exact meaning of the circular recently promulgated in Ireland, respecting the gradual disembodiment of the militia. Was it intended that men who left their regiments with permission before the time fixed for their disembodiment should not receive the gratuity of fourteen days' pay which had been promised by the noble Lord at the head of the Government?

MR. PEELE said that, as the Irish militia was to be kept embodied longer than that of England and Scotland, and as some of the men desired to return home prior to the period fixed for its disembodiment, permission was given to them to leave, with a provision that they should receive the pay and bounty to which, up to that time, they were entitled. It never was intended by the circular of the Irish Government that they should be deprived of any of their rights in regard either to bounty or gratuity, but the settlement of their claims in the latter respect was to be made upon the disembodiment of the regiment, the intervening period being regarded as a sort of a furlough. As the militia was now about to be disembodied, however, instructions had been given that men who were permitted to go home should be settled with at once, and should receive all to which they were entitled in respect of gratuity and bounty. He agreed with the right hon. Baronet that, among these, those who had distinguished themselves at Sandhurst had as strong a claim to the consideration of the Government as the others; but he could not say that any of them had a claim to be kept in full pay in preference to those who were senior to them in the service. It would be impossible to retain a junior officer on full pay, and to place his senior on half-pay, even although the junior had distinguished himself at Sandhurst.

THE REDUCTION OF OFFICERS OF THE ARMY—QUESTION.

SIR J. GRAHAM observed, that in consequence of the peace considerable reductions would, no doubt, be made in the number of officers of minor grade in the army. Now, he wished to ask his hon. Friend the Under Secretary for War whether, considering that many commissions had been granted to students at Sandhurst as rewards for their early proficiency in the military art, their case would receive consideration at the hands of the Government in making the proposed reduction?

MR. PEELE apprehended that the only correct principle upon which such a reduction could be made was to reduce those who were the juniors in each grade. Of those juniors, some no doubt had obtained their commissions without purchase, as rewards for the proficiency they had displayed at Sandhurst; others, again, had obtained them in consequence of their militia regiments having contributed a certain quota to the regular army; while a third class had secured them by purchase.

METROPOLITAN DRAINAGE—QUESTION.

MR. BUTLER wished to put a question to the right hon. Baronet the President of the Board of Public Works, with reference to the drainage of the metropolis. The Metropolitan Board of Works had sanctioned a plan by which the sewerage would have its outfall at Plumstead Marsh, eight miles from London. That Board could not carry out any plan of drainage without the previous sanction of the right hon. Baronet, and it appeared that he declined to assist them. The Act of Parliament, under which the Metropolitan Board of Works was constituted, provided that all plans were to be submitted to the Board of Public Works, and consequently a deputation from that Board had waited upon the right hon. Gentleman, and submitted the plans referred to for his consideration and approval. The right hon. Baronet, in reply, said that he would cause some experiments to be made before giving a definite answer. That had been done, and it appeared that there was a great difference of opinion between the right hon. Baronet and the Metropolitan Board. This was a most important question to the metropolis, and what he wished to know on the part of the ratepayers was, whether the experiments which had been made under the instructions of the right hon. Baronet had been made in consultation with the engineer of the Metropolitan Board of Works—whether any plans had been laid before him for preventing the discharge of the sewerage of the metropolis at an objectionable point of the Thames, and whether the right hon. Baronet had taken or would take such measures as would prevent so important a work as the drainage of the metropolis from standing over for another Session?

SIR B. HALL admitted that the questions were of great importance to the taxpayers of the metropolis, and he would state in a few words the course taken by the Metropolitan Board of Works, and the course he had felt it to be his duty to take under the circumstances. Under the Act of last Session the main sewerage of the metropolis was to be completed before the end of 1860, but before any plan could be proceeded with it must first be submitted to, and approved of by the First Commissioner of Works. Having been given to understand that a plan was to be submitted to him, founded on certain data taken by the Commissioners of Sewers in 1851, and being extremely anxious that the work should proceed with as little delay on his part as possible, he communicated to the Metropolitan Board of Works that he thought it would be desirable that some person should be appointed to test the accuracy of the data on which the plan was founded. Accordingly, he communicated with his right hon. Friend the First Lord of the Admiralty, and requested him to name some person for the purpose who was thoroughly conversant with the Thames. His right hon. Friend named Captain Burstow, and that Gentleman was appointed to inquire into the matter. On the 3rd of June, he (Sir B. Hall) received a deputation from the Metropolitan Board of Works, and, having presented their plan, they desired that he would approve of it. He told them that the plan should have immediate consideration, but that, before pronouncing an opinion upon it, he thought it would be much better to wait until he was in possession of Captain Burstow's report. That report was made on the 30th, and on the 2nd of July he communicated to the President of the Metropolitan Board of Works that the plan proposed was at variance with the intentions of the Legislature, as expressed in the Act of last Session, inasmuch as it would keep the sewerage of the metropolis oscillating between Plumstead and the metropolis, and that therefore he could not sanction it. At the same time he conveyed to the Metropolitan Board of Works that if they presented any other plans to the Government which were in conformity with the Act of last Session, they should receive immediate consideration.

THE MASTER OF THE ROLLS AND THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND—QUESTION.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. J. D. FITZGERALD): Sir, I wish to put a question to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for the University of Dublin (Mr. Napier). The House is aware that the Master of the Rolls in Ireland made, from the judicial bench, a charge impugning the official conduct of the Attorney General for that country, and publicly stated that he had reduced his charge to writing and transmitted it to a Member of this House, who had undertaken that the charge should be openly and completely brought forward in Parliament. The House will also recollect that on Friday night the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Napier), holding that document in his hand, used the following words in his statement to the House:—

“A Member of this House stands charged with being concerned in a gigantic fraud—he has escaped from justice; and it is essential that we should inquire by whose default that escape has arisen. I hope the Government will afford the earliest opportunity for the inquiry to take place. The public demands it—it must be conceded—the case must be thoroughly sifted—the honour of this House is concerned in it.”

The question I wish to put to the right hon. Gentleman is whether he is now prepared—by “now” I mean any day soon to arrive—to bring forward in his place in this House, and in such a shape as can be conveniently met, this charge against the Attorney General for Ireland? The right hon. Gentleman says that the honour of this House is concerned in this question. He had received a written statement from the Master of the Rolls; he had accepted a commission to bring the subject before the House; he endorsed the statement placed in his hands with his own weighty authority; and I now appeal to him to answer this question—whether he is prepared at the earliest possible opportunity—to-morrow, if that day is open to him—to bring forward the charge which he has so received and endorsed? I think I may also appeal to the House—and I have never known an appeal made to their candour and generosity in vain when the honour of a Member was concerned—to back me in the request that the charge may be brought forward in such a shape that I may be able to meet it, and that this House may be in a position to give its decision on the subject.

MR. NAPIER: The right hon. Gentleman has referred to a passage in my speech the other night, in which I said that I thought it concerned the honour of this House that an inquiry should take place with reference to the escape of James Sadleir. I thought so then, and I think so still. But will the House allow me very briefly to explain my connection with this question?—because I think an attempt has been made, both in and out of the House, to place me in the position of an accuser.

MR. ROEBUCK: I rise to order. I wish to know whether the right hon. Gentleman is in order in entering into this statement when there is no question before the House and no other hon. Gentleman will have the opportunity of answering him?

MR. SPEAKER: if the statement of the right hon. Gentleman would lead to debate he would not be in order; but I understood that the right hon. Gentleman was proceeding to make a statement with relation to himself personally.

MR. NAPIER: I was about to explain in what manner I became connected with this case. Hearing a statement made by the Attorney General for Ireland that the Master of the Rolls in Ireland had disregarded his oath as a Privy Councillor. [Interruption.] Several other hon. Members heard that statement.

SIR G. GREY: Such observations as the right hon. Gentleman has just made must lead to a debate. I also heard the speech of my right hon. Friend the Attorney General, and, as far as my memory goes, he made no such statement as the right hon. Gentleman has mentioned. I think, therefore, it is very irregular, after the rule laid down by the Speaker, that the right hon. Gentleman should proceed with his statement, which must necessarily lead to a debate.

MR. NAPIER: I really thought that the assertion of one hon. Member of this House was as good as the assertion of another. I stated what I had myself heard, and other hon. Members who were present also heard the observations of the right hon. Gentleman.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: The right hon. Member for the University of Dublin is now proceeding to discuss the practice and orders of the House. I take leave to differ from him in opinion. The practice of this House is, that what a Member states with respect to anything he has himself said is accepted as what he said; but, according to Parliamentary courtesy, it is not competent for an hon. Member to repeat an assertion after the denial, under such circumstances, of another hon. Gentleman.

MR. NAPIER: I have no intention of impeaching the accuracy of any one. One person may hear and another may not. I think I had a right to act upon my assumption of what I had heard; and on Saturday I wrote to the Master of the Rolls informing him of the statement I had heard made in this House on the previous night, and asking him what were the real facts of the case. I knew nothing about the matter, but as the Master of the Rolls was a constituent of mine, as well as a long respected friend, I thought it right to communicate with him. I received his answer a day or two afterwards. It was not the long document to which I referred on Friday, but one that I received some days before. On the Motion for going into Committee on the Appropriation Bill on Thursday, I stated that I would enter into the question with regard to the oath of a Privy Councillor; but upon you, Sir, telling me I could not do so, I said that I would bring the subject before the House on the motion for adjournment on Friday. On Friday I received the document to which reference had been made, and I brought it down to the House. An appeal was made to the hon. Member for Antrim, and also to me, with regard to the postponement of questions relating to this matter, and while I was considering what course I should pursue I was called upon to proceed with my Motion. I only referred to the statement sent to me by the Master of the Rolls, in so far as I considered that it bore upon the charge that he had violated his oath as a Privy Councillor. With regard to the rest of the case, what I then said, and what I still say is, that I think this matter ought not to be made the subject of angry political debate in this House. It is requisite, however, that we should be acquainted with all the material circumstances under which James Sadleir has escaped from justice; and what I thought the unfair course was this—

MR. SPEAKER: The right hon. Member is now exceeding the bounds of order.

MR. NAPIER: I was endeavouring to explain this point. When I brought forward the subject it was suggested that I should prepare a Resolution embodying a charge against the Attorney General; but I could not do that, because I was not in possession of the statement or defence of the right hon. Gentleman. I was most willing that an inquiry should be instituted into the circumstances; and I think such an inquiry would be most satisfactorily conducted by a Committee appointed by the Committee of Selection, who might investigate the matter thoroughly. I had no commission from the Master of the Rolls to make any charge against the Attorney General for Ireland, and, so far as the Attorney General was concerned, I could not make a charge until I knew his case. The right hon. Baronet (Sir G. Grey) said, I think, that if no hon. Member would embody his suspicions in a Resolution the Government would take measures to have the subject brought fully before the House. I shall be ready to take any course which the House may think it would be right to follow, holding as I do the opinion that this is a matter which it is our duty to investigate.

MR. J. D. FITZGERALD: As the right hon. Gentleman has declined to bring this matter in a substantive shape before the House, I shall adopt the only course that is open to a Member whose character is impeached, and therefore, without letting one day pass over, I shall to-morrow evening, on some formal Motion, make a statement to the House on the subject. And I have only to hope that hon. Gentlemen who have Motions on the paper for to-morrow, seeing this is a matter involving the personal honour of a Member of the House, will have the goodness to give way.

THE SCOTTISH EPISCOPAL CHURCH— QUESTION.

MR. HADFIELD asked the Secretary to the Treasury whether a sum of £1,200 annually or biennially had been granted from the Civil Contingencies Fund to the clergy of the Scottish Episcopal Church; whether such allowance was to be discontinued; and, if so, whether notice of the intended disallowance had been given to the parties concerned?

MR. WILSON said, hon. Members were, no doubt, aware that for many years past a sum of £1,200 had been granted every two years to the Episcopal Church in Scotland from the Civil Contingencies. Two years ago considerable objection was taken to that item, and it was contended that it ought, at all events, to be annually submitted to Parliament. The Government undertook to consider the matter, and, accordingly, when the grant was this year applied for, they came to the conclusion that they ought not to continue to pay it out of the Civil Contingencies Fund, and that if continued, it ought to be placed upon the Votes. They did not, however, feel justified in proposing it as an annual Vote in Parliament, and notice had been given to the parties that after this year the grant would be discontinued.

THE IRISH MILITIA—QUESTION.

MR. MAGUIRE drew attention to a statement in The Limerick Chronicle, to the effect that fifty-seven men of the Limerick Artillery Militia, who had accepted the offer of an immediate discharge, had had their regimentals taken from them, and had been dismissed with only 6d. each; that they had arrived in Limerick almost naked; and that they said they had been obliged to sleep in the open air, not having money to pay for their lodgings. If that was true, he wished to know whether those men would have the sum paid to them to which they would have been entitled if they had stayed with their regiment?

MR. FREDERICK PEEL had already answered the question in the reply he had given to the noble Lord the Member for Tyrone. He was not aware of the circumstance alluded to by the hon. Member, but the men would receive all they would have been entitled to had they waited till their regiment was disbanded.

MEDICAL OFFICERS—QUESTION.

MAJOR REED asked whether it was true that a body of medical gentlemen who had volunteered their services at a time of great emergency, the assistant surgeons, were to be dismissed with a gratuity of only two months' pay, while the medical officers of the Turkish Contingent and the militia regiments were to receive twelve months' pay?

MR. FREDERICK PEEL said, that the class of officers referred to would receive what had been agreed upon when they entered the service.

MAJOR REED: But is it not true that they engaged to serve for two years, of which only eighteen months have expired?

MR. FREDERICK PEEL: They will be dealt with according to the terms of their agreement; and there will be no difficulty in settling with them.

ITALY—MOTION FOR ADDRESS.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: Sir, I rise to bring forward the Motion of which I have given notice, for an Address "for copies or extracts of any recent communications which have taken place between Her Majesty's Government and the Governments of Austria, Rome, and the kingdom of the Two Sicilies, relating to the affairs of Italy." I submit this Motion without any wish to blame any part of the conduct of Her Majesty's Government, and without any wish to press the Motion, should my noble Friend at the head of the Government declare that there would be any inconvenience at the present moment in granting the papers to which it refers. But the House will recollect that no discussion has taken place with respect to the affairs of Italy since we were invited to agree to an Address to Her Majesty on the subject of the Treaty of Peace which had been concluded at Paris; and the House will also recollect that, at the same time, the protocols were on the table, from which it appeared that the condition of Italy was one of the many important questions which engaged the attention of the Plenipotentiaries assembled in the Peace Conferences. Now, Sir, the immediate purpose of my Motion, is to ask what has taken place in consequence of the intimations then given, and if—as I am given to understand, and as public rumour asserts—no satisfactory answers have been received to the communications made by the Government of Her Majesty, and by that of the Emperor of the French, what are the intentions of our Ministers with regard to their future policy? For, Sir, I think I can show that, unless they be prepared to pursue the course upon which they then entered, and unless it be their intention to take some steps of serious import with respect to the affairs of Italy, it would be better for the people of that country, and better for the character of this House and the dignity of Her Majesty, that Ministers should at once declare that they meant no more than to make friendly representations, and that those friendly representations having remained without effect, it was not their intention to proceed to any further consideration of the subject. Such a declaration would be better than the only other course which I could conceive—the repetition of ineffectual remonstrances, the renewal of useless notes, the continual denial of that which is asked by the Power to whom the representations of our Government have been addressed. Sir, I beg leave, in the first place, to call the attention of the House to the nature of the statements which were made at Paris. There may be those who would say that, the war with Russia having been happily concluded—all the Powers who were represented at Paris having agreed upon the terms of the pacification—it would have been better not to raise any new question, but to be satisfied with the work which had been done. That, Sir, is not my complaint, nor do I complain at all upon this subject; but such was not the course which Her Majesty's Government and Her Majesty's Ally, the Emperor of the French, thought it their duty to pursue. Count Walewski, who presided at the Conferences, deemed it necessary to bring under the consideration of the Plenipotentiaries, on the 8th of April, other questions deeply interesting to Europe—some of them relating to the general laws which govern the relations of nations, others affecting the particular States of Europe. He wished, as he said, to dispel “the clouds which are still seen looming on the political horizon before they become menacing.” I am sorry to say, with regard to those clouds which hang over Italy, that, so far from having been dispelled, they have been growing darker and darker, and that unless some more fortunate state of things succeeds, we shall soon see them bursting into a storm. Having made this preface, Count Walewski stated, that the occupation of Rome by France and of the Roman States by Austria, was an abnormal condition of things; that it was one to which he wished to see an end put by France; and that he was sure the Plenipotentiaries of Austria would participate in the same desire. He spoke likewise of the affairs of Naples, and regretted the misgovernment of that fair portion of Italy. Count Walewski was followed by Lord Clarendon, in whose declarations we must take a still deeper interest, as he was the representative of Her Majesty at the Conferences. He stated that it was most desirable that the foreign troops should be removed from Rome and the Roman States.

“For the well-being of the Pontifical States,” he added, “as also for the interests of the sovereign authority of the Pope, it would therefore, in his opinion, be advantageous to recommend the secularisation of the Government and the organisation of an administrative system in harmony with the spirit of the age, and having for its object the happiness of the people.”

He stated further—

“That for the last eight years Bologna has been in a state of siege, and that the rural districts are harassed by brigands. It may be hoped, he thinks, that by establishing in this part of the Roman States an administrative and judicial system, at once secular and distinct, and that by organising there a national armed force, security and confidence would rapidly be restored.”

With respect to the Neapolitan Government he spoke in severer terms:—

“He is of opinion that it must doubtless be admitted in principle that no Government has the right to interfere in the internal affairs of other States, but he considers there are cases in which the exception to this rule becomes equally a right and a duty. The Neapolitan Government seems to him to have conferred this right, and to have imposed this duty upon Europe; and, as the Governments represented in the Congress are all equally desirous to support the monarchical principle and to repel revolution, it is a duty to lift up the voice against a system which keeps up revolutionary ferment among the masses, instead of seeking to moderate it.”

He added—and these are supposed to be the very words actually used by Lord Clarendon—

“We do not wish,” he says, “that peace should be disturbed, and there is no peace without justice; we ought, then, to make known to the King of Naples the wish of the Congress for the amelioration of his system of Government—a wish which cannot remain without effect—and require of him an amnesty in favour of the persons who have been condemned or who are imprisoned without trial for political offences.”

Now, these are very remarkable words, as showing the intentions which were entertained on the part of Her Majesty’s Government. They were followed by opinions given by other representatives. Count Buol, on the part of Austria, said something with regard to maritime law, and expressed a very earnest wish to curb the licence of the press in every country where the press is free; but with regard to Italy, and the occupation of certain of the Italian States by Austrian troops, he declined to say a word, declaring that he had no instructions to express any opinion upon the point. Count Cavour afterwards expressed very strongly the wish of his Government that the Austrian troops should be removed from the Legations, and he stated especially that the occupation of Parma and the city of Placentia by Austrian troops was menacing to the independence of Sardinia. He made also a distinction between the occupation by Austria of those countries and the occupation by France of Rome, stating that a separate and small corps occupying Rome at a distance from its own country was an object of much less apprehension and fear, and caused much less anxiety to the King of Sardinia, than the very large army which was maintained by Austria for the purpose of occupying a great portion of Italy and of overawing the whole territory. That there is that distinction between the occupation by Austria and the occupation by France I think cannot be denied. There are, however, other differences which may likewise be remarked on. The occupation of Rome by a small body of French soldiers may be represented as similar to an occupation which the British Government has frequently sanctioned—namely, an occupation solely for the protection of the person of the Sovereign. It must likewise be admitted that there was some truth in what was stated in a former debate by the hon. Member for Dundalk (Mr. Bowyer)—that Rome was a place to which adventurers from all parts of Italy would be apt to resort, and that the Government of the Pope might be endangered, therefore, not by the spontaneous efforts of the people of Rome, but by the intrigues and conspiracies of strangers who might resort in any numbers to that city. But, Sir, whatever those distinctions may be, it is, I think, a matter of very great importance to consider whether this occupation by foreign troops of a part of Italy is to continue. In the first place, I imagine that there is no instance resembling it in the recent history of Europe. The occupation of a State by foreign troops for the purpose of restoring order is a very modern practice, and in every case it has been stated to be temporary—it has been represented as being instituted for the purpose of re-establishing the usual relations between the Sovereign and his subjects, and when that object has been accomplished the foreign troops have been withdrawn. I can recollect no instance of an occupation which has been prolonged for the length of time that the occupation of Rome and of the Legations has been continued. After the war of 1815—a war which raised all Europe to arms—when a million of troops were put in Motion in order to depose Napoleon from the throne of France, and when £150,000,000 was spent by this country alone in one year, it was considered sufficient, in the first place, that an occupation of France of five years should be stipulated for, and that term was afterwards reduced to three years, when France was governed by her own King, and it was found that he could rely upon the support of his own subjects. The occupation of Spain by France, when the Duc d'Angoulême marched there, was, I think, continued for barely three years. That occupation, however, provoked comment in this House. The very year after it took place, in 1824, I myself called the attention of the House to the subject, and Mr. Canning declared that he was convinced that no permanent occupation was intended. In the following year, at the end of the Session, Mr. Canning's attention was called to the subject by Lord Brougham, and Mr. Canning again declared that the occupation would not be long prolonged. But in this case we have an occupation which began in the year

1849, which has continued to the present moment; and yet we do not hear on any part that the troops could be withdrawn without as much danger and discontent now as, it is said, existed at the very commencement of that occupation. I am not going to argue to-night—because my question will chiefly be confined to the point of foreign occupation—whether the Government of Rome be a good Government or a bad one; but this I say, that if it be a good one there can be no need of foreign troops. If, on the contrary, it be a bad Government, and that bad Government have been continued for seven years without amendment, then, I ask, what prospect is there that in seven or fourteen years hence that Government will be improved? Sir, it is necessary in treating this subject to look at the declarations which were made by the two Powers who sent their troops to Rome and to the Legations in the year 1849. The House will then see how different were the declarations made at that time from those which are now made, and how little they justify the present occupation. Beginning with the French, I take, first, part of a despatch to M. De la Cour, who was then the French Minister at Vienna, and I find that M. Drouyn de Lhuys the Minister of Foreign Affairs, writing on the 17th of April, 1849, says—

“The Government of the Republic has resolved to send to Civita Vecchia a body of troops, commanded by General Oudinot. Our intention in deciding on this measure has been neither to impose on the Roman people a system of administration which their free will would have rejected, nor to constrain the Pope to adopt, when he shall be recalled to the exercise of his power, this or that system of government. We thought—we more than ever think—that by the force of events—by the effect of the natural disposition of men's minds—the system of administration which the revolution of last November has established at Rome is destined soon to fall, and that the Roman people will place themselves again under the authority of the Sovereign Pontiff, provided they are secured against the dangers of a reaction; but we, nevertheless, think, and in this respect, especially, our language has never varied, that that authority will not take deep root, and can only strengthen itself against fresh storms by the help of institutions which may prevent the return of old abuses, the reform of which Pius IX. had with such generous zeal begun.”

Then, the Declaration to the Pope, dated April 18th, says—

“The Pope must hasten to publish a manifesto, which, by guaranteeing to the people liberal institutions, in conformity with their wishes, as well as with the necessities of the times, shall cause the overthrow of all resistance.”

What we desire is, that the Pope, on returning to Rome, shall find himself in a position which, at once satisfactory for himself and for his people, shall secure Italy and Europe from new commotions, and shall not prejudice either the balance of power or the independence of the Italian States."

In transmitting those documents to the Court of St. James's, the French Minister says, under date the 19th of April—

"We doubt not that the British Government will duly appreciate a determination, the object of which is at once to maintain, as far as shall depend on us, the balance of power, to guarantee the independence of the Italian States, to secure to the Roman people a liberal and regular system of administration, and to preserve them from the dangers of a blind reaction, as well as from the frenzy of anarchy."

This took place on the 18th and 19th of April. On the 29th of April, Prince Schwarzenberg writes to Count Colloredo, in the following terms:—

"The Government of the Emperor has sent orders to Marshal Count Radetzky to send troops as well into Tuscany as into the Legations. In deciding upon this measure we have only complied with the demand which has been addressed to us to this effect on the part of the Grand Duke of Tuscany, as well as on the part of the Holy Father, the latter having at the same time applied for the armed intervention of France, Spain, and Naples. The object of our intervention is no other than the re-establishment of legitimate Governments and social order. Whenever this object shall have been attained—and thanks to the co-operation of the sound portion of the population we hope it will soon be so—our troops will retire."

That, be it observed, was seven years ago. Now, it is impossible, I think, to allow that the re-establishment of social order and the restoration of the Sovereign to his power can have occupied the whole of those seven years, unless there were something so vicious in the system of administration—something so much requiring the reforms which Lord Clarendon has pointed out—that the Sovereigns thought it necessary to maintain the troops in the foreign territory which they occupy. And here there is one observation which I cannot help making, because I think it tends to show that even that occupation for a time was hardly necessary. Among the other States which were led by the great convulsions of 1848 to dispute the authority of their Sovereign and to proclaim a different form of Government was Tuscany; but in Tuscany the new form of Government lasted only two months—during February and March. In April the people of Florence, mindful of a long course of mild government, and recollecting the wise maxims and beneficent rule of Leopold, the grandfather of the present Grand Duke of Tuscany, rose against their republican rulers, and restored the monarchical Government of the Grand Duke. Every great town in Tuscany, except Leghorn, acted upon that example; men of the most liberal character—the men most trusted in Florence—were placed at the head of affairs, and the Grand Duke came back. If he had governed according to the constitution to which he himself had agreed, there seems to be no reason to believe that there would have been any outbreak or any disturbance of his Government. Unfortunately, however, no sooner had the commissaries of the Grand Duke taken possession of the helm of affairs at Florence than an Austrian general announced that his corps was ordered into Tuscany. That corps remained there until the beginning of last year; and since it marched out there has been no disturbance. I cannot but believe that if the rulers of Italy, not giving in at all to democratic ideas, nor going beyond the most moderate constitutional government, had governed their States with equity and justice, all pretence for this foreign occupation would have ceased, even if it had ever arisen. Be it observed that the excuse of its being necessary in order to support the Government, because the Government causes discontent and disaffection, gains strength from every instance of exercise of unjust and unlawful powers. Take the case of Bologna. The city of Bologna has been in a state of siege for the last eight years. If the Papal Government were to demand that the heads of 100 families in that city should be arrested and sent to a dungeon; there would beyond doubt arise great discontent and disaffection; and then, because there was discontent and disaffection, the foreign Government and the Papal Government would say that it was impossible to relieve this city from the presence of foreign troops, and that the occupation must be continued. It is an evil, therefore, which propagates itself. It is an evil which gains strength from the very indulgence of it. But are there no reasons even stronger than these general considerations of this state of things being abnormal, of there being no precedent for such an occupation, and of the discontent which it creates being so great—are there no other considerations which may have induced Her Majesty's Government, at the Conference of Paria, to pronounce themselves in so decided a manner, which should still lead them to carry into effect the views which they there expressed? This House will well remember that at the time when we were carrying on the struggle in the Crimea—when the troops of Great Britain and France were besieging Sebastopol and were suffering every sort of privation, the Powers of Europe generally stood aloof from that struggle, which we had proclaimed—and I believe justly proclaimed—to be a struggle for European interests. At that time there was one State—a small State, but with an heroic people and an heroic Sovereign—which came forward to join us—to add its troops to ours, and to send to the Crimea a part of its small army in order to share in the dangers and glories of our armies—to stand side by side on the banks of the Tchernaya and before the walls of Sebastopol with those gallant men whose reception in this metropolis a few days ago roused every heart and filled every breast with emotions of gratitude and pride. That noble army, by the command of their Sovereign, with the full assent of their Chambers, became most willing associates of our hardships, and partook of our glory and of our honour. It would be too much to say, too much to suppose, that the Government of Sardinia would have added their forces to ours in that struggle from no other motive but regard to the general interests of Europe. Sardinia had suffered much in its contest with Austria, whose strength had overpowered her in a war of very recent date,—its finances had been greatly burdened, and its taxes had been enormously increased. A Sardinian Minister standing before the Parliament to ask them to enter into this war with Russia—a distant Power, whose advances against Turkey, however menacing to Europe in general, did not bear on the face of them any immediate peril to Sardinia—would have had great difficulty in obtaining an assent to his proposal had the Chambers thought of nothing but the dangers of Europe. There appeared, however, to be a general impression on the part of the Sardinian Government—and from all that I can hear a very justifiable impression—that if they joined us in that war their position in Italy—one of continual sacrifice and of very considerable danger—would be very much ameliorated by the acquisition of the friendship of two great Powers like France and England. I shall not be told, I hope—at least, not by Her Majesty's Government—that there are no words in the treaty, no specific article, binding us to take into consideration the state of Italy. The Piedmontese believe, and I hope they believe rightly, that, although we may not be bound by the letter of the treaty, yet that its whole spirit would give them as much right to expect this consideration at our hands and at the hands of France as if the determination to consider the state of Italy had been specifically inserted in the treaty. It is, therefore, I think, so far as Sardinia is concerned, a question of honour with this country and with France, not to abandon the affairs of Italy. I believe such an abandonment would be fatal, if not in name, yet in reality, to the independence of Piedmont. The course of affairs would be probably this. The Austrian Government, if they were aware that this country and France did not mean to interfere—that we were content with the barren aid of protocols and notes—would increase their troops from one end of the frontier of Piedmont to the other, and would on every side have legions pressing on the independence of that country. Piedmont would be obliged—she is even now obliged—to keep up an army larger than her size and resources would naturally justify. Discontents would arise thereupon. There would be in the Piedmontese Parliament—perhaps in the very next Session—complaints of the Government which had imposed such burdens upon the country, and had sent its army to such a distance without bringing back anything but hostility on the part of Austria and indifference and disregard on the part of the Allies with whom they had fought. It would be said—and very likely successfully said—that, if this was to be the result, it would be better for Sardinia to diminish her army, to yield to any demands which Austria might make for the suppression of a free press and the limitation of the right of free speaking in the tribune; thus, to regain the good-will of Austria, and to sink to that wholly dependent condition which existed for some twenty-five years after the peace of 1815. If such were the arguments used, and if that wise statesman and sincere patriot, Count Cavour, should be compelled to yield to the storm, and be driven from power because England and France had failed in their implied engagements—if he were to be driven from office amid the despair of Italy and the reproaches of those who looked to us and to France for assistance—should we not feel humiliated by the reflection that we had asked for the assistance of Sardinia in the late struggle, that we had ever appeared at the Conferences of Paris to say a word on behalf of the Italians? There are other considerations besides this which immediately affect our honour and our justice. I cannot but think that if France and England, holding the position they do in Europe, should go to a Conference of European Powers, and declare that the Roman States are misgoverned, and point out a way in which that misgovernment can be remedied—that if they should denounce the King of the Two Sicilies as a monarch whose rule was so intolerable that even that general international law which forbids others to interfere in the internal affairs of foreign nations, must be suspended against him—that we should do these things, and yet in the end should allow the Austrian Government to treat us with haughty disdain, the Pope with positive denial, and the King of Naples with taunts and defiance—I say two such great Powers would be humbled to the dust by receiving such answers as these. I am now putting the case that it was wise and right to go to the Conference of Paris with these statements—that it was wise to make this treaty with the King of Sardinia—I was myself an earnest advocate for that treaty. Say, if the House chooses to say, that the whole of this policy has been wrong—that Her Majesty's Government, and those who support such a policy, have advised a rash and undue interference in the affairs of Italy—that I can well understand. Go back, then, in your policy, and assume a totally different attitude. But what I cannot understand is, that you should maintain the same opinions, that you should retain the same sentiments, and yet that you should not proceed to execute that which you said it was necessary to do for the security of Europe and the well-being of Italy. Sir, these are questions, and questions of great difficulty, which would arise in the pursuit of the policy upon which we have set out; but recollect that the Government of this country but a short time ago—a Government to which I had the honour to belong—the very pacific Government of Lord Aberdeen—sent a fleet to Constantinople, and ordered it to take the command of the Black Sea—a sea at that time very much unknown to us—and also despatched an expedition to attack a fortress upon its shores. Is any such effort necessary to accomplish our present object? Nothing of the sort. I cannot for a moment think that if Great Britain and France declared that they could no longer permit the Austrian occupation of the Italian States, that occupation would be continued. I do not believe that such a declaration would lead to the slightest danger of war. Italy is accessible at all points. Great Britain and France, with the goodwill and hearty concurrence of the whole Italian people, would surely be more than a match for any force that the Emperor of Austria could bring against them. Well, then, you may depend upon it that the Austrian Government would yield at once to such a determination. And, be it observed, that what I am now speaking of is not an interference in the internal concerns of foreign nations. I will say a few words upon that question hereafter. What I am now speaking of is a declaration to Austria that she shall no longer interfere. I do not propose that there should, with regard to the Roman States, be any authoritative interference for the secularisation of the Government, or for effecting any of those improvements of which Lord Clarendon spoke. I am quite satisfied to leave that question to the Roman people. Let the people of the Roman States be freed from this incubus of foreign occupation, and let them settle with their rulers what shall in future be the form of Government. If they, as Milton says that "nations grown corrupt" are apt to do, prefer "bondage with ease to strenuous liberty," let them have their preference. Far be it from us to order them to be free, or to command them to enjoy any of the liberties of which we are ourselves so proud. But do not let a foreign force interfere. Let not a man who prefers not to be sent to a dungeon because he wears a particular sort of hat, or has been suspected by some worthless and villanous spy, who gains his livelihood by the betrayal of the upright and good—let not a man who has such a preference, and feels that his fellow-countrymen likewise entertain it, be met by foreign troops, and forced to submit to the misgovernment which he detests. With regard to Naples the case is different. Lord Clarendon has stated that there the circumstances are so grave that even internal interference may be justified. What may be the intentions of the Government I know not, nor is it for me to say whether the case is really so strong as to justify this interference. If it is, I should much doubt the efficiency of any new laws or the permanency of any constitution granted under such pressure. If it merely means that those virtuous and good men who have been pining in dungeons for years, because they had the audacity to devise for their country something better than its former misgovernment, should be released, I can well understand that some interference may be justified. What I want to lay stress upon now is, that we ought not to allow this foreign occupation to be continued. There is, however, one part of this subject of which we must not lose sight, because it somewhat concerns the character of this country. In the year 1812, we were the patrons of every people in Europe who rose against what was then the foreign occupation of the French army. That army, extending from Florence to Hamburg, excited everywhere a strong feeling of repugnance to foreign domination and a strong wish for independence. We favoured that wish. In Sicily especially—Sicily, which it was the last object and concern of the public life of Mr. Fox to preserve for the House of Bourbon—in Sicily we aided to establish a free constitution, and, by means of that constitution, as Lord William Bentinck stated in this House, everything gained a new aspect; the country which had been miserably weak became strong, troops and militia were forthcoming, and the commander in chief in Sicily was enabled to send 6,000 British troops to Spain, to aid in the contest there. The people enjoyed an unwonted degree of prosperity and liberty—liberty unwonted in modern times, but not discordant with their ancient constitution. In 1814, the British troops left Sicily; and in that or the following year it was stated, on the part of the British Government, that although we did not pretend to say that there should be no changes in the constitution, yet that the Prince Regent would think himself justified in interfering if either those persons who had appealed to British protection during our stay in the island should be molested, or the prosperity and liberty of Sicily should be materially altered for the worse. The Sicilian Minister, in vaguer terms, leaving out especially the word "liberty," accepted that declaration, and engaged the honour of his Government to its performance. In 1815, the General Treaty of Peace was concluded at Vienna; but on the 12th or 18th of June, in the same year, the King of the Two Sicilies signed a treaty with the Emperor of Austria, by which he engaged that no government should be permitted in Naples or Sicily which was not in conformity with that of the Austrian empire. The Sicilians were of course treated with bad faith. They complained that England had deserted them; and, without entering into the policy of those days, it is sufficient to say that Lord Castlereagh was disposed, as was declared by some one to be the policy of the time, to trust rather to sovereigns with large armies at their command than to popular efforts or popular sympathies. A few years ago another effort was made by Sicily. At the request of the King, Lord Minto went over from Naples with terms which, after long discussion, it was thought might at once assure the privileges of the Sicilians and maintain the union between Naples and Sicily. But, before he could make his communication to the leaders of the Sicilian Parliament, the Neapolitan Government, under the direction of the King, had circulated through the island intelligence of these terms, and had provoked so much opposition and resistance that it was found impossible to obtain assent to them. Another effort was made, having for its object to raise the Duke of Genoa to the throne of Sicily. We, for our parts, should have been happy if that effort had succeeded; but we did not think ourselves entitled to interfere between the King of Naples and his Sicilian subjects, and, in a manner, to divide the kingdom of Sicily from that of Naples. It must be admitted that in that instance, and likewise in another part of Italy, our conduct has to a certain degree excited the suspicion and the anger of the Italians. Lord William Bentinck—than whom no juster or more sincere man ever stood forth, either in command of an army or as a Member of this House—when he went to the coast of Italy, promised aid to the people of Lombardy. That promise likewise was not carried into effect. Some of these are certainly old reminiscences—some of them are connected with the period when, the whole of Europe being convulsed, it was desirable to obtain, if possible, the blessings of order and tranquillity even at a great sacrifice. But at the present time, after standing forward at the Conferences of Paris—after making large professions and exciting great expectations—after inducing the Italians to think that a great effort was about to be made in their favour, if we confine ourselves to notes and paper protestations, I am afraid that we shall altogether lose the confidence of the inhabitants of that peninsula; that 25,000,000 of people, who well deserve good government, will have occasion to rue the day when Great Britain ever interfered in their affairs. Seeing, then, that, while Austria is taking fresh precautions and sending an increased military force into Italy, the Roman Government is more severe than ever in its system of repression and suspicion, I think it incumbent upon us, in concert with the Emperor of the French, to consider what further we can do to remove these evils. Upon that which does not properly belong to me, but devolves more legitimately on the Executive, I wish to offer a few words. I may be asked, "How is it possible to carry your views into effect? True, we have made these declarations, but how can we act in accordance with them?" I say, in the first place, that you are bound at whatever risk to support the King of Sardinia. I do not think you can possibly allow his independence to be assailed or his means of free government to be taken away from him without declaring that we are ready at any sacrifice to uphold the cause of one who has so nobly stood by us. In the next place, there is something more that we can do. Among some of the Sovereigns of Italy, there is a growing feeling that dependence on foreign bayonets is not a proper position for a ruler—that a King who enjoys the love of his people stands higher, is more respected in the world, and more respects himself, than one who sends for foreign generals and has his subjects brought before a court-martial and shot for disobedience of the orders of those foreign generals. Wherever we find this feeling springing up we ought, I think, to encourage it. There is another point on which I dare say my hon. Friend the Member for Perth (Mr. Kinnaird) is better informed than I am. It is stated that that spirit of persecution which revolted the people of England in the case of the Madiai, and also prompted the King of Prussia, out of regard to the reformed faith, to interfere with the Grand Duke of Tuscany, has lately received a check; and that, in the last instance in which an attempt was made to convict a person for endeavouring to proselytize from the Roman Catholic religion to the Protestant the prosecution has failed, and the verdict of the tribunal before which it was brought will not be interfered with by the Government. If this be so, it is a very welcome symptom not only of approbation of liberty of conscience, but of a rising spirit of independence. We are further told that the haughty and insolent manner in which the Austrian troops have treated the independent Sovereign of Parma has excited resistance and disgust in that State. I trust that this may be the case; and wherever it is so, I think the influence of the British Government should be exercised to confirm those growing feelings and to nourish this rising spirit of independence. I remember, Sir—it is now very long ago—having the honour of an interview in the Isle of Elba with the first Napoleon. The Emperor talked much of the States of Italy, and agreed in the observation which I had made that there was no union among them, and no likelihood of any effectual resistance by them to their oppressors; but when I asked him why Austria was so unpopular in Italy he replied that it was because she governed, not with the sword (that was a reflection which that great man was not likely to make), but that she had no other means of governing except by the "stick." I believe, Sir, that that is the secret of the whole disfavour with which Austria is viewed in Italy. Taking this to be the fact, I say that you have a means ready to your hands for rousing the feelings of the Italian people, and that if we and the Emperor of the French once declare that we shall not allow the States of the Pope to be occupied by Austria beyond a certain fixed date—if we fix a certain date, beyond which we will not allow that occupation to be continued—the attainment of their evacuation will be a matter of comparative ease. One thing, indeed, I have heard, and it is a mere whisper—a surmise—namely, that the Government of the Emperor of the French, which agreed with us so much at Paris that its Minister for Foreign Affairs took the initiative, is not prepared at present to protest any further against the foreign occupation of Italy. I, for one, Sir, cannot believe—I think it is impossible to believe—that a Sovereign who was so faithful an ally to this country—who during the late war proved himself so ready to aid us, and to act in every way as became a Monarch true to his engagements, would ever lead the King of Sardinia to rely on his support, and then allow that hope to be disappointed. The matter to which I allude may be one of some time—it may require the adaptation of various means to the end in view. It is for Her Majesty's Government to carry on communications for the attainment of this end. They have the time before them in which to do so; but this I will say—I cannot but think that, if having done and having proclaimed so much we are contented with the refusal of all that we propose—if we sit down quietly without obtaining any improvement in the condition of Italy, it will be to us a ground of everlasting reproach. I trust, therefore, that in the course of the autumn, or at least before the next meeting of Parliament, the object which Lord Clarendon had in view at Paris will be effected. I know that no greater object can be aimed at by a statesman. When Lord Byron was in Italy in 1821, and had become enthusiastic in her cause, he said that the cause of Italian freedom was “the very poetry of politics.” I believe it is “the poetry of politics;” but I believe, at the same time, that it is also a practical question. I am sure it is one on which our character and credit depend. I express no want of confidence in Her Majesty's Ministers, but I do think that, before Parliament separates, this House ought to have from the Government some declaration of the one kind or the other—either that they are not prepared to carry any further their interference in the affairs of Italy, or that, using whatever means they deem best, adopting whatever measures they think most adequate to the occasion—they do mean to attain this end—the independence of the Italian States.

Motion made, and Question—

“That an humble Address be presented to Her Majesty, that She will be graciously pleased to give directions that there be laid before this House, Copies or Extracts of any recent Communications which have taken place between Her Majesty's Government and the Governments of Austria, Rome, and the Kingdom of the Two Sicilies, relating to the affairs of Italy.”

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON: Sir, I think the House will not be surprised that my noble Friend, who has taken so great an interest in so many important transactions of history, should have deemed it his duty, before the present Session closes, to draw the attention of this House, and, through this House, the attention of the country to the interesting matters which he has just brought under our consideration. It is impossible to overstate the importance of these subjects in the present condition of the world. We have just seen the termination of perhaps one of the greatest, although certainly one of the shortest, wars in which this country was ever engaged—a war which involved interests of the highest magnitude, and which, if had continued, might, under certain circumstances, have extended itself over a large portion of the surface of Europe. That contest has happily been concluded, and the questions which provoked it and threatened in their consequences to bring great calamities upon the world have been settled in a manner, which, I trust, will ward off for a long time to come those dangers which Europe recently had cause to apprehend. When the representatives of the great Powers assembled in Conference at Paris to discuss and determine the conditions of peace, it was natural they should not separate without directing their attention to other matters of European interests besides those which were the immediate objects of consideration. My noble Friend has, I think, assigned ample reasons why that course ought to have been pursued. It would indeed have been a reproach to the Plenipotentiaries of the great Powers if, when they had met to accomplish the great purpose of a European pacification, they had shut their eyes to circumstances which might bring about further complications as menacing, perhaps, to the tranquillity of Europe as those to which it had been their gratifying duty to put an end. Well, Sir, the affairs of Italy naturally attracted attention. My noble Friend has well remarked that the occupation of independent States by foreign troops is a departure from the ordinary and proper condition of things, only to be justified by immediate and pressing necessity, which ought not to be continued beyond the existence of that necessity, and for the unnecessary continuance of which, without sufficient reason, those under whose authority such occupation takes place incur serious responsibility. The occupation, therefore, of the Roman States by foreign troops naturally attracted the attention of the representatives at the Congress, and no member of that Congress was better fitted to draw the attention of his colleagues, and, through them, the attention of the Governments of Europe, to the subject than the representative of the Emperor of the French, who was partly concerned in the continuance of that occupation. Most honourable it was, I think, to the Emperor of the French, that he should have taken that opportunity, through his representative in the Congress, of expressing a desire that the occupation should cease, providing that the assent of Austria should be obtained to the cessation of such a state of things. My noble Friend has stated that this discussion did not lead to a satisfactory result. The representative of Austria could hold out no expectation that his Government would take any step in that direction; he professed himself to be without instructions on the subject. My noble Friend wishes to know, with regard to that matter, as well as to others, what are the intentions of Her Majesty's Government?—whether we mean to let the subject drop altogether, or, if we think it our duty to continue to urge it, what steps it is our intention to take? I think that my noble Friend and the House must feel that when Her Majesty's Government, in conjunction with the Government of the Emperor of the French, have made themselves parties to a public and official representation, with a view of inducing the cessation of that abnormal occupation, it is not a momentary repulse, and it is not the casual disappointment of an expectation that reason would prevail over prejudice, that will induce the Governments of two great countries to desist from endeavouring to accomplish a result which they think right in principle, sound in policy, and conducive to the interests of Europe. I am sure my noble Friend, above all men, must feel that it would be unbecoming for me to state what steps Her Majesty's Government may deem it right to take, but I have no hesitation in saying that we think the object one of great and general importance, and that we do not abandon the hope that that object may ultimately be accomplished. It is said, on the one hand, that if the occupation were to cease, revolts, revolutions, and scenes of the most disastrous descriptions would occur in the Roman States. It is, of course, impossible, as it would be unbecoming, for those who are mere spectators at a distance to pronounce an opinion on the value of such assertions; but, reasoning upon general principles, I think it is impossible to believe that these anticipations of evil are not exaggerated. One cannot bring one's self to think that a Government like that of the Pope—at the head of which is a man of whose benevolent intentions and enlightened ideas the past has given us sufficient proof—will not be able so to conduct the administration of affairs as to remove the causes of violent discontent which alone produce convulsions in nations.

Viscount Palmerston

I will not go back to the advice which was given to the Pope in 1831 by the representatives unanimously speaking on behalf of the five great Powers of Europe; but I will observe that no later than 1849, when the Pope returned to his dominions, he issued what is technically called a motu proprio, in which he announced his intention of establishing institutions—not indeed on the system of representative government—but still, institutions based upon popular election; and I believe if that scheme had been carried into full effect it would have afforded such contentment to his subjects that the interference of foreign troops would have been rendered wholly unnecessary. That motu proprio professed to establish municipal councils founded upon election, with a franchise of the most extended description. These municipal councils were to elect members to form provincial councils; and those provincial councils again were to elect members to form what was called a Council of State in Rome. There was also to be a Council of Finance in the capital, to regulate and advise upon the financial arrangements of the State. I cannot help thinking that if the Pope were advised by those whose counsels he follows to put in force even the limited arrangements of that motu proprio such security would be afforded for the tranquillity of his dominions that the continuance of any foreign force in his dominions would no longer be necessary; but upon that point I can only say what I have already stated to my noble Friend, that Her Majesty's Government think that the cessation of that foreign occupation, and the prevention of any future foreign occupation in Italy by troops of other States are objects of great European interest, and which it becomes the Government of this country and of France, if possible, to accomplish. With regard to the affairs of Naples, I am sorry to say that the friendly representations which have been made by the Government of France and of this country to the King of Naples, as to the condition of his kingdom, have not hitherto been attended with any successful result. My noble Friend has expressed an opinion that, although it is a departure from general principles for foreign Governments to interfere, even by tendering advice, with respect to the internal affairs of other States, there are in the condition of the kingdom of Naples sufficient grounds for a departure from the general rule. The grounds upon which that exception rests must be evident, I think, to the mind of any one who casts a glance over the map of Europe, and who views retrospectively the affairs of Europe. Why, Sir, if the severity and the injustice of the administration of the kingdom of Naples led to such outbreaks and resistances as have occurred elsewhere under similar circumstances, and if the King of Naples found himself unable by means of his own troops to restore his authority, it is obvious that he would apply to Austria for assistance. Would the rest of Europe stand passive spectators of such additional interference on the part of Austria? If they were not to do so, would not the peace of Europe be endangered by the complications and difficulties which such a state of things must create, and which must seriously affect the interests of other continental countries? Is not that consideration, therefore, a justification of friendly endeavours on the part of the English and French Governments to induce the King of Naples to prevent, by his own means, the occurrence of events which would to so great a degree complicate and embarrass the interests of other European Powers? I have said, that hitherto no success has attended the friendly representations which have been made to the King of Naples. The King of Naples, probably, or those who advise him—the Government of Naples—may have looked with jealousy and suspicion upon advice tendered by England and France alone; but we do not despair that advice of the same kind may reach the Neapolitan Government from other quarters, whence they will receive it, perhaps, with more confidence. There is, I think, no reason to despair, that if such additional representations were to reach the Neapolitan Government, they might produce an effect which the counsels of England and of France have hitherto failed in accomplishing. One of the misfortunes arising from the language of calumny and vituperation which has been applied to England and France—and particularly to England, which has been denounced as the protector of revolutionists, as the fermenter of disorder, as a Power which desires to overturn and subvert institutions wherever its influence extends—I say it has been one of the misfortunes arising out of these calumnies that they have tended to prevent the good, sound, and useful advice which the British Government may, from time to time, think itself authorised to tender to foreign Governments from producing the fruit which might otherwise have been anticipated. I say, therefore, that I do not despair that the evils which still exist in the kingdom of the Two Sicilies may, by the interference of those in whom the King of Naples and his councillors repose more confidence than they place in the Governments of England and France, produce better results than we have hitherto been able to accomplish. With regard to Naples, then, as with regard to Rome, we do not despair. We see a state of things existing which we think threatening to the interests of Europe, but I do not mean to say that the British Government have given up all hopes that it may succeed in producing an improvement in that condition; but, with regard to that point, as to others, my noble Friend must excuse me if I do not follow him into details. On one point I have no hesitation in giving a full assent to the views of my noble Friend. He has said that the fact of the King of Sardinia having so nobly and gallantly associated himself with France and England in the war which has just been brought to a close has given him a right, a moral right, to the support and protection of those countries should any danger assail him, not brought about by provocation on his own part. I think he is too well advised to give such provocation; and, therefore, if ever he should be in circumstances of danger, I agree with my noble Friend, that the Governments of England and France would be bound by every tie of honour, as representing these two great nations, to assist him to the utmost of their power. I am satisfied, however, that the knowledge of such ties existing between Sardinia and England and France will of itself be sufficient to prevent Sardinia, if not from being threatened—and I believe it will never be more than threatened—at least from being assailed with such dangers as will render it necessary for us to interpose in order to repel them. My noble Friend has said, that it would be desirable to encourage those Sovereigns of Italy whose territories are either free, like those of the Grand Duke of Tuscany, or occupied, like those of Parma, and who wish either to retain or regain their independence; and that it would be the duty of settled Governments, like those of England and France, who object in general to these occupations—to encourage those Sovereigns in maintaining their independence. It is true, Italy is removed by distance from this country ; but it is also true—and the history of Europe is full of examples of the fact—that it is not possible for great commotions to take place in Italy, and opposing armies to meet there without the evil spreading far beyond the limits of that peninsula and embroiling other nations in the conflict. Therefore, I agree with my noble Friend in thinking that every wise and enlightened Government of this country would think that the affairs of Italy required its constant and urgent attention, and that the interests of England, as connected with the general interests of Europe, must be best consulted by securing to the several States that independence within their own limits, which is the best security for the good understanding of their respective Governments and the people, and for establishing that state of things which is best calculated to make those fertile countries prosperous as they ought to be, and to prevent them becoming the source of danger and calamity to Europe. My noble Friend has moved for the production of papers, but he has stated that he was willing to accept the assurance of the Government, that in the present state of things the production of those papers would not be conducive to the interests of the public service. I am bound in duty, then, to tell him that their production in the present state of the correspondence would not be conducive to the interests he has so much at heart, and that I cannot therefore assent to his Motion. The papers he asks for relate to a correspondence still going on, and their publication at the present moment might prevent the attainment of the end for which it has been commenced. I can only say that, concurring with my noble Friend in the general views he has so well developed, but reserving to the Government the discretion of pursuing their functions in the manner which they think best calculated to accomplish the purpose he aims at, without any unnecessary departure from those general principles that ought to regulate the intercourse of nations, I hope my noble Friend will be satisfied with the statement I have made, and not press for the production of these papers. And let my noble Friend rest assured that Her Majesty's Government are occupied steadily in promoting the objects he has in view, and that we concur with him in the propriety of making every effort to secure to the Governments of Italy that free action in their internal affairs which is best calculated to promote the prosperity of Italy, and which alone can secure that country from becoming a source of danger to the rest of Europe.

MR. DISRAELI: The noble Lord the Member for London has this evening called our attention to a subject of the greatest interest and importance. Of Italy it may be said that it must either be considered in a theoretical or practical point of view. No doubt there is no Gentleman in this House who does not feel the greatest sympathy with Italy and the fortunes of the Italians. When we remember how much we owe to that country, that in ancient times it gave us our laws, and in modern times our arts, it is totally impossible that its condition can ever be brought before us without exciting a lively interest in the House of Commons. But that is "the poetry of politics," as the noble Lord has reminded us, and I cannot think, notwithstanding the high authority he quoted on the subject of poetry, that the House to-night will feel, on a discussion that may involve immediate consequences of the utmost importance to the people of this country, that we should indulge merely in "the poetry of politics" on the one hand, or on the other be satisfied with those vague expressions which we have just heard from the lips of the First Minister. The noble Lord the Member for the City of London compensated us for dwelling on the poetry of the question, when he, in a very business-like manner, becoming the importance of the subject, reminded us of what occurred at the recent Conference at Paris, and of the important State papers to which, at that Conference, the Plenipotentiary of England had affixed his signature. The noble Lord introduced the question to us with details which the House clearly understood, and made us feel that, by the conduct of the English Minister at Paris, this country had entered into engagements which, not only according to the version and interpretation of the noble Lord, but according to the feeling of every Gentleman present, have placed this country in a position of grave responsibility. I cannot understand from the observations of the Minister who has just sat down, that Her Majesty's Ministers have done, or intend to do, anything which could have justified those protocols or the tone which the Plenipotentiary of this country assumed on the occasion when the affairs of Italy were discussed at the Congress of Paris. If all that Her Majesty's Ministers have done or intend to do are merely these routine representations to which the noble Lord has just referred, and which he has promised, it does not appear to me that, at a Conference called to settle questions of a very different character, it was necessary, or expedient, or politic, to introduce the question of Italy as it was introduced at the Congress of Paris—to have drawn up and signed these protocols—if all that has been done, or is to be done, is, in fact, merely that diplomatic action which, as I humbly conceive, might have taken place without so much ceremony, and without having, as the noble Lord the Member for London said, roused the passions of the population of Italy. I want to know what is the deduction we are to draw from the inquiries of one Member of this House, who has been First Minister of the Crown, and from the answer of another Member of this House who is the First Minister now, on a question that is indeed truly described as one interesting and important from its peculiar and essential character, but one in the treatment of which, let me tell the House, are involved urgent, perhaps immediate, consequences to the people of this country—to the state of their industry and the state of their commerce, the questions of peace and war, and all the most vital subjects that can engage the attention of this House or the consideration of statesmen. When I listened to the first observations of the noble Lord, I thought he was about to counsel action of the most decisive and energetic character. The noble Lord said it was the duty of this country not to abandon the cause of Italy. He laid down that position with the utmost precision. Now, I could hardly suppose that the noble Lord, in declaring that it was the duty of this country not to abandon the cause of Italy, could, after all that has occurred on the subject, have confined his meaning merely to the communication of a note from a Minister to the Court of Naples or of Turin. The noble Lord, indeed, stated there were circumstances which might demand the most decided conduct on the part of this country. He said, if Austria, for example, required the suppression of the liberty of the press on the part of Piedmont, then there is no step which he should not be prepared to take on such an occasion. But, strange to say, the only formal proposition that I find in the papers upon which the noble Lord founded all his observations—the only formal proposition for repressing the liberty of the press does not emanate from the Austrian plenipotentiary, but from the representative of our great Ally the Emperor of the French, by whose aid, and whose aid alone, these magnificent visions of Italian regeneration are to be realised. Now, Sir, if I look to the papers to which the noble Lord has referred, I find language of a very precise character upon the subject of interference. The House will recollect that when the protocols of the Conferences at Paris were first laid on the table, it appeared that upon the 8th of April it was Count Walewski, the French Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, who, when the treaty had been signed for the settlement of the Eastern question, and when all those points were arranged which had given rise to the Conferences, introduced in a formal manner to the consideration of the Plenipotentiaries questions which had no immediate reference to the principal cause of their assembling. The House will recollect that, so far as the protocols would show us when they were laid on our table, the responsibility of that introduction, which many thought not very adroit, rested with the French Minister. But there were subsequent papers placed on the table of the House which threw considerable light upon this point, and proved that it was not Count Walewski who really was the cause of the subject being brought forward. It was upon the 8th of April that Count Walewski, after the settlement of the main question, said—

“It was desirable that the Plenipotentiaries, before they separated, should interchange their ideas on different subjects which required to be settled”—I beg the House will mark the words—they are important—and which it might be advantageous to take up in order to prevent fresh complications.”

Then Count Walewski went on with that remarkable exposition—fresh, I am sure, in the memory of every Gentleman who hears me—in which he showed that Greece was in what is called an “abnormal state,” that the Roman Legations were also in an “abnormal” condition, and that the affairs of Naples were, not in an “abnormal,” but in an “exceptional” state. Now, when those papers were laid on the table, many Gentlemen, while wondering at the indiscretion committed by Count Walewski, must have felt that a Minister of experience and high character could never have introduced at a Conference for the settlement of terms of peace with Russia questions of this vast importance, without having previously communicated with his Colleagues, and felt the pulse of the representatives of the different Courts. That was the conclusion which everybody must have drawn from the protocols of the Conferences; but a short time afterwards papers were laid on our table, which completely explained the cause of this conduct on the part of the French Minister, and the means by which the attention of the Congress was directed to these extraneous and extraordinary subjects. It then appeared that on the 27th of March, ten days before the exposition of Count Walewski, the Plenipotentiaries of Sardinia placed in the hands of Lord Clarendon a memorandum which, if it be anything, is an act of impeachment against Austria and Austrian rule in Italy, which proposes for the Roman States a Secular Government, the Code Napoleon, and other remedies, and which in spirit was the basis of the observations that Lord Clarendon made on the 8th of April. Therefore it is quite clear that there was an understanding among the Plenipotentiaries in Paris that at their meeting on the 8th of April all these extraneous questions, including that of Italy, were to be brought forward; that the movement came from Piedmont; and in the memorandum of the 27th of March may be found the motive spring of all that has occurred. Now, to proceed a step further—to follow this up—what are the engagements, as the noble Lord the Member for the City interprets them, what are the representations—which with the laxest interpretation of the words we might call them—of Lord Clarendon? Our Foreign Secretary agrees that the state of Greece is “abnormal;” he agrees that the condition of the Roman States also is “abnormal;” but, as regards the Neapolitan Government,

- Now, I ask the House whether that is language that could have been used, or ought to have been used, without having some foregone conclusion as to the policy of which it was to be the indication. Though I may not agree with the noble Lord the Member for the City that the language of a protocol of this character is an engagement which may bind us with the formality of a treaty, still it is impossible to read it without feeling that we have a right to expect from the First Minister of the Crown, without revealing the secrets of Cabinets or the mysteries of States, some explanation of the declarations of the English Plenipotentiary more satisfactory than those phrases with which the noble Lord has favoured us to-night, and to which I confess I am at a loss to annex any other meaning than that which I had the misfortune, years ago, to attach to the statements of the noble Lord with respect to the affairs of Italy. The noble Lord has explained to the House what is the meaning he attaches to the exceptional character of the Neapolitan Government, and why there should be a departure, in the case of Naples, from that golden rule of non-interference, to which I trust the House will adhere, or which it will never quit without the most urgent necessity. The noble Lord said the position of Naples was remarkable, because, if the Government were to conduct itself so as to give rise to any revolutionary movement in the country, the armed forces of a great military Power—Austria—were at hand, “and you may depend upon it,” added the noble Lord, “Austria would occupy Naples, thus producing a state of things that would not only endanger the peace of Europe, but might bring about calamities which it is difficult to measure or foresee.” But when the noble Lord defends himself from the charge of doing nothing to mitigate the evils which, according to him, render the state of Naples so exceptional, and which require our interference, he intimates that, though England and France may not succeed—have not succeeded—in any way in obtaining that mitigation of Neapolitan rule which he thinks so necessary, yet some other influence, not less powerful, and which will be received in a far more friendly spirit by the Neapolitan Government, may be brought into requisition with more success. The House clearly understood the noble Lord to mean the mediation of Austria. It was the action of Austria upon Naples that, according to the noble Lord, was to induce the Neapolitan Government to cease from its ill doing and to adopt that remedial course which seemed so expedient. But how extremely inconsistent is it to hold Austria up to us as the Power which, by its beneficent interference with Naples, is to put an end to the iniquitous rule which you deplore, and at the same time to say that, in the event of any revolutionary movement in Naples, Austria will occupy the kingdom in order to uphold the very misrule to mitigate which Austrian mediation, according to your own account, is now the only means to which you can resort! Sir, I cannot have much hope that the influence of Austria will be of the nature which the noble Lord supposes, if, as we are assured at the same time by the noble Lord, we have reason to anticipate and fear Austrian invasion in order to support the misgovernment which Austrian mediation is to mitigate and remove. But, Sir, in what way, viewing this question practically, are we to put an end to the occupation of Italian States by foreign Powers? The noble Lord who began the debate, confined the whole of his observations to the Austrian occupation of part of the Roman States. The noble Lord must have felt the extreme awkwardness of his position, because when he assured the House of his confidence that, with the aid of our great Ally, Austrian occupation might be terminated in the Roman States, he must have remembered that another part of the same States is occupied by the troops of that very august Ally by whose co-operation we were to put an end to the occupation of the Legations by Austria. The noble Lord touched very lightly—or, rather, did not touch at all—upon the fact, that the capital of the Roman States is occupied by French troops; though he must be aware that nothing can be more irrational than to address violent representations to Austria, in order to terminate the occupation of the Legations by Austrian troops, unless, at the same time, our Ally is prepared to take steps by which the occupation of the Roman metropolis itself by French troops shall cease. I know that this question has been settled by Count Cavour in a very ingenious manner; he insists upon it as a first condition, that Austria should quit the Legations, and that the French army should quit Rome, but should remain in the Legations until everything is settled. Now, I ask, what is the use of doing what the noble Lord has done to-night—what is the use—to employ his own language—of “rousing the passions” of the Italians, unless we have a practical object before us, and unless the opinion of Parliament can support the policy of the Minister? Never is this House justified in entering into discussions upon external policy unless we are prepared to impugn the conduct pursued by the Minister as injurious to the country; or, unless we can, by the expression of our opinion, support the Minister in a policy which will be beneficial to the country and to Europe. So far as the theoretical part of the question goes, so far as sympathy for Italy goes, so far as “the poetry of politics” is concerned—there being but one feeling in this House—I want to know, when we turn to the practical question, what the Motion of the noble Lord will do, or what anything we can say will do, to support the policy of the Ministry? Why, Sir, what is the policy of the Ministry? It is the very point which, throughout this whole discussion, has been mysteriously withheld from us. I do not expect the noble Lord to tell us the means by which the Cabinet is prepared to carry out his policy; but we ought to know from the noble Lord what are their general opinions on the subject of the occupation of Italy by foreign troops, and whether they are prepared to take steps to put an end to that occupation or not? Now, Sir, there are two modes in which we can deal with this question, and as they are both practical modes, I will, with the permission of the House, and with as much brevity as I can command, slightly advert to them. We can go to war with Austria, no doubt; we can send a fleet to the Bay of Naples or to the Bay of Genoa; in co-operation with our great Ally, we can transport a French army to some part of Italy; as we moved another French army to the Turkish dominions: we may embark in a great struggle, the object of which will be entirely to change the face of Italian life and the spirit of its Government; to emancipate—according to our views—its people, and to effect a great revolution, which may, perhaps, be accomplished after one of those long wars like the Punic war, or the thirty-years’ war, or the war of the French Revolution—after one of those struggles which always occur when such immense consequences are aimed at and attained. On that policy, Sir, I will not presume to give an opinion; because I feel that it is a subject which would require a discussion worthy of its importance in this House before we embarked on it. I will make only one remark with regard to it, and I say, if that be the policy of the Government of this country, they are bound frankly to announce it. They are bound to submit such a policy to the consideration of Parliament, and, if sanctioned and ratified by Parliament, the people of this country will, at least, have the satisfaction of knowing that they have not been drawn into a great struggle, without being aware of it, and their minds will be prepared—as the mind of a nation ought to be prepared—for so vast a stake, by those discussions in the House of their representatives which will direct their attention to the great issue before them. By this means they will be enabled to brace their energies to the occasion, and they will have no grounds for accusing the Queen's Ministers or their own representatives of having embarked in a conflict of such difficulty and duration without fair advice and warning. I think all hon. Gentlemen will agree that if that be the policy of the Ministry—that if they are prepared to go to war to emancipate Italy from Austrian rule, they are at least bound frankly to explain their policy, to appeal to Parliament, and to take the verdict of the country upon its expediency. There is another

2. practical mode by which you may proceed to attain your object. I remember that, some years ago, in 1848, at the end of the Session, later even than the present, because, I believe, it was at the end of August, it was my fate, as it has been the fate of the noble Lord to-night, to bring before the consideration of Parliament the question of interference in Italy. I have in my mind a fresh recollection of the events which took place in 1847 and 1848, and although the noble Lord may not condescend to profit by the experience of that period, I confess myself, that, when I look back to what followed, the consequences were so sad, and have been so opposed, in my opinion, to the progress of Italy, and to the amelioration of the condition of Italian society, that I tremble lest we should embark in a like enterprise again, and lest we should reap from that conduct the same bitter and desolating fruits. It is for this reason, Sir, that I have taken the liberty of entering thus early into this debate. This leads me to the second practical means by which you may attempt to emancipate—as it is termed—Italy. Sir, we may do this by rousing the passions of the Italian people. Without declaring war you may have diplomatic communications—you may have what you had in 1847—first, friendly advice, and afterwards, what are called “admonitions” to the ruling Powers; and I have not the slightest doubt, that without declaring war, and without the active co-operation of fleets and armies, you may thus set a great portion of Italy in flames, and may reap consequences which we may all have deeply to deplore. I will try for a moment to trace what would be your diplomatic action under that second system upon Naples. But before I do that, there is one observation which I cannot help impressing on the House. The state of Naples is declared by Lord Clarendon to be so exceptional as even to justify the violation of the golden rule of foreign policy—namely, non-intervention. Now, it would be very desirable to have before us, on authority, some description by the Government of what the state of Naples is. I will, for the moment, assume that all those tales which have reached us of ruthless and savage imprisonment are perfectly authentic; but, if authentic, in all probability they are in a great degree the consequence of the panic-stricken councils of a small Sovereign surrounded by conspirators, encouraged by the menace of foreign interference. I will admit all we hear to be perfectly authentic—the ruthless imprisonments, and the cruel and even sanguinary punishments. Well, but I remember that a few years ago, there were alleged against Austria the same horrible stories of the imprisonment of citizens—the flower of the North of Italy—in distant fortresses. Who has not heard of the names of men in the highest walks of literature and science who have been the inmates of Austrian dungeons? I care not now to inquire what were the particular causes which induced those imprisonments. But was it not then felt that if we entered into that question we should be entering into the internal affairs of another country, and that the principle of non-intervention in foreign countries would be much endangered? But I want to know what there is in the state of Naples, at the present moment, that did not apply to the condition of Austria at the time of which we are speaking? If the cruel imprisonment of citizens by a Sovereign is considered so exceptional a thing as to permit the violation of the cardinal principle of the policy we have adopted, why did we not violate it in the instance of Austria? Why, when we hear of those dreadful banishments to Siberia with which hon. Gentlemen are so familiar, do we not consider that an exceptional case? And what other difference is there between Naples, and Austria, and Russia than this—that Naples is a weak Power, and that Austria and Russia are very strong Powers? I would impress upon the House, therefore, that it should be very cautious upon this head. Now, let us see what will be the action of the second practical course in the case of Naples if we pursue it. We determine not to go to open war to emancipate Italy; but still the condition of Naples is so intolerable as to be an exception to the principle of our policy—so intolerable as to warrant interference, though not in a military form. Then, Sir, we have an admonition—England and France publish an admonitory note to the King of Naples, and, perhaps, an English fleet rides in the Bay of Naples. Everybody knows what the consequence of that would be. The instant that the discontented portion of the population of that kingdom find that Naples has lost the good offices of the great Western Powers, that process takes place which the noble Lord has referred to—the passions of the Italian population are roused. They will reason thus. They know well, when their own Sovereign is lectured by England and France, and an English fleet is in the offing, that if they rise, and rise successfully against their Sovereign, Austria dare not interfere. I deny the proposition of the noble Lord, that an insurrection in Naples is necessarily a prelude to an Austrian occupation. If England and France arouse the passions of the Italian population by proclamations and by lecturing the King of Naples, and if an English fleet is in the bay, Austria will not occupy Naples. The noble Lord who introduced this question seems to think that the revolutionary spirit in Italy is obsolete and worn out—that there is no contest going on in Italy but between worn-out dynasties and some intelligent and well-educated persons of the superior classes, who desire his great specific for all evils—constitutional government. I do not think that that this is a true judgment of the Italian people or of Italy. There is in Italy a power which we seldom mention in this House, but without considering and understanding which we shall never rightly comprehend the position of Italy—I mean the secret societies. The secret societies do not care for constitutional government. They do not want existing society ameliorated, they want it changed; and they seek objects from such changes such as can never be obtained or secured by those enlightened institutions to which the noble Lord refers. We know something more of these societies than we did. Since the outbreak of 1848 we have had means—not sufficient, but still we have had means of obtaining a knowledge of their numbers, organisation, principles, and objects; and without some consideration of these it would be absolutely impossible for us to form a conception of what would be the consequence of our interference in the affairs of Italy. It is useless to deny, because it is impossible to conceal, that a great part of Europe—the whole of Italy and France and a great portion of Germany, to say nothing of other countries—are covered with a network of these secret societies, just as the superficies of the earth is now being covered with railroads. And what are their objects? They do not attempt to conceal them. They do not want constitutional government; they do not want ameliorated institutions; they do not want provincial councils nor the recording of votes;—they want to change the tenure of land, to drive out the present owners of the soil, and to put an end to ecclesiastical establishments. Some of them may go further. These are men of energy and determination; and do you think that, with their complete organisation, when Austria cannot interfere to occupy the kingdom of Naples, when the King is lectured on his throne by the Western Powers, and when, as the noble Lord says, the passions of the Italian people are roused, those societies will be quiet? We know what they did before. They rose, and their energy and their organisation carried everything before them. I am told that a British Minister has boasted—and a very unwise boast it was—that he had only to hold up his hand and he could raise a revolution in Italy to-morrow. It was an indiscreet boast, but I believe it not impossible, with the means at his disposal, that he might succeed. What would happen? You would have a republic formed on extreme principles, and there may be many intelligent and well-meaning persons—I do not say in this House—who would say, “And what then?” “Nothing can be worse,” they would say, “than the present state of Italy; let us try a Red Republic, or even a republic of a still more fiery colour.” But the question of Italian politics is not of that simple character. Rome is not far distant from Naples. The passage from Naples to the States of the Church is not difficult. You may have triumvirs again established in Rome; the Pope may again be forced to flee;—and my hon. Friend behind me (Mr. Spooner) may say, “So much the better”—and not a cardinal may be left in Rome. What will be the consequences of that? You forget that the two great Catholic Powers of Europe—France, whose Emperor boasts in these very protocols of being the eldest son of the Church—that Ally with whose beneficent co-operation Italy is to be emancipated—if such a catastrophe should occur, France and Austria will pour their legions over the whole surface of the Peninsula. You will have to withdraw the British fleet; your admonitions will be thrown into the mud (as they deserve), and your efforts to free Italy from the occupation of foreign troops will terminate—as it terminated before—by rendering the thralldom a thousand times more severe, and by aggravating the miseries of the unfortunate people whose passions you have fired, and whose feelings you have this night commenced to rouse. But is that all the evil? If the movement which commenced at the Conference of Paris is to be followed up; if the protocols are to be succeeded by speeches of the noble Lord the Member for London while Parliament is sitting, and by admonition and written lectures by our foreign Minister and by our representatives abroad during the autumn, in all probability you will again have Italy in flames, you will again crush that progress which has been always going on in time of peace; and when we meet again we may find the position of the Peninsula infinitely worse than before. But do not suppose that the danger terminates here. What I have said I consider—so far as the future can be certain—to be the certain consequences of the policy which you are pursuing. What I am now going to refer to are merely possible results, but they are results of so terrible a character that it is my duty to refer to them, though I do so with reserve and some feeling of awe. The secret societies are not confined to Italy, as I have ventured to remind the House. They are at this moment more numerous, more active, and in a higher state of organisation in France than in any other State of Europe. If Italy be in flames, and if the Italian secret societies be successful, do you think that it will have no effect on the secret societies of France? They are always in a state of organisation and ready to act upon every occasion. Parliament and the country have confidence, and have justly confidence, in the character of the great prince who now rules France. He is a man of rare sagacity, he has been schooled in adversity, and he is at this moment at the head of a numerous and triumphant army devoted to him. You may therefore allow Parliament to be prorogued with little fear as to the consequences to France of the system in which you are now about to engage in Italy. But you will allow me to remind you that we all remember another great prince who sat upon the French throne, whose sagacity during his reign was also a proverb, who was never mentioned in this House but in terms of panegyric on both sides, who also had been schooled in adversity, and who was also seconded by an army which he and the princes of his House had themselves formed, which was fresh and flushed with victory, and which was led by able generals devoted to him and eager to prove their devotion by the assertion of his rights and the maintenance of his throne. But that great prince fell suddenly, and he fell solely and entirely by the action of the secret societies. That I apprehend is a fact which no man acquainted with the events of 1848 will deny. No doubt that terrible catastrophe was assisted by a great misfortune which then occurred to France. In 1847, when a Member of the British Cabinet (whose career I have commemorated in this House already) was sent to give advice and counsel to the Italian princes, there happened to be a season of unexampled want in Europe, and especially in France. At no time within the following year were the means of sustenance and of employing labour so deficient. What is the condition of France at this moment? A terrible visitation has fallen upon that country. The charity of more than one nation and the admirable measures adopted by the ruler of France to mitigate the consequences of that visitation may enable the next season to be passed without that misery which fell upon the country in 1848. But the prospect of that country, in a material point of view, is very grave, and if you commence another campaign of Liberalism—the expression of vague opinions and sympathies without being prepared to support them by acts—a policy convenient for a Minister or a public man who wishes to make a political demonstration, or to an ambitious monarch who wishes to increase his territories, but one which a wise Parliament will hesitate to sanction with its ratification—if you once embark in this scheme of raising the passions of the Italian population, as the best means of ameliorating their condition and mitigating the political evils of their country; and, if the consequences of that policy should unhappily be concurrent with a period of great agricultural distress in France, it will require all the sagacity of the prince—even though he may be most sagacious—and all the resources of his army, however numerous and however victorious, to guard against the danger; and fortunate will it be for France and for Europe if they escape the most fatal results. I have touched upon these points because I feel that this is no holiday question. We are now in the very lees of the Session, and this may probably be the last day on which there will be assembled so large a number of Members as were present when the noble Lord (Lord John Russell) rose to address the House, and commenced a course which, if not watched with vigilance and care, may involve the country in proceedings the consequences of which it is difficult to foresee. Sir, I certainly find some encouragement in the language of the First Minister. I infer from it that, notwithstanding the proud protocols of the Conferences of Paris—notwithstanding this despatch of the 27th of March from M. Cavour, which must have been delivered behind the scenes, and which in the papers appears as a speech of Lord Clarendon; notwithstanding all the pomp of the Conference and all the pride of the protocols, it appears to me that the noble Viscount has not attempted to deceive us, and that it is the calm, the well-considered, and the solid determination of Her Majesty's Ministers, as regards Italian affairs, to do nothing. I believe that the noble Viscount, profiting by the past, remembering the experience of the years 1847 and 1848, has made up his mind not again to be seduced into a position so difficult and so dangerous as that which he then encountered. This also I will say, that I have such confidence in the wisdom of the Emperor of the French that I feel persuaded that, as regards the affairs of Italy, he is of the same opinion and determination as the noble Lord the First Minister. I hope I am not wrong in this anticipation, but it cannot be unadvisable when such a subject as this is brought before the House to meet it fairly in discussion. Let us not, when questions of this kind are brought before us, be led away by the "poetry of politics." I can feel for the condition of Italy as keenly as any Gentleman in this House, whether he be a First Minister or an ex-First Minister. I hope and believe that the time will come when in Italy there will be neither secret societies nor crowned despots. But these are questions for the closet, not for a practical and popular assembly. We have to deal with the facts before us, and if we raise up an agitation against Austrian rule without having a distinct conception in our minds of the objects at which we aim and the line of conduct which we intend to pursue, we shall be arresting the progress of Italy and aggravating every misfortune which has been brought under our notice. It is impossible to deny the fact that the great power of Italy is Austria. Both the noble Lords have admitted that, unless we are prepared to enter into an internecine struggle with Austria, our object ought to be to render the Austrian rule as mild and beneficent as we can. At least we ought not to encourage those who are prepared to conspire against that rule, but who are prepared to do nothing else. Sir, I was in Italy long before the affairs of 1848; and although unquestionably the Government of Austria was not that Italian Government which poets would picture in their dreams, though it was not a system of government under which Petrarchs were crowned with laurels in the capitol, yet it was distinguished from the other Governments of Italy by a vast expenditure of Imperial—not Italian—treasure upon public works, by the light taxation of the people, and by the progressive material improvement of the country. That is something. It is good to have a country with roads unrivalled, with means of communication yearly increasing. That is not, it is true, the only object of life; but I need not impress upon hon. Gentlemen that material prosperity is a basis on which you may, and in time probably will, establish civil and political rights; that the richer a people become the more anxious they are to guard that wealth; and that, whatever we may say of the Austrian rule, it was, so far as Lombardy was concerned, a rule under which at least the material character of the country was greatly improved. I have not been in Lombardy since that unfortunate year, 1848, but I have heard that the picture of society is now of a very different character. I hear, that in consequence of the affairs of 1848, taxes have greatly increased, public works have been arrested in their progress, and the material development of the country has much diminished. Therefore by the course we took in 1848 we have not improved the condition of Lombardy. That leads me to my last point, our relations to Sardinia. The noble Lord the Member for London, (Lord John Russell) laid it down as a principle that, although there may be in the treaty with Sardinia no formal stipulation that we will support that country against other Powers, yet, after its adhesion to the great alliance and all that has occurred since, we are bound in honour to give it that support if it should be attacked. The noble Lord the First Minister seemed not to question that position, but rather urged upon the attention of the House that there was no fear that Sardinia would attack Austria. Now, I think it undesirable that men of the great character and influence of these noble Lords should in this House volunteer engagements to other countries which the littera scripta of a treaty does not authorise; but I certainly agree with the noble Lord the Member for the City that any attack upon Sardinia by any Power in consequence of the internal policy which she pursues would constitute one of those grave conjunctures which would demand the most serious consideration of the British Government, and could certainly not be encountered by a despatch or an admonition. Let me, however, remind the noble Lord, who says that there is no danger of Sardinia attacking Austria, of what occurred in 1848. It was Sardinia that then attacked Austria. It was when Austria was supposed to be in distress and in despair, even while negotiations of a not unfriendly character were going on between the two Courts, that the King of Sardinia made, as it were, a nocturnal attack upon his Austrian neighbour, and commenced the war which ended in his signal discomfiture. I hope, Sir, that the present King will profit by that experience, and will not repeat that move. I hope he will feel confident that if he, within his own dominions, pursues the policy which he believes to be for the advantage of the great body of his people, he will retain the respect of Europe, and will be safe from unjust attack. I should deeply lament that any occupation of Sardinia by Austria should take place. That would, indeed, be a conjuncture which would require the consideration of this House. To judge from the past, I cannot bring myself to believe that any danger of that kind exists; I cannot but believe that the King of Sardinia is safe so long as he remains within the limits of his own dominions, and pursues that policy in the management of his kingdom which he has a right to follow. If anything can give him power to develop his whole political system, it is the maintenance of peace in Italy. But I am persuaded that, if the policy recommended by the noble Lord the Member for London is followed, you will have the position of Sardinia endangered—not by Austria, but by the revolutionary element existing in Italy, exercising its sympathetic influence upon the secret societies of Piedmont; and that throne will fall, not by the hand of Austria, not by the interference of foreign occupation, but by the efforts of men and bodies of men, who have in view far other objects than the constitutional improvements which wisely engage the attention of the King of Sardinia, and the subversive career of which will be accelerated by such attempts as the Motion made by the noble Lord to-night, to arouse the passions of the Italian people. Sir, the noble Lord the First Minister tells us that he cannot consent to the production of the papers now asked for. I am not surprised at it. I can hardly suppose that the noble Lord the Member for London expected them to be granted; but he has had an opportunity of placing before the House and the country the policy with respect to Italy which he advocates. I entirely dissent from the views of that noble Lord. I say, if you will interfere with Italy, you must interfere with fleets and armies, and be prepared to meet the consequences. If you interfere in Italy, you must make up your minds for a war of prolonged duration—a war that will tax your resources to the uttermost, and which, once it is commenced, you must continue until you have fully accomplished the objects for which you embarked in it, and which, in fact, cannot end until the map of Europe is reconstituted. That is the only mode in which you can interfere in Italy. If you are not prepared to do that, for the sake of the Italians, then, for the sake even of liberty and civilisation, you will avoid stirring up the passions of the population of that peninsula. I am confident this view is right, although you may smile at the association of the words “liberty and civilisation” with Austrian rule. We are told that we can expect nothing from Austria. Let me impress on the House this point—that among Austrian statesmen are some of the most enlightened of public men. Among these are the present Prime Minister of Austria and the Minister of that country at the Court of Rome. They are pupils of Prince Metternich, and like their illustrious master, distinguished for their freedom from prejudice and passion. Such men have an interest in the well government of the Italian States. They must feel that, if Italy were tranquil and undisturbed, Austria, being a powerful nation, could afford to be element, to trust, and confide. It is the Kings of Naples—the little Sovereigns teased with constant conspiracies (fomented often by foreign Governments) who, rather from a feeling of panic than any natural cruelty or arbitrary disposition, are driven to those excesses which we all equally deplore and desire to see terminated. No monarch can wish to fill dungeons with his own subjects, if he can avoid it. I remember perfectly well that when Lord Minto went to Italy in 1847, and at the request of several of the northern Courts, tendered his advice on the part of the British Government, the same King of Naples, who is now depicted to us as quite a Caligula, was so anxious to establish some form of constitutional government in his dominions that he applied to our Government for their good offices towards that end; and Lord Minto, at the King's express desire, repaired to Naples, and for a considerable period, I believe, entertained sanguine expectations of success. It was the sudden outbreak of the French revolution which put a stop to the arrangements then in progress in Naples. For these reasons, although there can be no division to-night on this question, I hope the House will refuse to sanction the course recommended by the noble Lord—I hope it will arrive at this conclusion:—if we agree to interfere in Italy, let it be a real interference; or, on the other hand, if we are not prepared to act, if we are not prepared to give effect to our policy by force, then the best thing for us will be to remain silent; not to seek to rouse the passions of the population; not to upset thrones—a policy which can only end in aggravating the thralldom of Italy, and may lead to consequences still more fraught with disaster—not to Italy only—but to Europe.

Mr. BOWYER believed it was in his power to adduce a few facts tending to elucidate the debate. He had recently heard from persons in Italy, on whom he could rely, that the Roman States would soon be evacuated by foreign troops. He was told that Cardinal Antonelli, the Pope's Minister had declared to the Austrian and French Governments that he should very shortly be prepared to manage the internal affairs of the country without the assistance of foreign armies. He was further informed that measures had been taken, and were now in a forward state, for enabling the Roman Government to dispense with external aid of that description. When that result was attained, it was to be hoped there would be an end to these incessant attacks upon the Papal Government. At the same time, nothing could tend more to retard and thwart the progress of internal improvement in those States, and consequently to retard the evacuation of the country by the foreign troops, than addresses such as those delivered by the noble Lord the Member for London. That noble Lord, although possessed of great knowledge of the literature and the customs of Italy, allowed himself to be carried away by his political predilections, and sought to import into a country for which they were wholly unsuited those Whig notions which could only flourish in an English meridian. The views of the noble Lord could not be carried out unless we were prepared to convulse the whole Italian Peninsula with revolution. Being at present relieved from the responsibilities of office, that noble Lord was able to indulge in what had been called "the poetry of politics;" but if he had occupied a place on the Treasury benches, no doubt his wisdom and statesmanship would have led him to favour the cooler and more temperate counsels that night promulgated from that quarter. The noble Lord argued that, in return for the assistance rendered us by Sardinia in the late war, we were bound to help her in effecting her objects in relation to the Governments of other States. Nothing could be more unjustifiable than the course pursued by Count Cavour at the Paris Conferences. He had laid before the Conference a most minute scheme for remodelling the internal administration of the Roman States and of Naples—both independent Governments, and neither of them represented in the Congress—and called upon the Conference to pledge themselves to assist by force in carrying that scheme into operation. A more monstrous project could not be discovered if they ransacked the annals of diplomacy. It proposed to place the provinces of the Roman States in a position of quasi independence, differing from the position of the capital, thus subjecting the Government to a process of decapitation by separating the head from the trunk. Such a ridiculous measure as that Count Cavour seriously suggested to the Conference as a decided improvement. There could be no doubt one of the real and chief causes of the insecurity of Italy was the policy pursued by the Sardinian Government within its own territory. That policy engendered constant agitation against the aristocracy and the Church, and allowed the press to carry on the most calumnious attacks upon the clergy and the nobility with perfect impunity; while, on the other hand, newspapers venturing to advocate the other side of public questions were carried on under constant fear of prosecution by the Attorney General of the Government. The newspapers which advocated what were in this country called Conservative opinions were constantly subjected to prosecution, while their opponents were allowed to indulge in the most virulent language. The right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire (Mr. Disraeli) had referred to the secret societies which were rife in Sardinia, and which were countenanced by the Government, and which sought, through the influence of those societies, to maintain its own power. He must also complain of the violation of the laws of property which had recently occurred in that country. The property of the cathedrals and religious orders had been seized by the Government, and the pensions which had been promised to those whose incomes were derived from that property had, in many instances, remained unpaid; and he was informed a few days ago, by a letter he had received from a distinguished Sardinian statesman, that some of these persons were now subsisting on charity. Considering the state of things which Count Cavour had brought about, he thought it ill became him to say that the Government of the Pope was a source of danger. That statement reminded him of the old fable of the wolf and the lamb, for Count Cavour had done all the mischief himself, and he now laid the blame upon the lamb. He thought it was most gratifying to see the leader of the Government and the leader of the Opposition concur in taking a statesmanlike, steady, and reasonable view of Italian affairs. He, for one, would see with great pleasure a good and firm constitutional Government established in Piedmont; but the exciting language which was sometimes used in this country, and such language as they had heard from the noble Member for the City of London to-night was calculated to cause confusion and difficulty in the kingdom of Sardinia. When so reasonable and moderate a view of the subject was taken by two of the most distinguished statesmen in that House, he hoped that for the future the affairs of Italy would be allowed to pursue their natural course, and that advantage would not be taken of the weakness of the smaller Governments to address to them language which would not be used in the case of more powerful States. Those who looked back to what took place in 1848 could not wish to see a repetition of events which then issued in such disastrous results.

Mr. M. MILNES said, the noble Lord at the head of Her Majesty's Government had spoken on this subject with the reserve which his position rendered necessary, and had not given that encouragement to the noble Lord the Member for London which some hon. Members might have desired; but, on the other hand, he thought the noble Lord gave the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Disraeli) no right to assume that he had come to the same conclusions as he had himself done; namely, that neither at the present nor at any future time could it be the duty of this country to interfere, either directly or indirectly, in the affairs of Italy. Her Majesty's Government had said nothing to justify the belief that they had abnegated that great principle which the liberal party in that House had always more or less supported—namely, that it was the duty of this country always by moral means, and if necessary and possible by physical means, to support the progress of liberty and the independence of nations. He trusted that England would never abandon that principle, and least of all at the present moment, when she had just sacrificed the blood of her bravest men to maintain the independence of a nation, which could exercise little influence on the interests or economy of the country. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bucks had sought to place the noble Lord the Member for London in a dilemma, and said, "If you interfere at all, you must do one of two things—you must declare war against Austria, or you must drive Italy into revolution." He (Mr. M. Milnes) thought this argument hardly consistent with the dignity of a Parliamentary debate; but he would ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he, for his part, was willing to permit the occupation, by Austria, of the whole Italian peninsula? The Austrian possession of the Lombardo-Venetian territory appeared even theoretically a most extravagant intervention in the rights of Italy. What had the German race to do on the soil of Italy? If the Austrian possession of those territories was secured to her by treaty, at least we had the right to say, that those treaties limited her to those parts of Italy only, and gave no warrant to interfere in the affairs of other States. He did not presume to say that it was our duty, or the duty of any foreign State, to interfere with the Italian people; but we had a right to say, that Austria ought to limit her powers of interference to that portion of Italy which she occupies by treaty. If upon some such pretence as the demand of the reigning Sovereign she could occupy Tuscany, Romagna, and Parma, what was to prevent her occupying other States in the same way, and so spreading the strength of her military power over the whole of Italy. We had no right to assume that Austria was at present animated by such ambitious projects; but, nevertheless, the spirit of aggression which had already shown itself in Austria, made it the duty of the Powers of Europe, who respected the independence of States, to view her operations with some jealousy. Austria, for instance, had declared her willingness to place her army at the disposal of such princes as might be disposed to use it, and if such a principle as that could be introduced with impunity into the public law of Europe, the disasters it must lead to would be most lamentable. If the public law of Europe could be made to compel every Sovereign to rely upon his own subjects for protection, all the evils attendant upon foreign occupations would be avoided; but that could not be, and the aim of constitutional Powers should be to see, that when an occupation did take place, it should not continue year after year until it assumed an influence equal to that of the Government itself; otherwise there would be an end to the balance of power in Europe—for if upon no other pretence but that of assisting the reigning Sovereign, we were to allow to Austria the right to occupy States in this way, she would gradually get possession of the whole of Italy; and then came the question, who was to turn her soldiers out? The right hon. Gentleman opposite must admit the possibility of some danger, and admitting that, surely he would say it was not unbecoming in us to guard against it. On the other hand, the right hon. Gentleman had waved in their eyes the torch of revolution, and had almost frightened them out of their propriety with stories of secret societies. Now, that was the worn-out line of argument adopted by tyranny throughout the whole of Europe. When a Government or a Sovereign wished to break faith with the people, they had hitherto had nothing to do but to get up a panic about secret societies. But let them look philosophically into the matter, and see whether it were possible or probable that societies of this extremely dangerous character could grow up in a well-governed country. If secret societies existed at all, they generally exercised great influence, and their very existence was a proof that the social wants of the country were not recognised—that there were social desires not accomplished. They showed that the Government, for all purposes of government, was not what it ought to be; and hence he was fortified in the opinion that secret societies were alone dangerous in countries which had feeble Governments. Secret societies failed altogether and became powerless when the Government regained its strength and equilibrium, as was shown by the events of 1848 in France. The people returned to their peaceful avocations as if no revolution had taken place, and when the influence of the secret societies reached its culminating point, the power of true order and discipline asserted its majesty in the streets of Paris. That there were secret societies in Italy no one could doubt. How could it be otherwise in a country where espionage was the rule of government, where the sanctity of family life was destroyed—where freedom of thought was abolished from the minds of men who had received the education of intelligent persons, and who by their communications and intercourse with other countries had learned to think and hope for themselves? Of course, amongst men so situated and oppressed there must be secret societies, and God forbid that there should not. But were we to fold our arms, because under such circumstances scenes of disorder might occur in Italy? Where we not only to do nothing, but to proclaim to the world that we would do nothing? If such were the policy advocated by the right hon. Gentleman, he was thankful the Government of this country was not in the hands of a Minister who would counsel such a course—not that he believed that Parliamentary government in Sardinia was in peril, but he believed that if England were to show an unwillingness to protect Sardinia, the consequences might be otherwise than favourable to that institution—because it was quite impossible that Sardinia could be looked at by the absolutist Powers of Europe with any other than a jealous eye. Her very constitution made her an object of suspicion, and she was to Italy what Belgium had been to Western Europe. He remembered a great continental statesman once observed to him, “We on the Continent do not in the least mind what you do in England with your constitutional Government, because you are a strange isolated people; but your establishing the kingdom of Belgium, and showing thereby that constitutional government can flourish on the Continent in evil as well as good times, is one of the most dangerous examples that has ever been propounded.” And so, he had no doubt, the absolutist Powers of Europe regarded the kingdom of Sardinia; which rendered it the more necessary that we should throw around her the great protection of the shield of England. He believed that just as we did so openly and chivalrously, there would be less reason to suppose that we should be obliged to make any sacrifices for her. He regretted that the right hon. Gentleman should have revived the calumnies circulated some time ago, with regard to the mission of Lord Minto. He, like a certain foreign journal of influence, attributed the revolutionary spirit in Italy to that noble Lord’s mission; but the right hon. Gentleman altogether forgot that if the revolution of 1848 had not taken place things might have been very different in Italy. The counsels of Lord Minto had been marked by wisdom and moderation, and had they been followed there was no reason to disbelieve that by this time the mission of Lord Minto would have been remembered by princes and people with feelings of gratitude. With regard to the Roman States, the Comte de Montalembert had laid it down that none but Catholics could sympathise with or understand them, and therefore we had no right to interfere with the Pope’s dominions; but if the machinery of the Papal

Mr. Monckton Milnes

Government could only be kept in motion with the assistance of foreign armies, we had a right to say that in a temporal point of view foreign intervention could not be avoided. To talk of the independence of the sovereign head of the Catholic Church, when the Pope was manifestly kept upon his throne by some one of the Catholic Powers, seemed rather contradictory; but it was the religious element that was here referred to, and if that were so, he must say he saw no reason whatever why the question of Italian independence should be mixed up with the sublimer question of religion. Let the Pope remain in Italy if you would, but only upon the basis that his temporal power was regulated by a sensible and good form of government. This brought him to a point to which he begged the especial attention of the House, and that was the little attention the Italian population had at any period shown to any particular form of government. The Italians, however, had always been remarkably conspicuous for their moderation, and even during the occupation of Rome by the republican troops, property and life was quite as secure as they were in the time of the Roman Government. The difficulties of this question of Italian independence must therefore be greatly exaggerated. The process of establishing good government in Italy was, to his mind, so exceedingly simple that nothing but its extreme simplicity prevented its adoption. It would involve the sovereign princes in no risk whatever, and that fact made him fancy there was something at work upon their minds quite as injurious as any secret societies. It seemed to him that they were suffering under foreign influence, which prevented their doing what was right, as well for themselves as for their subjects; and, therefore, he thought it would be wise that there should be, on the part of liberal Governments, some interference to counteract or balance that of the absolutist Powers. He believed that Italy had a great future before her. Napoleon, in one of his conversations with Count Montebolon, said that he always had before him the scheme of establishing the integrity and independence of Italy. The difference between the various Italian States was no greater than that between the north and south of France, or even between Scotland and Cornwall. The progress of events would gradually mould them together, and the time might come when it would seem as strange to look back upon the disorders of Italy as to those of France, and when one homogeneous nation might stand between the Alps and the sea—a proof of the wisdom and sagacious foresight of those who laboured in its behalf.

MR. WHITESIDE said, he thought that the House was indebted to the noble Lord the Member for London for having introduced to their attention a subject of such deep and painful interest. The speech of the noble Lord was eminently logical, and, having established his premises, he had drawn a conclusion that was irresistible; but if his object had been to induce the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton to declare a policy from that conclusion on the Italian difficulty, he had been signally unsuccessful. It was, no doubt, a great accomplishment to be able to speak well and gracefully, and yet to say nothing; and that the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton had done to admiration. The noble Lord had had a plain and practical question submitted to him that evening; he had spoken well and gracefully, as he always did; and yet he (Mr. Whiteside) ventured to say that there was not a man in the House who thoroughly understood what the noble Lord had intended to convey. The argument of the noble Lord the Member for London was irresistible. Leaving all abstract principles, and throwing aside all the poetry of the question, and applying himself to a matter of business, the noble Lord said, "I take up your protocols, I read your formal State papers, and I ask you, consistently with the doctrines which you have propounded, are you to remain contented with barren protocols, or do you intend to act up to them as sincere and honest men?" The noble Lord was the advocate of a manly and decisive policy. He said, "You have pointed out the evils under which Italy groans; you have drawn the attention of the Plenipotentiaries at Paris to the miseries of that country; do you intend to pursue your advice to a practical conclusion?" That question had been answered by the noble Lord the first Minister of the Crown by saying nothing; and if the noble Lord the Member for London were satisfied, or thought that he had obtained an exposition of a policy, he was easily contented. What was the House to say to those papers which had been presented, and to the modest revolutionary theories which Lord Clarendon had laid down at the Conferences? Lord Clarendon said that they must deal with a strong hand with Naples, and that they must secularise the Papacy—in other words, that they must overturn the Government of Rome; because any man who told him (Mr. Whiteside) that they were to secularise the Papacy, and at the same time to continue the present Government of Rome, had a design upon his understanding. While the noble Lord the Member for London was logical, however, in reasoning upon the speeches of Lord Clarendon, he would have been exceedingly illogical if he reasoned upon his conclusions; because what had Lord Clarendon, who had spoken so well, really done? He could imagine Lord Clarendon saying at the Congress—"We have disposed of Circassia; we have settled Greece; we have put down the independence of the press of Belgium; and now we must do something for Italy." Well, but what had the noble Lord done? The practical question before the Congress being how to terminate the armed occupation of the Legations and other portions of Italy, this was the conclusion which had been arrived at as between the Plenipotentiaries of Austria and France—

"The Plenipotentiaries of Austria have acceded to the wish expressed by the Plenipotentiaries of France for the evacuation of the Pontifical States by the French and Austrian troops." When?—let the House mark what follows! "As soon as it can be effected without prejudice to the tranquillity of the country and to the consolidation of the authority of the Holy See."

Then, and not till then, the armed intervention was to cease. It was no wonder, then, that the noble Lord the Member for London had addressed his pertinent question to the Government; because it appeared that the armed occupation of Italy would continue till the Greek kalends, for if it were to continue till there was a good Government in Rome and the authority of the Pope was consolidated it would continue for ever. Justice had not been done to the argument of the noble Lord the Member for London; because his doctrine, rightly viewed, was not that of intervention, but of non-intervention. The noble Lord maintained that if it were a true doctrine that no one had a right to interfere between a Sovereign and his subjects when they disputed upon matters of internal policy, the Government, in order to carry out the doctrine, ought to have stipulated that the armies of Austria and France should at once withdraw from Italy; and he asked whether any assurance had been obtained that their occupation would shortly cease? What was the answer of the noble Lord at the head of the Government to that argument? Had it satisfied the Liberal party? If it had, they were as easily pleased as they were when they ratified the conduct of the Ambassador at Constantinople. He had been assured the other day by a friend who knew Italy well, and on whom he could perfectly rely, that our Minister at Florence, the Marquess of Normanby, had actually sanctioned the intervention of the Austrian army. There was a policy! The Ambassador at Florence advocated one doctrine, and the Ambassador at Paris another. The noble Lord the Member for London, with the protocols in his hand, asked the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton what he intended to do in accordance with the opinions he had expressed; and the noble Lord the first Minister said he intended to do nothing. If the hon. and learned Member for Dundalk (Mr. Bowyer) understood the noble Lord's meaning, he must be the only Gentleman in the House able to understand it. But something practical might have been done. When the subject was discussed at the Paris Conferences, they might have asked the occupying Powers what good they had done for Italy during their occupation? An instructive and interesting history had been written of the Government of Rome under the first Napoleon, describing how the troubles of Rome had been composed and the people satisfied by an honest administration of the law, and by the introduction of the criminal code of France. But the present occupation of the French was a contrast to the last. Since it had commenced, had France attempted, or even recommended, any improvement? None that he had heard of. The noble Lord might well ask, therefore, what they were going to do for Italy. With regard to Naples they might have done one of two things. The noble Lord at the head of Her Majesty's Government might have said, if Naples does not behave itself we will blow it to pieces—that would have been a distinct policy—or he should have held his tongue if there was no intention of following up words by actions. But an indecisive, shuffling policy, which excited the feelings of the people without remedying their grievances, was a policy which all must condemn, and he agreed with the right hon. Member for Buckinghamshire that it would be wiser to renounce interference altogether than to answer the question of the noble Lord the Member for London, as the noble Viscount had done. He did not believe in the doctrine that there was no hope for Italy. Far from it. In some parts of Italy just laws and good codes were in existence when the laws of this country were written in blood; there were good institutions and materials for good government; but, unfortunately, in this boasted nineteenth century, the cause of constitutional government seemed everywhere to retrograde, and if at one moment they might entertain some hopes for it, the next moment they were plunged in despair. There was no reason for revolutionizing Tuscany. If the laws enacted by wise men for that State had been maintained, this discussion on the situation of Italy would have been unnecessary. Nor did he think that it would be impossible to modify the system of government even in Naples. Lord Colchester, a predecessor of the right hon. Gentleman in the chair, after being present at the discussions of the Parliament, when they had a Parliament in Naples, recorded his opinion that he had hopes of the Government from the temper and moderation with which the debates were conducted. Naples did not require to be revolutionized; but if it did, would the noble Lord the Member for Tiverton revolutionize it? What was the principle of his policy? His principle was interference by protocols—protocols barren of good fruits, though not always barren of evil fruits. If two nations were continually firing protocols at each other, they would end by firing something else. The debate by which this protocol was preceded was very entertaining, though he feared it would lead to a permanent occupation of Italy. The French Minister said to the Austrian Minister, "Why don't you withdraw from Italy?" The Austrian Minister turned and said, "Why don't you withdraw?" He was afraid there was some quiet sarcasm in the noble Lord the Member for London's observation that when the foreign troops were withdrawn the Pope would be left to settle affairs with his own subjects. Was the noble Lord sure that the Pope's subjects would not settle him? If the Government of Rome represented Christianity upon earth, why not leave it to practise Christianity towards its subjects? But the noble Lord the first Minister of the Crown said he could not adopt that policy, because "our august Ally" had an army there and did not intend to take it away. He did not know whether it was ever to be taken away, because the Emperor, as the eldest child of the Church, had declared his determination to support the Church. If, however, the foreign troops should be withdrawn, he was afraid that the cardinals would have to move as speedily as they had done on a former occasion, and that Rome would be cleared of some of its most respectable inhabitants. To talk of the law of nations in reference to the present system was all nonsense. What law could justify the army of one country in entering another country to settle a dispute between the rulers and the people? How should they have liked to see an armed occupation of Ireland by a foreign Power when a revolution there was talked about? They might at Paris have asked Austria to withdraw, but they signed a protocol which bound them to consent to the stay of the Austrians until the happy day came when Austria, France, and England could say, "Now our good work is accomplished, the Papal power is consolidated, and the States of Italy may again be as they once were—the light and glory of the world." The difficulty of extracting an answer from the noble Lord the first Minister, which would bind him to a policy, was proved by the persuasive eloquence of the noble Lord the Member for London having failed in the attempt. He agreed with the noble Lord the Member for London that the Government ought to do one thing or the other, and to pursue a course that would be satisfactory and intelligible; but he ventured to say that they would do neither one thing nor the other—that they would exasperate the feelings of the Italians, and having stimulated them into insurrection, would leave them to their miserable fate. That was a policy of which no humane or just man could approve, and he therefore regretted that the noble Lord the Member for London had failed in obtaining any satisfactory answer from the noble Lord at the head of the Government—which confirmed him in the opinion he had long held, that the great quality of the noble Viscount our First Minister was that of speaking eloquently and gracefully without saying anything whatever on the subject under consideration.

MR. J. G. PHILLIMORE said, he thought very few Englishmen would be found to coincide in the opinions of the hon. Member for Dundalk (Mr. Bowyer) which seemed to him to be less Roman Catholic than ultramontane—opinions which had been condemned in all ages and by every writer of English views. [MR. BOWYER: No, no!] Had the hon. Member read Dante or Machiavelli?—the latter of whom described the secular government of the Papal Court as the scourge of Italy. The truth was, as all history showed, that of all bad Governments the Government of Priests was the worst, and of all sacerdotal Governments that of the Pope was most to be reprobated. The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Disraeli) said, "You would not interfere with Austria—why should you with Naples?" But this was a question not of right but of policy. Austria was landlocked, and was almost inaccessible to a British force; whereas the very appearance of a British fleet in the Bay of Naples would be enough to put an end to oppression. He was astonished to hear a gentleman like the right hon. Gentleman alleging the material well-being of a refined and high-spirited people like the Italians under the Austrian rule, as a reason why they should remain quiet under it. Surely the right hon. Gentleman, who knew right well the gratitude which the civilised world owed to Italy, did not wish the high-spirited Italians to be insensible to the degradation of their country. It was the policy of Austria to provide her people with sensual enjoyments, for the express purpose of keeping them in slavery; but the people of Italy could not be expected to acquiesce in a treatment which placed them on a level with the boors of Germany and Hungary. He (Mr. Phillimore) quite agreed that we had no right to encourage hopes which we could not realise; but if the lovers of despotism had countries to which they knew they could look for comfort and aid, it was right that the lovers of freedom should also know that there was one nation from whom their struggle would always command sympathy, and from whom they might, if possible, look for co-operation. It was true that nations were to be guided, not by excited feelings but by sound policy; but if there were any cause that should be dear to a man who loved freedom for its own sake it was the cause of the Italian people.

SIR JOHN WALSH said, that a convenient word had been coined in the French language which it would be desirable should be adopted as soon as possible into our own, namely, the word spécialité, the meaning of which was an aptness for some particular thing or pursuit. Those who had watched the career of the noble Lord (Lord John Russell) had come to the conclusion that foreign diplomacy was not the spécialité of the noble Lord. But the noble Lord himself seemed to be of a different opinion, and, after a short retirement from public life, in which he had of late taken a less prominent part than usual, he had selected a foreign question upon which to make his reappearance in the public eye. The noble Lord had in one respect shown that he had attained no inconsiderable proficiency in the art of diplomacy, for he had listened carefully to the whole of his speech, and had totally failed to gather the policy that the noble Lord really wished this country to adopt, or the measures which the noble Lord called upon the House to pursue. But the noble Lord (Viscount Palmerston) gave his noble Friend the quid pro quo, for his reply was a chef d'œuvre of diplomacy. The noble Lord, in a succession of sentiments, in which they all concurred—clothed in well chosen language—gave the House no information whatever as to the course which the Government intended to adopt. As Danton took for his motto, "l'audace, et toujours l'audace," so the noble Lord, so far as he (Sir J. Walsh) could make anything out of his vague declarations, had taken for his motto, "interference somehow or other," and would plunge the country into a sea of interference upon Italian politics. This was surely a departure from the old Whig principles, which the noble Lord used to enunciate when he (Sir J. Walsh) had first the honour of a seat in that House. He remembered the time when the Whigs talked of nothing but non-interference in foreign politics, and when almost nothing was held to justify interference. Their motto in those days used to be, "toto divisos orbe Britannos." Now, we were called upon to take a part in the internal differences of a nation divided from us by a great distance, while not one of the Italian Governments wished to seek a quarrel with us, or to cultivate any other than amicable relations with us. The noble Lord said that if Sardinia were attacked we were bound to defend her; but who was going to attack Sardinia? Not Austria or the Italian Powers, for it was the very plain interest of Austria not to attack Sardinia. It was said we ought to force Austria to withdraw her troops from Italy. But, then, there was this difficulty—that

Sir John Walsh

France occupied another portion of Italy, and that Rome, the seat of Papal government, was in the possession of the French; and there was a general feeling that they could not be withdrawn from Rome without occasioning a revolution. They had yet to learn what the noble Lord assumed—that France was prepared to be our tool; for the Emperor Napoleon seemed to him to be the last man likely to be the cat's-paw of Liberalism either in that House or elsewhere. The Emperor Napoleon was, indeed, the person least likely to become an instrument in the hands of the revolutionary party. It would be madness and folly to plunge into a course of interference, reckoning upon the support of the Emperor Napoleon, which would be entirely antagonistic to his principles and interests. The hon. Member for Pontefract (Mr. M. Milnes) thought the presence of these troops unnecessary, and that, if they left the Italians to themselves, they would display admirable fitness for the exercise of constitutional liberty. With every wish to see foreign troops removed from the Italian Peninsula, he could not blind his eyes to the fact that political parties in Italy were not of the very innocuous character described by the hon. Gentleman. He could not forget that the movement in 1848, which appeared to hold forth to Europe a promise of considerable amelioration in the social state of Italy, was marred and defeated by the folly and madness of the ultra-revolutionist party. He could not forget the atrocities attending the murder of Rossi, and the scenes of violence and rapine which were witnessed in the Legations. And he could not forget that a political chief had recently had the baseness, the madness, and the folly, to advocate assassinations as a means of accomplishing reforms. He did not mean to libel the whole of that intelligent nation, whose great qualities he admired, but he meant to say that there were Italians who carried their political principles to Red Republicanism, which was identical with the Jacobinism of former times. As recently as 1848 and 1849 they had been strong enough to overpower the wise and moderate party, in whose hands every enlightened friend of liberty would wish to see the movement rest. While he was desirous, therefore, of seeing the state of Italy ameliorated, he could not deny that a revolutionary element of a very dangerous character did exist in that country, which required to be guarded by some precautions. Under these circumstances, he could not conceive a more negative proceeding than that of the noble Lord. He was quite sure the noble Lord would withdraw his Motion. Probably the noble Lord never intended to carry it to a vote. The noble Lord at the head of the Government, considering that he was responsible for the peace of Europe, and the relations between England and the great nations of the Continent, had wisely, in speaking a great deal, said nothing; and that would be the result as far as the Government was concerned. As far as the noble Lord and his followers were concerned, the only possible result would be to raise in the minds of the people of Italy some vague hopes, which might be disappointed—hopes which it was utterly unworthy of this country to raise unless it meant to realise them, and which he was quite convinced in the present state of the affairs of Europe the Government neither meant to realise nor could realise. For these reasons he deprecated this discussion as being mischievous in its effects, injurious to the people of Italy, and not creditable to ourselves.

LORD JOHN RUSSELL: It is necessary for me to say a few words in consequence of the entire misconstruction which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Buckinghamshire has put upon my speech. I thought I had made the matter sufficiently clear by stating that my object entirely referred to the occupation of territories belonging to one State by the troops of another. I asked whether that system was right. I said that in my opinion an occupation of seven years was too long. I said I did not propose to interfere with any Government which its Sovereign and its people might think fit to establish. If a despotic Government suits them best, let them have a despotic Government. If they wish free institutions, let them and their Sovereigns arrange what institutions they will have. I proposed no interference on that subject, but I said, I cannot admire that form of Government which encourages abuses, which protects those abuses by foreign troops, and which makes the discontent arising from those abuses a pretext for retaining and continuing the presence of foreign troops. And, the subject having been brought before the Conferences at Paris, and a great deal was said upon it by Lord Clarendon, I asked the Government if they intended to proceed with the policy which Lord Clarendon stated on their behalf, or to withdraw from it. And I said,

I thought it desirable that either one course or the other should be adopted. I thought that was plain enough. The right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Disraeli) does not allude to that question of foreign occupation. He hardly mentions it. He says there are two courses, one of which we must take—either to go to war with Austria, or to rouse the passions of the people of Italy; and he says I have roused the passions of the people of Italy. Now, the whole of my case was this—I said the discussion in the Conferences had naturally created great excitement in Italy, and therefore it was desirable to know, for the sake of preventing the Italians being deceived or led to premature action, what was the policy of the Government. The right hon. Gentleman's charge is therefore quite inapplicable, and leads one to believe that, having framed it previously, he had not time to alter his speech after hearing me. The right hon. Gentleman has, in fact, declaimed upon two propositions, neither of which is mine; though I certainly did say, and I do say again, I think a term ought to be put to this foreign occupation of Italy. The hon. Gentleman who has just spoken (Sir John Walsh) has also misunderstood me; but I am not so much surprised at his as I am at the right hon. Gentleman's not understanding me. I wish to ask Her Majesty's Government what are their views with respect to foreign occupation. Should it be permitted for seven, fourteen or twenty-one years, or would they give a ninety-nine years' lease? Are the troops always to remain in possession of the territories which they occupy? If they are to remain ninety-nine years, is not that an actual transfer of the sovereignty? By the Treaty of Vienna certain countries are called the territory of Parma and the duchy of Modena. Does that mean that they are to belong to Austria, or that they are to be independent States? If independent States, is the protracted occupation of their territory consistent with that provision? That is the question which I put to the House, and of which hon. Gentlemen on the other side take no notice. Again, on the general question of interfering with foreign Powers, I say it is not my proposal to interfere. Those who go into a State and tell the Sovereign he cannot govern the people, and tell the people they are rebellious and disobedient, and every person who offends shall be brought before a court-martial of foreign officers, and punished at the dictate of those officers—those are the people who interfere, and not I, who wish to put an end to their interference. With regard to the speech of my noble Friend the First Minister of the Crown, it has given great satisfaction to the hon. Member for Dundalk (Mr. Bowyer), and it may, therefore, seem rather strange that it should also have given satisfaction to me. But certainly it did, because I understood from it that the Government do not intend to abandon that policy which was stated by Lord Clarendon at Paris. With regard to the particular measures which they intend to take, I am the last person to be so unreasonable as to ask the Government to declare what those particular measures will be. But my noble Friend has said that it is still the wish of the Government that the foreign troops shall leave the Italian States, and that, in conjunction with the Emperor of the French he will, from time to time, take measures with that object. The right hon. Gentleman spoke of secret societies. He said the whole Continent was undermined by secret societies. But I am not sure that a Government extremely despotic and supported by foreign troops is the Government most likely to put down secret societies. It is in that rank soil these weeds are most likely to grow. These things act upon one another. There are secret societies; therefore there is foreign occupation. There is foreign occupation; therefore there are secret societies. You have always the Government defended by foreign troops, because there are secret societies, and the people resorting to secret societies because they see no other means of stating their grievances. The best intelligence I have heard is not from an official but from a semi-official quarter—the hon. Member for Dundalk, who speaks as it were on behalf of the Holy See in this House—and he tells us that the troops of Austria and France will in a short time leave the territory of the Holy See. [Mr. Bowyer: I said from private information.] Private information. Yes. It is not an official despatch which the hon. and learned Gentleman has received; but his statement gives me great satisfaction, as I think it very likely that the person who wrote to the hon. and learned Gentleman that private information may have heard it from very good authority. If it prove true it will be very satisfactory. If the people of the Roman States entertain that opinion of the Pope that they are willing to live at perfect peace with him without free institutions, or if, on the other hand—as I would be more glad to see—if Pius IX., being an Italian Sovereign, as undoubtedly he is, should return to the better thoughts and better measures of his earlier years of government, and without establishing constitutional government, which I rather think is premature, if he establish good councils, and have justice and mercy in his code, then I shall be quite satisfied that those institutions shall be such as the Roman Government shall think fit to establish, without any interference except such as the public opinion of the Roman States may happen to offer. I have one other thing to say. The right hon. Gentleman opposite (Mr. Disraeli) said that Lord Minto went to Naples at the request of the King, to assist him, in respect of some constitutional reforms, and to establish representative government. The fact is that the King proclaimed a constitution at Naples, when Lord Minto was at Rome, and in the opinion of Lord Minto, as well as of Pope Pius IX., that measure was premature. Lord Minto thought it would not hasten, but, on the contrary, would involve a risk of overturning the progress of reform and good measures in Italy; as actually proved to be the case, for we know that those who assisted in the formation of that constitution were afterwards brought to trial for assisting the King in that endeavour. What the King really desired Lord Minto to go to Naples for was, to intervene between himself and the Sicilians. There had been an insurrection in Sicily; the terms upon which that island should be governed were in question, and the King thought that the opinion of Lord Minto might be of weight in inducing the Sicilians to submit; and it was at the request of the King, and with the approbation of the Government of which his noble Friend the First Lord of the Treasury was then a Member, that Lord Minto went to Naples. The right hon. Gentleman seemed inclined to renew those insinuations against Lord Minto, that he had fomented revolution in Italy. Those charges are purely imaginary. Lord Minto recommended at Turin and at Florence the establishment of good government, but not the introduction of representative constitutions. If the English Government and its representative in Italy were busy in fomenting insurrection at Naples, Rome, and Milan, I would like to know whether the British representatives at Berlin, Vienna, and Paris were equally busy. It was the course of public opinion, and in some of those countries the mismanagement of public affairs, which created the great revolution of 1848 throughout Europe, and power fell into hands which were incapable of properly employing it—into the hands of democratic factions which have been entirely put aside—for I believe not a vestige remains of the Governments of 1848—but I trust that future years will witness the confirmation of those liberties which it is most desirable should be established.

MR. DISRAELI observed, that the noble Lord had stated that he (Mr. Disraeli) had not noticed the occupation of the Legations. He had understood the noble Lord to say his object was to inquire whether the Government intended to pursue the policy indicated by Lord Clarendon at Paris. If the noble Lord referred to the protocols he would see that the conditions upon which the Legation should be evacuated were laid down.

Question put; and negatived.

PARTNERSHIP AMENDMENT (No. 2) BILL.

Bill read 3^d.

MR. J. G. PHILLIMORE proposed to add a proviso to Clause 3. He was anxious for the adoption of limited liability, but must say that the Bill, as it stood, was not sanctioned by any legislation in the world. All countries which adopted the principle of limited liability required publicity, which was completely excluded from this Bill. He would prefer that there should be a public registry of partners, which should be open to all the world; but, in order that there might be some kind of security, he would move to add the following proviso to Clause 3:—

“ Provided also, that no such loan shall be deemed to be protected by this Act, unless the lender thereof shall within fourteen days after the same shall have been advanced cause to be inserted in his own name in the Gazette of London, Edinburgh, or Dublin, according as the principal place of business of the borrower may be in England, Scotland, or Ireland, a statement of such advance, exhibiting the amount thereof, the person to whom and the term for which the same is made, the portion of the profits which the lender stipulates to receive on account thereof, and the nature of the business by which such profits are intended to be acquired.”

MR. WILKINSON said, it was all very proper that fraud should be prevented; but, if the Legislature went on adding precautions in this manner, the object of the Bill would be altogether destroyed, and nobody would lend any money at all.

MR. MUNTZ supported the clause, contending that all the transactions which took place under this Bill should be made as public as possible.

MR. PELLATT asked what difference there was between giving credit for money and credit for goods? The whole question was one of character. He thought the proviso would materially damage the measure.

MR. SPOONER said, the difference between the case of a person selling goods and a person lending money was this—that the latter could secretly withdraw his money after having enabled the borrower to obtain credit in the market, whereas the seller of goods would only have the chance of obtaining payment in common with the other creditors after the lender had been paid.

MR. ROEBUCK said, the object of the clause was to let the world know the exact amount for which the parties lending the money were responsible; and that they did not want more credit than their capital entitled them to.

MR. GLYN said, the object of the clause was that all parties to a contract should be known to the public. He supported the clause, and considered secrecy in this case to be objectionable. But he would ask the right hon. Gentleman (Mr. Lowe) whether, under all the circumstances, considering the lateness of the Session and the state of the Bill, he was really prepared to press it forward? The right hon. Gentleman had admitted that it would be necessary to have a Committee next Session on the whole question of the law of partnership, and the Bill, as it at present stood, contained some most incongruous provisions.

MR. BIGGS opposed the clause, as it would seriously overlay the purpose of the Bill.

MR. JOHN MACGREGOR was confident that the Bill could not pass through both Houses this Session; he would, therefore, advise the right hon. Gentleman to withdraw it in order to introduce next Session some measure more consistent with justice and equity. He believed it would never work beneficially.

MR. LOWE said, the hon. Member for North Warwickshire had pointed out the distinction between lending and selling, by stating that lending was necessary to give to the borrower public credit; but he (Mr.

Lowe) should like to ask the hon. Gentleman how the fact of publishing in the Gazette that a trader was trading upon borrowed money could enhance his credit in the market? The hon. Member for Kendal (Mr. Glyn) had talked about the secrecy of these transactions, and of the necessity of making them public. The hon. Gentleman was a banker, and he should like to know whether the hon. Gentleman would consent to have every Bill which he discounted published in the Gazette? If he would not, and if the hon. Gentleman could carry on his business without publishing those Bills, why in this case should there be an exception? In a case where partners were only limitedly liable it was just and right that there should be a publication, and that notice should be given; but the question here was whether this was a partnership at all. The principle of this Bill was that lending on profits was not a partnership, and if it were not a partnership, why should there be annexed to it the incidents of partnership? If the principle he had just mentioned were a bad one, the House ought not to have passed the Bill so far through its various stages; if it were a good principle, then the House ought to leave these contracts to stand for what they really were—namely, for loans—ought to attach to them the incidents of a loan only, and allow them to remain secret, as other loans were. With regard to the particular clause now before the Committee, it surely could not be a bond fide proposition. It was proposed that “no such loan shall be deemed to be protected by this Act”—the fact being that the Act did not protect any loan at all—unless the lender should, within fourteen days after the same should have been advanced, insert in the Gazette “a statement of such advance, exhibiting the amount thereof, the person to whom and the term for which the same is made, the portion of the profits which the lender stipulates to receive on account thereof, and the nature of the business by which such profits are intended to be acquired.” It amounted, therefore, to this—that whereas a man might lend his money at a fixed interest without making it public, and without running any other risk than losing his money, a man who lent money the interest upon which was to vary with the profits of the concern was to be liable to his last shilling, unless he inserted in the Gazette a number of very loosely-worded provisions, a failure in regard to any one of which rendered him responsible for the whole of the debts. It was said that they ought to avoid pitfalls. Why, the whole proposal would involve a series of pitfalls, and, in his opinion, it would be a hundred times better to drop the Bill altogether than run the risk of establishing such a system. If this clause were adopted by the Committee it would be impossible to proceed with the Bill, and he called upon those who proposed the clause to point out what good it would do. He could understand, though he could not approve, a provision requiring the registration of these contracts; a registry might be referred to at any time: but here it was not proposed to register them; they were to be inserted in the Gazette, which it was most difficult to refer to, and which would not be referred to until a concern failed, and then there would be a search in the Gazette in order to discover if some unfortunate person who had lent money to the concern had not committed some trifling inaccuracy, and could not therefore be made liable for the debts. The provision proposed was full of snares and pitfalls for the lenders—like the Sphinx which set men riddles, and then devoured them if they failed in solving the enigmas. For himself, he stood upon the principle of the Bill, and he called upon those who had approved that principle to reject the clause now submitted to the Committee.

Mr. CARDWELL said, that whether theory was or was not on the side of the Amendment of the hon. and learned Member (Mr. J. G. Phillimore), at all events the experience of centuries was recorded in its favour. When, too, his right hon. Friend asserted that the clause was badly drawn, and contained nothing but impracticabilities and pitfalls, the Committee should remember that it was borrowed almost in its very words from the statutes of Massachusetts, and that it contained nothing which had not been in force in the United States during the time the principle of limited liability had been established there. His right hon. Friend had asked whether these contracts were to be regarded as loans, or whether they were to have annexed to them the incidents of partnership. Now, he would remind the Committee that on the last occasion when this question was discussed the House adopted an Amendment in favour of the partnership view of the case; and he therefore hoped the Committee would be consistent and would carry that principle bond fade into effect. This was not a question of yesterday. Registration had long been required in Italy under this system, and Fierti, the great Italian commentator, laid it down that such registration was absolutely essential. The well-known American writer, Mr. Troubat, described the course taken in France, and said :—

“The French commercial law received at the hands of Louis XIV. the celebrated ordonnance of that year—‘one of the noblest monuments of the creative genius of that great King.’ In this ordonnance partnership en commandite was invested with the character and insignia of regular and real partnership, and was distinguished from other forms of partnership. But an agreement for it was not required to be publicly registered—a practice that gave rise to frauds, inasmuch as the secret special partner might, by purchasing the silence of his general associate, come forward after a failure and claim as a creditor for money lent.”

The Committee would observe the consequences attributed to the absence of registration. Was not experience a hundred times more valuable than theory when they were altering a law affecting the great commercial system of this country? Then, a great French commentator upon this subject (Mr. Troplong) brought us from the time of Louis XIV. to that of Napoleon, and he said :—“To prevent the danger of too much clandestinity”—the word might seem peculiarly French, but it expressed precisely the evil which it should be their object to avoid—to prevent too much clandestinity the Code de Commerce required all but the name of the special partner to be registered.” In the evidence taken before the Commission which had inquired into this subject it was pointed out that other countries had required the names of the special partners to be registered, and that mischief had been occasioned in France by the absence of such precaution. In dealing with this Bill he trusted the House would proceed upon experience rather than on theory. His right hon. Friend objected to the Gazette as a medium for these announcements. But did not every commercial question turn upon publication in the Gazette? Were not dissolutions of partnership made through that medium? Daylight was what they wanted—darkness what they wished to avoid. He submitted that the clause proposed would not prove a clog upon the Bill, and that the case in favour of the clause was irresistible.

Mr. LINDSAY said, for his part, he could not understand why a person should not be at liberty to lend money at a fluctuating rate of interest. The law permitted him to dispose of one of his ships on any terms which he liked, and why should any restriction be placed upon his parting with his money in precisely the same way? If this clause were agreed to it would be impossible to draw the line, because a small loan to one man might be of as great consequence to him as a loan of £1,000 to a firm, and were loans of a sovereign to be published? He hoped that if the clause were agreed to the right hon. Gentleman would throw the whole Bill into the waste-paper basket of the House.

Mr. T. BARING said, that as regarded lending money, if the transaction were simply between man and man the principle of the hon. Gentleman, that there should be no restriction in point of law, might be a correct one; but in a case where A lent money to B, if, in consequence of that operation, the credit of either A or B was in any way altered in the eyes of the public the case became different, and some provision was necessary to avert the danger to which the public might be exposed; and the object of the clause proposed was to furnish such a provision. The right hon. Gentleman was so enamoured of his Bill that he could not think that he would withdraw it, even if the House agreed to the present clause; but he wished to point out to him that, considering that he had introduced the Bill in February, and that he had altered it three times before the second reading, it was not fair to the House or to the country to press on the Bill at so late a period of the Session. The right hon. Gentleman had stated that the Bill was founded upon the same principle as the Joint-stock Companies Bill. Now there were very serious doubts as to the actual operation of that Bill, and it would only be prudent to wait until those doubts had been set at rest before extending the principle. The right hon. Gentleman had stated that he wished to give the same facility to two men as was enjoyed by seven. But why did he stop there? Why not give the same facility to one man? Why not let one man say, “I am prepared to gain as much as I can, but only to risk a certain portion of what I have already got?” Why, because it would be perfectly absurd to say so; and the absurdity had been realised and the danger which might arise had been guarded against by the legislators of other countries which had adopted the principle of limited liability. It was said that the present Bill would encourage benevolence, and enable a master to help a servant to start in business. Now, he did not pretend to be over benevolent, but he could quite understand lending money to a man out of benevolence without asking him for a share of his profits. It might be lent to him without interest, or at a low rate of interest, but there was no necessity for the lender to receive a share of the profits. The fact was that the Bill was not a Bill to assist the poor man. It was, on the contrary, a Bill to enable the rich man to run his chance in a lottery, and only risk a certain stake—to grasp all that he could, with the risk of losing as little as he pleased. The Bill, as it at present stood, would do nothing but give rise to gambling, and he trusted that it would not, in its present form, receive the sanction of the House of Commons.

VISCOUNT PALMERSTON said, he was quite at a loss to understand the distinction which hon. Members attempted to draw between money lent upon profit and upon a fixed rate of interest, or why there should be such danger apprehended to the country if money should be lent upon profits without publication, whereas no publication was required of money lent upon interest, let the rate be ever so high. If there was any value in the argument urged against the Bill, hon. Gentlemen who made use of it ought to go a great deal further. They ought to bring in a Bill to prevent persons engaged in trade from borrowing any money at all, and to confine them entirely to their own capital. The principle which lay at the bottom of these objections was that principle which he had hoped had long since been worn out in this country—the principle of restricting all transactions, of interfering between all persons, whether engaged as borrowers or lenders, which in former times had led to the assize of bread, to regrating, and forestalling. It was the principle which proclaimed that the Legislature was to be the guardian of every person in the community, that it was to prescribe the conditions on which transactions were to be carried on between man and man, as if commercial men were children, and required that their interests could be protected by the parental care of the Legislature. That principle was a bad one, and he hoped it would not receive the sanction of the House. He hoped that the House would come to a decision, not so much on the clause itself as on the Bill, and say at once whether they would have the Bill or not.

MR. BROWN thought the Bill the most dangerous measure which had ever been introduced into that House. It was in fact a Bill to enable persons to commit fraud under the protection of an Act of Parliament. He was of opinion that, where any person shared in the profit of a concern, that person should be held responsible to the whole extent of his fortune.

MR. HENLEY was of opinion that, as a clause had been introduced into the Bill at a former stage, enacting that lenders on profit should be postponed to all other creditors, some such provision as this was necessary to prevent collusion. He should therefore support the clause.

MR. MALINS said, the clause proposed was so foreign to the objects of the measure and to the habits of conducting business, that if it were adopted the Bill would be entirely valueless.

MR. T. HANKEY said, that if this clause were assented to, he should recommend the immediate withdrawal of the Bill.

After a few words from Mr. GREGSON and Mr. BASS,

Question put, "That those words be there added."

The House divided: — Ayes 108; Noes 102: Majority 6.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That the Bill do pass."

MR. LOWE said, that, after the decision to which the House had just come, it was not the intention of the Government to proceed with this Bill. If hon. Gentlemen would excuse him for a moment, he had one word to say on a point which considerably diminished his regret at the result of the division. Since he introduced this Bill, he had had laid before him the opinion of Mr. Justice Cresswell, Mr. Justice Willes, Mr. Baron Bramwell, the Attorney General, the Solicitor General, Sir Fitzroy Kelly, and one or two other legal gentlemen of eminence, to the effect that all loans lent on the terms of receiving a portion of the profits, and all services given on similar conditions, did not render persons liable as partners. He stated this publicly, because it was only due to the public that it should be made aware of it; for if those learned persons were right, the decision the House had come to would deprive the country of one of the safeguards which would have been afforded if this Bill had passed in its original shape.

MR. DISRAELI wished to know whether the right hon. Gentleman had any objection to lay before the House, not only the legal opinion to which he had referred, but also the case on which it was based. If the practice of falling back on the opinions of gentlemen of the long robe, with the view of alleviating the pain of a defeat, was to be introduced into their debates, it was but fair that the House should frankly be made privy to the sources whence the official consolation was derived.

MR. LOWE would, as far as he was concerned, be most willing to accept the challenge of the right hon. Gentleman, and to lay the case as well as the opinion before the House. The opinion was given on a case drawn up in special reference to the Unity Bank, which was founded on the principle that the depositors should be entitled to dividends according to the rate of the profits accruing from the business; and the learned personages he had named gave their opinion in favour of the legality of this principle, on which the bank was now acting. He did not know that it would be any breach of confidence on his part to give publicity to the case and the opinion which had been put into his hands; and therefore, as far as he was concerned, he should be quite ready to do so.

MR. MALINS understood that the opinions of the learned Judges referred to were given before they were raised to the judicial bench.

MR. HENLEY deprecated the observations just made by the Vice President of the Board of Trade. Extra-judicial statements, probably not worth the paper on which they were written, when they received the sanction of the high official authority of the right hon. Gentleman, were calculated to produce a serious amount of mischief.

Motion, by leave, withdrawn.

Bill withdrawn.

MERCANTILE LAW AMENDMENT BILL.

On Question that this Bill be now read 2^o

MR. T. BARING asked if it was the intention of the Government to proceed with this Bill with the first clause at it now stood?

MR. LOWE hoped the hon. Gentleman would agree to the second reading of the Bill, and take the discussion of the first clause in Committee. By opposing the Bill now because of the first clause, the entire measure, which contained some excellent enactments, might be endangered; whereas the object of the hon. Gentleman would be obtained equally well in Committee.

MR. T. BARING would not oppose the second reading, if the right hon. Gentleman would give an assurance that the first clause would be withdrawn in Committee.

MR. J. G. PHILLIMORE, MR. HADFIELD, MR. MALINS, and MR. W. BROWN, expressed their opposition to the first clause, which went to repeal one of the most important provisions of the Statute of Frauds.

MR. ROEBUCK thought, if the right hon. Gentleman acted prudently, he would withdraw the first clause, otherwise the entire Bill would be endangered.

MR. CRAUFURD was in favour of the first clause.

MR. MASTERMAN assured the right hon. Gentleman that the mercantile interest generally of the City of London were strongly opposed to the first clause of the Bill.

MR. LOWE said, he had no wish to persevere against such an array of opinions as seemed to exist against the first clause; and his only difficulty was that the Bill was not his own, but had been introduced into the House of Lords under the sanction of very high legal authority. He must say for himself that he thought the first clause perfectly right; but after the expression of opinion he had heard, he would consent to withdraw it in Committee.

MR. BARING, on the understanding that the clause would be withdrawn in Committee, would not oppose the second reading of the Bill.

Bill read 2^o, and committed for this day (Tuesday).

POOR LAW AMENDMENT (SCOTLAND) BILL.

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read the third time."

MR. BLACKBURN trusted that the Bill would not be pressed, for the feeling of the Scotch Members was against it. They objected to the appointment of two permanent inspectors. He moved that the Bill be read a third time that day three months.

Amendment proposed, to leave out the word "now," and at the end of the Question to add the words "upon this day three months."

THE LORD ADVOCATE was not aware of this adverse feeling among the Scotch Members, and should not withdraw the Bill, deeming it one of considerable importance. As the Bill at present stood, it was perfectly satisfactory to Sir John M'Neill, who had administered the Poor Law in Scotland in a most masterly and efficient manner. The Highlands were now happily in a more prosperous state than they were some time back; but, as bad times might recur, no man who had witnessed what he had would take on himself the responsibility of rejecting a measure which, at a cheap cost to the public, would be productive of great benefit in the working of the Poor Law.

MR. COWAN said, he would support the Bill, if he understood that Sir John M'Neill had not at present the power which the Bill proposed to give him.

SIR GEORGE GREY said, Sir John M'Neill had not the power of appointing permanent inspectors.

MR. DUNCAN objected to the appointment of a roving commission to investigate into the affairs of every local board, with their consent or against it.

MR. ALEXANDER HASTIE maintained that the powers at present possessed by the Board of Supervision rendered the Bill unnecessary.

MR. BOUVERIE remarked that, the powers of the Board of Supervision referred to special inquiries only, whereas the Bill provided for the appointment of permanent inspectors. That system had been found of great importance in England.

MR. CRAUFURD observed, that evils existed in the Highlands which could be remedied only by the machinery provided in the Bill.

Question put, "That the word 'now' stand part of the question."

The House divided:—Ayes 95; Noes 25: Majority 70.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read 3^d; clause added.

TITHE COMMUTATION RENT-CHARGE BILL.

On the Order for going into Committee on this Bill being read,

MR. R. PHILLIMORE said, he found himself compelled, though most reluctantly, to abandon the hope of proceeding with this measure any further during the present Session. He called the attention of the House to the fact, that in the second week of May he had carried the second reading of this Bill with the unanimous consent of the House, upon the ground that he had demonstrated that a particular class of Her Majesty's subjects, namely, the lay and clerical tithe-owners, were suffering from great injustice caused by the unintended operation of certain Acts of Parliament; that the Bill had been referred to a Select Committee, which had patiently and carefully examined the whole question, and had materially altered the provisions of the Bill; proceeding, nevertheless, upon the principle that redress was due to the tithe-owners, but varying the mode of conferring it. The Bill had been sent back to the House early in June, ever since which time he (Mr. R. Phillimore) had in vain endeavoured to advance it another stage. Having regard to the lateness of the Session, and the rule of another place not to take Bills after the 20th of July, he was obliged to withdraw the measure for this Session; but he hoped that, as the injustice had been admitted, that the House would assist him in obtaining a remedy at an early period of the next Session.

The Order for going into Committee was then discharged.

THE ARMY—THE COMMAND IN CHIEF—QUESTION.

THE DUKE OF SOMERSET said, that it would be in the recollection of their Lordships that two years ago, when the Department of the Secretary for War was created, considerable discussion took place in both Houses of Parliament on the relative duties of the Secretary for War and the Commander in Chief. It was then the impression that those two departments would never act harmoniously together, that differences of opinion between them would occasion delays, that those delays would be attended with inconvenience to the public service, and that the responsibility which was considered essential for the efficiency of the service would be neutralised. An opportunity, which they all regretted to have occurred, had now presented itself for making an alteration, if requisite, in the position of the Commander in Chief, and he wished to know whether, in making the new appointment, Her Majesty had been advised to make it in a different way from the mode in which former appointments of the same kind had been conferred; and whether the position of the Commander in Chief in regard to the Secretary for War had been in any way altered, and whether it was proposed to create any Board to assist the Commander in Chief?

LORD PANMURE said, he thought that in answering the questions put to him, it would be best to state briefly that with regard to the office of Commander in Chief no alteration had taken place in the shape of giving that officer any Board to assist him in the performance of his duties; and, in respect to the present appointment, no difference had been made in the relations which existed between the Secretary for War and the late Commander in Chief. In the relations which existed between the Secretary of State for War and the Commander in Chief, he considered that entire responsibility for all acts of the Commander in Chief rested with the Government of the day. The Commander in Chief made no appointments in the superior departments without consulting and obtaining the concurrence of the Secretary for War; and in the administration of the minor patronage of the army that officer acted on his own responsibility, but subject always to the control of the Secretary for War. Having thus answered the questions put to him, he felt he should not be doing the duty he owed to the late Commander in Chief if he did not express his deep regret at the circumstance which had induced the noble Lord lately at the head of the army (Viscount Hardinge) to resign his command. He knew no individual who had filled that situation with such entire satisfaction to the army, the Sovereign, and the country as the noble Lord whose services had just terminated. He knew of no individual so entirely qualified to undertake that most responsible duty as that noble Lord, from the fact of his having been brought up at the feet, he might say, of the Great Captain of the age, of his having gone through the Peninsular War, of his having been connected not simply with the British army, but also with foreign armies; and, finally, in consequence of his having seen war on the largest scale on the plains of India. To all this general experience, the noble Lord added the experience of Master General of the Ordnance; and for all these reasons he knew of no individual so highly qualified to fill the office of Commander in Chief. There was no doubt that the army would greatly miss his services; and for himself he must say, that since he had held the office of Secretary for War he had had no difference with the noble Lord, and all business transactions had been conducted between them with a harmony and friendship which he should never cease to remember.

VISCOUNT MELVILLE said, he had derived great satisfaction, and he was sure the whole army would also derive satisfaction, from the testimony given by the noble Lord to the character and services of the late Commander in Chief. He must say, with the experience he had had in service, and in consequence of what he had witnessed during the last year and a half, he thought the time had now come when a Cabinet Minute should be drawn up, to receive the sanction of Her Majesty, defining where the duties of Secretary of State for War ended, and where those of the Commander in Chief began. In order to provide for the efficiency and proper organisation of the army, he thought it indispensable that all promotions should be vested in the Commander in Chief, as well as everything relating to the discipline of the army. At the present moment there was a divided authority, and great difficulty had in consequence been experienced in carrying on the duties connected with the administration of the affairs of the army.

THE LORD CHANCELLOR rose to move the second reading of the Bishops of London and Durham Retirement Bill; and said that he should have supposed the measure would have been received with universal approbation if he had not received an intimation to the contrary on moving the first reading. The object of the Bill was to enable very important duties to be adequately discharged, which the present holders of the offices upon which the discharge of those duties devolved had earnestly represented their incapacity to discharge. The duties to which he referred were those which appertained to the important offices of the Bishoprics of London and Durham. The right rev. Prelates who had so long adorned those sees had gained for themselves, not only from those over whom they more immediately presided, but from the country at large, an amount of approbation which could hardly be exaggerated. His right rev. Friend the Bishop of London, with whom it had been his good fortune to be intimately acquainted from his earliest years, had discharged his high duties with a singleness of purpose, with a disinterested desire to benefit those who were placed under his care, rarely equalled and never surpassed. In the discharge of duties so important, and which were sometimes so difficult, it was impossible that every act of that right rev. Prelate during his long tenure of office should have met with universal approbation; but he believed that commanding as he did a very large income and presiding over a very large diocese, no one would contradict him when he said that the whole of that large revenue and the whole of his time had been devoted to the advancement of the spiritual and temporal interests of those over whom he presided. The same observations were applicable to the Bishop of Durham. In one respect those two right rev. Prelates occupied different positions. The Bishopric of London was not what was called a "regulated bishopric," but the Bishop received the whole of the revenues of the see. The Bishop of Durham, on the other hand, who had been appointed to his see after the rule had come into operation, by which it was provided that he should pay a fixed sum out of the revenues of the see, calculated on the assumption that after such payment there would remain to him, a net income of £3,000 a year. It turned out, however, that the revenue left at the disposal of the Bishop of Durham greatly exceeded that sum, being about £13,000 a year, and the right rev. Prelate had, with great liberality, set apart a portion of this surplus to form a fund called the "Maltby Fund," for the benefit of his diocese. The Bishop of London had received the entire revenues of his see, which might be stated at somewhere about £18,000 a year, whereas if the Bishopric had been regulated the income would have been £10,000. The Bishop of Durham was very advanced in life, he was nearly blind, and quite unable to discharge the duties of his bishopric. The Bishop of London, although by no means so advanced in life as the other right rev. Prelate unfortunately had a severe paralytic attack last autumn, from which he had in some degree rallied, but he had come to the conclusion that it was not probable he should again be enabled to attend to his duties. Both those right rev. Prelates in the course of last month communicated to the Government their desire to be allowed to retire from their offices, because they felt that they could no longer discharge their duties. The Government then had to consider what steps could be taken to comply with their request. He did not say that some general measure on this subject would not eventually have to be introduced, but there was great difficulty in framing any general measure. One difficulty was in reference to the regulated bishoprics, the incomes of which had been fixed at £4,500 a year; because that sum having been considered the proper salary for the office, it could not very well be charged with any sum as allowance to a retiring Bishop. The Government did not think it wise without further consideration and at this period of the Session to propose any general measure. But the case of the Bishops of London and Durham appeared to the Government in many respects exceptional. There was a great if not practical difference between the bishopric of London and other bishoprics, inasmuch as the duties attached to it were made more numerous and important. A similar observation was applicable to the bishopric of Durham, the metropolitan see of the north. The Government, in considering the course they ought to pursue, on receiving the representations he had mentioned from these right rev. Prelates, first inquired whether there was any law whereby their resignations might be effected without the aid of Parliament, and securing to them an income after their resignations. He believed there was no such law; but, at all events, the matter was involved in extreme obscurity, and, in fact, he had been able to discover no precedent of an actual resignation since the Reformation. In the middle of the last century Bishop Pierce wished to resign the see of Rochester, and long discussions on the subject took place between Lord Chancellor Northington and Lord Chief Justice Mansfield; the Lord Chief Justice being of opinion that he might resign, while the Lord Chancellor held that he could not. The doubts of Lord Northington appeared eventually to have been set at rest, but some difficulty was raised by the Crown, and the resignation did not take place. Again, in the reign of Queen Elizabeth, Archbishop Grindall, after resisting the attempts of the Queen to force him to retire, expressed a wish to resign; but, nevertheless, he died Archbishop of Canterbury. He was not prepared to say
